sufficiently to record his vote. The State—that is, the taxpayers—pays nearly the whole cost of education, and, therefore, it has a right to say whether the right of voting should be with those who are so absolutely ignorant that they cannot put a cross against their name. I think the right of illiterates to vote is bad, because it gives power to those who are least able to resist intimidation. Although the case is a very small one as regards England, it is very strong as regards Ireland. Let me give the figures at Donegal election in 1886. Out of 18,000 voters 7,903 claimed that they were unable to read or write, and voted before the returning officer in the presence of the personation agent. In Fermanagh, out of 11,863 voters there were 2,968 illiterates. In Monaghan, out of 12,177 voters there were 3,220; and in Tyrone, out of 26,787 there were 6,957. These figures amount to this, that at the last Election one out of every 74 in Scotland, one out of every 64 in England, and one out of every five in Ireland claimed to vote as illiterate. I admit that at present the people of Ireland are not so well educated as those of England, but that is not the fault of the present Government. In Ulster and Belfast the education is fairly good, equal to that in many parts of England; but I fear the state of things is due to other circumstances. In no part of England is there any great proportion of illiterates, except in Dudley, where there were 1,293. In Marylebone there were only two, and in South Paddington only one. It is a matter of common notoriety that many elections in the past were won by the intimidation of the League, sustained, in some instances, by the terrors of the Church. The wretched voters in many constituencies found themselves forced to obey the agents of the Home Rule Party. They were driven like sheep to the poll, while within the booth itself were local League officials to see that they voted according to orders. This was a clear violation of the secrecy of the Ballot, but it is a system which has grown under the Illiterate Voters' Clause of the Act, specially framed to prevent coercion. Though there is no better form of Government than that which derives its power from a real representative system, there is none worse than that which permits electors to be driven like sheep to the poll to give their votes in fear of spiritual and bodily danger. I have no wish to entirely disfranchise these voters; there are many ways in which the most illiterate can give his vote with the utmost secrecy, and these will probably be discussed when the Bill of my hon. Friend comes to be considered. As long as you can give the vote secretly I have no objection to it; but under the present system, when the vote is practically given openly before the personation agent it tends to a large amount of danger to the voter, and the chance of his being intimidated. I think in the public interest we should have all the electors equally free to go to the poll. We hear a great deal from our opponents about one man one vote, but I do not think we should consider that under the existing state of affairs. I find that in Wandsworth 15,000 voters have one Representative, while in Derry, 5,000, many of whom are illiterate, have three Representatives. I hope that at some future time the First Lord of the Treasury may take up the question, not only as regards Local Government in Ireland, but as it affects political representation in that country. I would remind the right hon. Gentleman that this is not a political question. I know for a fact that there are several leading Members of the opposite Party who thoroughly agree that there are anomalies in the Ballot Act; and I would also point out that at the meeting of the Conservative Party at Birmingham, where I had the honour of bringing forward the proposal that the illiterate vote should be abolished, it met with unanimous approval, on the grounds that by it great injury was done to the freedom of election of Members of Parliament.

(7.42.) MR. M. J. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid): I listened to the speech of the hon. Gentleman to see if he gave any specific cases of infringement of the Ballot Act, and found, as I expected, that it would be an attack directed against Ireland. Instead of making an argument in favour of his Motion, he indulged in a violent tirade and an irrelevant attack on the religious gentlemen of Ireland. I have had some experience of elections, and, so far as I know, in no instance has any attempt been made by any person of legal responsibility to indulge in illegal conduct on those occasions. I do not know if the hon. Gentleman has ever heard of the Corrupt Practices Act, which makes the most stringent provision against any attempt at the intimidation of any class of voters. The Act was passed in 1884, and a special clause was inserted to deal with the case of any person exercising any form of spiritual intimidation. We have had two General Elections and many bye-elections since that Act was passed, and yet no clergyman has brought himself within the penal clauses. It is a ground for voiding an election if intimidation of that kind is exercised. If, as the hon. Gentleman says, intimidation was practised at certain elections, why were not proceedings taken against the offending parties? I would recommend the hon. Gentleman to be more careful before he makes charges of this kind against any class of the community which he is unable to substantiate. There was not a priest in any booth at the Derry election. A clergyman made the usual declaration as to secrecy, but I did not allow him to enter the booth. During the Sligo election no priests entered the booths on the eastern side of the county, nor do I believe they did so on the western side. Not only do Catholic clergymen take an interest in elections, but clergymen of other denominations also, and I have never heard their conduct questioned. The hon. Gentleman alleges that no protection of the illiterates was exercised. Every person in the booths had to make the statutory declaration as to secrecy, and no attempt has been made to bring a charge against any man for a violation of that declaration. The Ballot Act has been in operation for something like 20 years—

HOUSE OF LORDS,

CATTLE DISEASE.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

EARL DE LA WARR: My Lords, I after private notice to my noble Friend, to ask Her Majesty's Government whether any steps have been taken reference to the outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease among cattle in this country; and also whether there is no reason to suppose that it may have been brought into this country by imported cattle, or whether, as it has been rendered; the poison was introduced into this country by raw hides which came from Germany, and have been landed at Harwich? My Lords, I wish merely to refer this question to Her Majesty's Government, believing, as I do, that the noble Friends to whom I have referred are known to many of your Lordships, and I have no doubt my statement might be corroborated?

THE MARQUESS OF HUNTRY: My Lords, before the noble Earl replies to my noble Friend's question, I may say I had already given him private information of a similar question; but I would like also to ask him further, if he would allow me, whether he can corroborate the information as to the importation of this disease through Danish cattle, and whether that opinion, which was expressed by the Board of Agriculture, is not now confirmed? My noble Friend alluded to the Report, which caused great sensation in London on Friday last, that it had been ascertained, through the action of the American Consul, that the disease had been imported by raw hides from a Danish port landed at Harwich. I would like to know whether that is correct or not; and also to know whether further outbreaks have been notified this morning of this disease in this country; and what steps the Board of Agriculture have taken to cope with the disease?

THE LORD PRIVY SEAL (Earl of MANCHESTER): My Lords, perhaps both my noble Friends will allow me to answer these questions together. With regard to the question of my noble Friend behind me, I beg to remind him that my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Agriculture on two occasions in the House of Commons—on the 11th inst., I think, and as late as on the 18th—replied to questions at very great length, stating, step by step, what proceedings had been taken by the Board of Agriculture in view of the undoubtedly outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease; and I think that the House would hardly wish me to read at great length the replies of my right hon. Friend—they were published in all the newspapers; but, if my noble Friend behind me would wish to have them printed, I could, no doubt, give them to him. With regard to the further question of the noble Marquess, no further facts have been elicited by the Department as to the origin of this disease; and with reference to the report which has obtained currency during the last day or two (which I think had its origin in one of the newspapers on Sunday), namely, that it had been found that the origin of the outbreak was the importation of some infected raw hides into this country, the Board of Agriculture have, through their officers, and with the assistance of the Custom House officials, made the very strictest inquiry into that report, and have no reason whatever to believe that there is any truth or foundation in it. I believe I have answered the questions of both my noble Friends.

TARIFF AGREEMENTS.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, I wish to ask the noble Lord the Secretary of State for the Colonies a question of which I have given him private notice. It has been stated in the newspapers that an agreement has been come to between the West Indian Colonies and the United States as to certain articles of tariff, which will allow sugar, I believe, to be imported into the United States on more favourable terms, in return for a certain concession in the tariff for the West Indian Islands. I should be glad to know from the noble Lord whether that statement is true; whether the changes in the tariffs in the West Indian Islands involves any differential duties against this country, or merely alters the duties so as to lower them for all importers; and, lastly, whether Papers will be laid on the Table in a short time?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Lord KNUTSFORD): My Lords, in reply to the last part of the noble Earl's question, I would say that the Papers will be laid on the Table at the earliest possible opportunity. In the meantime I had better answer the other question of the noble Earl at a little more length, as the subject is one of very great importance. About the close of last year the Colonies were unofficially and informally notified that, unless they were prepared to make reductions of their duties, it would be necessary for the President of the United States, under Article 3 of the McKinley Tariff Act, to re-impose duties on sugar shipped from the Colonies into the United States. This was a question of vital importance to the West Indian Colonies, and they urgently pressed Her Majesty's Government to negotiate with the United States on their behalf. I need hardly say that Her Majesty's Government were very ready and willing to do so. The result of the negotiations has been that the different Colonies (Grenada only excepted, because, I think, she does not import sugar into the United States) have agreed in some cases to abolish altogether, and in other cases to reduce, their import duties upon certain articles; and I may mention that those articles are, in the main, articles of food, or articles of general popular consumption in the islands. I will just mention some of them, because I know the noble Earl takes an interest in this question—bacon, bread, lard, corn-meal, flour, petroleum, &c. The reduction applies to all these articles whatever is the country of their origin, and therefore there is no question at all of differential duties in the matter. Her Majesty's Government have very readily assented to the reduction of these import duties upon articles of food and articles of general consumption, because it is a step in the direction of a policy which has been pressed upon these Colonies by successive Secretaries of State, certainly by the noble Earl himself in 1881 and 1882, and, I think, probably by the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) also, due regard of course being had to securing that there shall be no great loss of revenue. I will only add that the question of how to meet the loss of revenue, which will result by these reductions, is now the consideration of all the Legislatures.

QUESTIONS.

ILLEGAL BEAM TRAWLING OFF THE SCOTCH COAST.

MR. DUFF (Banffshire): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate if the attention of the Secretary for Scotland has been called to the Report of the Fishery Board for Scotland for last year, wherein repeated reference is made to the systematic evasion of the law by beam trawlers, and to the total inadequacy of the sea police at present employed to protect the waters closed against beam trawling; and if it is the intention of the Government, in consequence of this official information, to station a Marine Police on the coast of Scotland sufficient to maintain law and order, at present subject to serious infringement by what the Report characterises as the illegal depredations of the trawlers?

MR. MUNRO FERGUSON (Leith, &c.) had notice of the following question:—To ask the Lord Advocate whether the Admiralty has yet consented to place the ships in Scottish waters necessary to secure the protected areas from illegal depredation by trawlers?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Sir C. J. PEARSON, Edinburgh and St. Andrews Universities): I propose to include in my answer a reply to the question of the hon. Member for Leith Burghs. The Secretary for Scotland has had under his attention the Report of the Fishery Board, to which the hon. Member refers. Her Majesty's Government are well aware that the laws in relation to trawling are at present largely evaded. There are obvious difficulties in effectively patrolling 800 miles of seaboard, but the Admiralty have strengthened their force of gunboats off the Scotch coast and are making careful investigations as to the best means of dealing with this difficult question.

MR. DUFF: In the number of vessels appointed for the purpose will there be any special protection for the Moray Firth?

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: That is a matter of detail with which I am not acquainted. I must ask for notice of the question.

MR. H. T. ANSTRUTHER (St. Andrews, &c.): Can the right hon. Gentleman answer a question which was formerly put to the late Lord Advocate and upon which he said he would make inquiry, whether the average speed of the steam trawlers is higher than that of any of the vessels employed in the Marine Police Service? Can the right hon. Gentleman say if that is the case, as, according to my information, it is?

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: I am sorry I am not able to give the hon. Member the information he desires at this moment, but I will make inquiry into the matter.

MR. MUNRO FERGUSON : Did I understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that the Admiralty force had been strengthened, or that it was proposed to strengthen it ?

*SIR C. J. PEARSON : I believe it has already been strengthened.

THE TITLE OF LORD MAYOR.

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the Government will recommend to Her Majesty to confer on the Chief Magistrate of the City of Belfast the style and title of Lord Mayor, now that Dundee, recently granted a City Charter, and with a population considerably less, has just had its Chief Magistrate raised to the position of Lord Provost ? I may be allowed to add that, in asking this question, I have not the slightest feeling of jealousy towards Dundee, and in no way object to the title of Lord Provost.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN (Dublin, College Green) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will say, when answering the question of the hon. Member for South Belfast (suggesting that the style and title of Lord Mayor should be conferred on the Chief Magistrate of the City of Belfast), whether he will favourably entertain a similar application on behalf of the ancient Cities of Cork, Limerick, and Waterford ?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.) : I will answer both questions at the same time. The Government will be prepared to consider the question of advising Her Majesty to confer the title of Lord Mayor upon the Chief Magistrate of the City of Belfast, having due regard to what has been done in other parts of the United Kingdom. With regard to Cork, Limerick, and Waterford, those cities do not present the conditions of population and growing industrial importance which would entitle them to be placed on the same level as Belfast.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.) : Can the right hon. Gentleman say how many Scotch cities have Lord Provosts ?

MR. JOHNSTON : Five.

MR. MATTHEWS : Yes ; I think five

THE GLIN BOARD OF GUARDIANS.

MR. ABRAHAM (Limerick, W.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the fact that when the Glin Board of Guardians was dissolved last year three divisions of that Union were transferred, without subdivision, to Listowel Union, and the services of the dispensary doctors retained by sealed order of the Local Government Board ; can he state why the services of the rate collector for these divisions was not also retained, in accordance with the precedent followed in the case of Gortin Union when it was united with that of Omagh and Strabane ; has the Local Government Board sanctioned the appointment of Mr. Mulvihill as rate collector, although his time is occupied as rent warner and land bailiff in the employment of an ex officio member of the Listowel Board, and does this sanction involve the payment of a pension of £10 a year to the late collector, though he is fitted in every way to discharge the duty ; and will he institute inquiry into this matter ?

*THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.) : On the dissolution of Glin Union seven electoral divisions were transferred to Listowel Union. The cases of the medical officer and the poor rate collector were dealt with differently by reason of the fact that the transferred divisions formed a complete dispensary district, but did not form a complete poor rate collector's district. The formation of the new district or districts for collection purposes was, therefore, left for the consideration of the Guardians. In the case of the Gortin Union, the electoral divisions transferred formed complete collectors' districts. The new rate collector was elected by the Listowel Guardians by a considerable majority, and the reply to the inquiries made by the Local Government Board being satisfactory, the appointment was sanctioned. It was the case that the Guardians of the Glin (dissolved) Union granted their collector a pension of £10 0s. 5d.

RETURN OF RAILWAY ACCIDENTS.

MR. JOHN ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe) : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade when the Returns of Accidents and Casualties on Railways under "The Regulation of Railways Act, 1889," for the six months ending 31st December, 1891, will be presented and distributed?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir MICHAEL HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): There are no such Returns referred to in the Act of 1889. The hon. Member probably refers to the "Regulation of Railways Act, 1871." The Returns of Accidents and Casualties furnished under that Act will, I hope, be presented early next week, and distributed as soon afterwards as the revision of proofs can be completed.

THE NORTHERN TERRITORY OF SOUTH AUSTRALIA.

MR. WATT (Glasgow, Camlachie): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he has received the Report of Mr. Parkes with reference to the resources of the Northern Territory of South Australia; and, if so, whether he has any objection to lay the same upon the Table?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): The Report in question has not yet been received.

GLASGOW POSTAL DISTRICTS.

MR. WATT: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he has yet been able to investigate and arrive at a decision as to the anomalous position of Parkhead owing to the existing postal area in the east end of Glasgow; whether he is aware that Springfield Road is one-half in the Glasgow area and one-half in the Parkhead district, and that letters are frequently thus delayed as long as a day through business premises being a few feet on one or other side of the postal boundary; and whether, seeing Parkhead is one of the oldest and most populous districts of Glasgow, there is any objection to extend to it the same privileges as have been granted to Calton, Anderson, Bridgeton, and other similarly situated districts?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Sir JAMES FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): Inquiry has already been made in connection with a written application received from the hon. Member some time ago on the subject of Parkhead, and a revision of the postal arrangements there and in the other suburban districts of Glasgow is now under consideration, under which the morning delivery and other services at Parkhead will be placed as nearly as circumstances will allow on the same footing as in other parts of the city. It is hoped, also, that it will be found practicable to include the whole of Springfield Road in the Glasgow Town District. But as the revision is a large one, some further time may necessarily be occupied before it can be carried out.

THE ORDNANCE SURVEY.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH (Inverness-shire): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether the Departmental Committee appointed to inquire into the grievances of those employed in the Ordnance Survey, which concluded its examination in July, 1891, has made a Report; whether he will lay a Copy upon the Table; and whether the grievances complained of are to be remedied, and when?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): It is not correct that the Departmental Committee which was appointed to inquire into the questions of the pay and general position of the Civil servants employed on the Ordnance Survey concluded their examination on 21st July, 1891. The examination was not concluded until 26th October last. The Report of the Committee has not yet been made, and I understand that its preparation has been delayed by reason of the serious illness of the Chairman, Colonel Leach. I will endeavour to accelerate the production of the Report; and as soon as it is presented I will at once consider what action, if any, is to be taken thereon; and I am aware of no reason why the Report should not be laid upon the Table.

SCHOOL ATTENDANCE IN THE HIGHLANDS AND ISLANDS OF SCOTLAND.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he is aware that many heads of families in the Highlands and Islands are obliged to leave their homes for the Lowlands in pursuit of work, remaining absent for months at a time; whether School Boards have hitherto, and with beneficial results, prosecuted, when necessary, the mother, or the temporary head of the household, for default in sending children to school; whether he is aware that it has lately been decided in the Supreme Courts of Scotland that the father, wherever he may be resident, is alone responsible for such default; and whether he will give legislative effect to the representations of various school boards who desire ready recourse for defaults in school attendance?

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: The answer to the two first paragraphs of the question is in the affirmative. I have not had an opportunity of seeing the decision referred to, but I understand the Court held that, on the facts before them, the father had the actual custody of his children, and I am not aware that the decision went further. I have no reason to believe that a desire for a change in the law is widely felt; and it appears inexpedient to extend the definition of "parent" merely because the Court has held in a particular case that the responsibility rested with the father.

TREASON FELONY CONVICTS.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons have been convicted of treason felony in Great Britain during the past 10 years; and of those so convicted, how many have been released, how many have died in prison, and how many of those released have died or become insane?

MR. MATTHEWS: The number of persons convicted of treason felony in Great Britain during the past 10 years and received into English convict prisons under sentence of penal servitude is 23. Of this number four have been released; two have died in prison. I have no information as to the subsequent history of those who have been released from prison.

THE GREEN STREET COURT HOUSE, DUBLIN.

MR. M. J. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland on what basis the respective contributions of the Treasury, the Corporation of Dublin, and the Grand Jury of County Dublin towards the reconstruction of Green

Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh

Street Court House are calculated; how long the present Court House has been in existence; and if his attention has been directed to the reports in the newspapers of a recent important criminal trial, in the progress of which the leading counsel for the accused had twice to leave the Court owing to the bad smells proceeding from the drains underneath the Court House; and to a further incident reported as follows:—

"When the jury was sworn one of the jurors complained of a great draught in the jury box.

"The Lord Chief Justice said the special jurors of Dublin should not be allowed to get the influenza, and ordered that the windows should be closed.

"One of the jurors tried to close the window near the jury box, but was unable to do so.

"The Lord Chief Justice: This is scandalous. This state of things is an outrage upon civilisation."

If, considering that the most important business discharged at Green Street is the hearing of criminal causes, the Government will consider whether they cannot defray the whole cost of rebuilding what is practically a Government property; and if steps will be taken at once in that direction?

MR. JACKSON: The total cost for building a new Court House in substitution for the existing one at Green Street, Dublin, was estimated at £40,500. The Treasury, in 1883, agreed to contribute £13,500—i.e., one-third—the remainder to be borne in the proportions of one-third by the county and two-thirds by the city. In arriving at the conclusion that those were the most equitable proportions, the Lord Lieutenant and the Treasury had before them returns obtained from the Clerks of the Peace and of the Crown of cases entered for hearing at Green Street in the preceding five years. The Grand Jury on behalf of the County, and the Corporation on behalf of the City, accepted these proportions. I have no information enabling me to say how long the present Court House has been in existence. The Irish Government have observed the reports in the Press of the remarks of the learned Judge in regard to the discreditable condition of the present building. The hon. Member is under a misapprehension in describing this Court House as practically Government property. It is used as the Quarter Session Court House for the City of Dublin, at which the Recorder sits for the hearing of a multitudinous class of cases, and it is also used for the sittings of the Commission of Oyer and Terminer for both the City and the County of Dublin — Commissions which are held frequently, and correspond to the Circuits of Assize in ordinary counties. I cannot hold out any hope of better terms being offered.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): Has the right hon. Gentleman any objection to consider, so far as Crown business is concerned, which necessitates the attendance of jurors, whether the Government could not arrange that this should be transacted at the Four Courts, leaving the civil business to be done at Green Street?

MR. JACKSON: I have no objection to consider the suggestion. I will communicate with Dublin, and ascertain if there is any possibility of this being done.

MR. SEXTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman also consider whether it would not be likely to facilitate matters to withdraw the insult offered to the City of Dublin by restoring the name of the Lord Mayor to the Commission?

MR. JACKSON: I am not aware that there is any insult in the matter.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): Will the right hon. Gentleman undertake that the name of the Lord Mayor of Dublin shall be restored to the Commission? For centuries the Chief Magistrate of Dublin had been included in the Commission of Oyer and Terminer, and withdrawing the name was an insult to the Corporation.

MR. JACKSON: I am not aware of it, and I am not prepared to accept the construction put upon it by the hon. Member.

THE POST OFFICE AND RAILWAY COMPANIES.

MR. JOHN ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether his attention has been drawn to the remark in the Report of the Select Committee on Revenue Estimates of 11th July, 1888, as to the loss to the State from "the enormous increase of services gratuitously performed for the Railway Companies" by messages so sent under a contract made in 1870, and also to the reference made to this matter by the late Postmaster General in Committee of Supply, on 23rd July, 1890; and whether he can now say how the matter stands as between the State and the Railway Companies?

*SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: This matter has for a long time received the anxious consideration of the Post Office, and we have been during the last few months in communication, by meetings and correspondence, with the representatives of the Railway Companies. No arrangement has yet been arrived at, and the last communication was from the Post Office. In the meantime I am glad to say that the growth of the loss in question appears to have ceased.

IRISH MAIL SERVICES.

CAPTAIN M'CALMONT (Antrim, E.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether, although the delays in the mail service to Ireland by Stranraer and Larne have been very frequent since the institution of the accelerated service on 1st September last, it is the case that only on four occasions has the delay occurring between Stranraer and Belfast exceeded 15 minutes to the end of January last?

*SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: No, Sir; I am informed that, reckoning from the time of the complete transfer of the mails to the packet at Stranraer, upwards of 15 minutes have been lost before the arrival at Belfast on 30 occasions between the 1st September and the 31st January. On 25 of those occasions time was lost by not starting after the mails were on board.

POSTAL SERVICE IN MACROOM DISTRICT, CO. CORK.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether a memorial has been received from the inhabitants of Ashgrove and the district situated between Macroom and Kilnamartyra, County Cork, through the Cork postmaster, asking for the establishment of a sub-post in the district; and whether, having regard to the extent of the district and the convenience of the inhabitants, their request will be granted?

*SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: A memorial has been received asking for the establishment of a post office at Ashgrove or Raleigh, in the neighbourhood mentioned in the hon. Member's question; but as the service is already carried on in that district at an outlay considerably in excess of the revenue, no further expenditure can be incurred. About 12 letters a day only would benefit by the proposal.

DR. TANNER: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that his late lamented predecessor, Mr. Raikes, promised last year to see into the complaints made by the inhabitants of the Macroom district with a view to having their grievances redressed?

*SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: Yes, Sir, inquiries were made with the result I have stated.

DR. TANNER: I shall refer to the subject in discussion on the Estimates.

SALARIES OF IRISH SUB-POST- MASTERS.

MR. TUITE (Westmeath, N.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is prepared to take into consideration the case of the Irish sub-Postmasters with a view of increasing their salaries; and whether the person who fills the position is obliged to provide an office, stationery, twine, wax, &c., for which no compensation is given, while the salary in many cases is as low as £4 per annum, and the hours of duty 13 to 19 per day?

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: The salaries of sub-Postmasters in Ireland are regulated by the same scale as those of sub-Postmasters in the rest of the United Kingdom, and as the payments made under this scale are found to be sufficient in England and Scotland, it is not considered necessary to increase them in Ireland.

FOG ACCIDENTS IN HER MAJESTY'S DOCKYARDS.

MR. NORRIS (Tower Hamlets, Limehouse): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if in Her Majesty's Dockyards he proposes the construction of stanchions and chains, or any other arrangement, along the quays, to safeguard life from accidents in the event of fog, as recommended by the President of the Board of Trade to the Joint Committee of the London and St. Katharine, the East and West India, the Victoria and Albert, and the Tilbury Docks?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): All the Admiralty docks

and quays are as a rule protected by stanchions and chains; but, as it is possible that in a few cases there may be some omission, I have called for a Report from the different naval yards.

REUTER'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES.

MR. LENG (Dundee): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether, in addition to the contract for the reporting of the Parliamentary Debates by Reuter's Telegram Company, Limited, he will, without giving the names of other tenderers, supply a concise statement, for the information of the House, of the terms offered by them, so that they may be compared with those of the accepted offer?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir JOHN GORST, Chatham): As I stated last week in answer to a question, it is unusual to publish the names of the unsuccessful tenderers, but I may state generally that the 15 unsuccessful tenders varied from £245 to £650 per volume.

MR. LENG: I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he is aware that the publication of advertisements along with Reuter's Parliamentary Debates, in addition to their publication in the Board of Trade Journal, has created great dissatisfaction among newspaper and other publishers in London, on the ground that it constitutes Government competition with private business, and whether the Treasury will withhold their assent from similar arrangements for inserting advertisements in Parliamentary publications until those affected have an opportunity of stating their objections to the system?

SIR J. GORST: No, Sir; no complaint of the kind has ever reached me. The Parliamentary Debates are not a Parliamentary but a private publication, and there can, therefore, be no competition of Government with private business. I am not prepared to give such an undertaking as the hon. Member desires.

MR. LENG: Will the right hon. Gentleman further say, Was it one of the stipulations of the contract that the contractor should have power to insert advertisements?

SIR J. GORST: The contract has been laid on the Table. I cannot answer from recollection what are the stipulations, but I do not think that was one of the stipulations.

QUEEN'S PLATES IN IRELAND.

MR. O'KEEFE (Limerick) : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture if, in the interest of promoting better breeding of horses amongst the farmers in Ireland, he will recommend a further distribution of the Queen's Plates for winners of races in that country ; and whether, in view of the fact that such plates are now practically confined to entries at the Curragh Race Meetings, he will, on every requirement being satisfied, restore to the Limerick Race Stewards the Queen's Plate formerly for many years at their disposal ?

*MR. JACKSON : I am not aware of any intention to ask Parliament to provide an increased amount for Queen's Plates in Ireland. But I would remind the hon. Member that the present Government have, under the Probate Duties Act of 1888, provided a sum of £5,000 annually, payable to the Royal Dublin Society, for the improvement of the breed of horses and cattle in Ireland ; and the Congested Districts Board are also taking important steps in that direction. As regards the particular case of Limerick, the races there had one of the Queen's Plates apparently for but a very short period. It was withdrawn some 22 years ago in consequence of the course there not being suitable, and given to Cork. I am not aware of any generally expressed desire to remove this plate from Cork.

THE CONVICT JOSEPH MULLETT.

MR. MCARTAN (Down, S.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware of the low state of health of Joseph Mullett, now confined in Maryborough Gaol ; whether his attention has been called to the report in the National Press of 17th November, 1891, of the proceedings at the inquest on the remains of P. W. Nally (Mullett's former fellow prisoner, who died in Mountjoy Prison), wherein the following statement appears as having been written by Nally from Downpatrick Gaol :—

"Poor Joe Mullett is very delicate. Every morning we expect to hear of his being found dead. It is not the doctor's fault. He has made several reports concerning him, yet the Board take no notice of them"; and whether, under the circumstances, and in view of the long term of imprisonment which Mullett has already suffered, he will consider the desirability of releasing him ?

*MR. JACKSON : The General Prisons Board report that there is no ground for the suggestion contained in this question as to the alleged serious state of the health of the convict Joseph Mullett ; but that, on the contrary, his general health has advanced, and he has within the past year increased a stone in weight.

NEWCASTLE HARBOUR, COUNTY DOWN.

MR. MCARTAN : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether his attention has been called to a report in the Irish News of the 17th instant, in which it is stated that five fishermen of Newcastle, County Down, were drowned on Monday last ; whether he is aware that, owing to the insufficiency and danger of the Newcastle harbour, the fishermen are obliged to expose their lives in small boats unsuited for deep-sea fishing ; and whether, considering the repeated warnings given to the Government as to the danger caused to the lives of the fishermen at Newcastle, owing to the present state of the harbour, steps will now be taken to provide safe and sufficient harbour accommodation there ?

COLONEL WARING (Down, N.) : In relation to this subject, I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman if he is aware that the charge for the harbour was forced upon the Grand Jury of County Down in spite of their protest and their representations that it was unsuitably placed, that it was faulty in construction, and that its maintenance was quite beyond the means of the local rates ?

SIR J. GORST : I am afraid it is not possible for me to be aware of these details upon Irish questions. In reply to the question on the Paper, I can only refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my predecessor in Office on 7th March, 1890, and by the late Chief Secretary for Ireland on 30th April, 1891, to which, I am sorry to say, I can add nothing.

DR. TANNER : But has the right hon. Gentleman had his attention drawn to the fact that these men lost their lives through the non-completion of Government work, a non-completion to which for many years, attention has been drawn by questions in this House? Is he prepared to sanction a state of things which tends to destroy life?

SIR J. GORST: No, Sir; I am not aware of anything of the kind.

COLONEL WARING: I will put down my question for a future day.

CLERKS IN THE CENTRAL TELEGRAPH OFFICE.

MR. MCARTAN: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that certain clerks of the Central Telegraph Office receive £116 a year in the first class after a service of ten and a half years, and other clerks with services of ten years and five months and ten years and four months only receive £86 a year in the second class; whether the difference of salaries arise solely from the classification system; and whether, considering the grave discontent which this inequality is causing in the Service, he will inquire into the matter in order to have it remedied?

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: The statement made in the first paragraph is literally correct. In 1890, in connection with the general revision of the indoor establishment of sorting clerks and telegraphists, a large addition was made to the first class of telegraphists at the Central Telegraph Office in order to provide for duties proper to that class, and the new appointments thus created were filled by promotion from the class below. The promoted officers were fortunate in obtaining such a material increase of pay, but of course this good fortune involved no hardship upon their colleagues who are left on the second class, and who, when their turn comes for promotion, will enjoy a similar advantage. Those in receipt of salaries of £86 a year are by no means at a standstill, as they rise by increments of £6 a year to the maximum of the class, £110 a year. Seeming inequalities such as Mr. McCartan indicates must generally follow the re-organisation of an establishment, and there is nothing exceptional in the case of the Central Telegraph Office which calls for a resettlement of the costly revision granted after full and careful consideration little more than a year ago.

LEVEL CROSSINGS ON THE LANCASHIRE AND YORKSHIRE RAILWAY.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that at an inquest held on Thursday 4th February, at Portsmouth, near Todmorden, on James Hamworth, who was killed on 2nd February at Portsmouth level crossing, the jury requested the Coroner to make representations to the Directors of the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company as to the dangerous arrangements at Portsmouth Station; also that at an inquest held in 1891 on a little girl named Sarah Dawson, who was killed at Walsden level crossing on the same branch of the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway, the jury gave their opinion "that the company are practically responsible for this death, which would have been avoided had they constructed the bridge according to the plans deposited with the Todmorden Local Board two years ago, and that they are deserving of the severest censure for their negligence in this matter"; whether he has observed that it appears from the evidence that about 30 children have to pass this crossing three times a day to attend school; whether he is aware that on the same branch line there are seven other dangerous level crossings, some of which are daily used by several hundreds of persons; and whether, having regard to the repeated accidents at these crossings, he will direct an inquiry to be held by an Inspector of the Board of Trade into the circumstances of the fatal accidents at Walsden and Portsmouth level crossings, and make urgent representations to the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company that they should promptly provide bridges or subways where necessary?

*SIR MICHAEL HICKS BEACH: The facts are as stated in the first paragraph of the hon. Member's question. As regards the accident to James Hamworth, the Board of Trade have been in communication with the company, who have stated that their engineer had, prior to the accident in question, been instructed to prepare plans for providing additional accommodation. I think it right, however, to state that the unfortunate man who was killed refused to follow the warnings of the company's servants. As regards the accident to Sarah Dawson at the Walsden level sing, I have also been in communication with the company, who have undertaken, pending the erection of a bridge, that a man shall be stationed at a level crossing to superintend the roads. I am informed by the company that the delay in erecting a bridge has been caused by difficulties in obtaining necessary land. The Board of Trade has no information of the deposit of money for the construction of a bridge by the Todmorden Local Board, but the necessity for the erection of a bridge will be further pressed on the company. There appear to be only three other crossings on the Todmorden and Burnley which cross public roads. I am informed that the traffic is not large on these roads; the crossings have been authorised by Parliament, and I have no power to order the erection of bridges.

SENCE OF A DISTRICT REGISTRY IN BELFAST.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he is aware of the great inconvenience caused to the merchants of Belfast in not having a local registry for the issue of writs of summons; and whether he will consider the desirability of establishing a district registry there? THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR ENGLAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): Perhaps I may be allowed to answer this question. The matter referred to by the hon. Member is not under the control of the Executive Government. Under the provisions of the Irish Judicature Act, 1877, all matters connected with the issue of writs are regulated by rules of Court to be made by the Lord Lieutenant, with the concurrence of a majority of the Judges, including the Lord Chancellor; and provision for the issue of writs has been made by the 5th Consolidated Order recently made by them.

MR. SEXTON: What I would like to ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman is whether there are 83 places in England and Wales where these writs may be issued, but only one in Ireland; and whether he or the Chief Secretary will call the Lord Lieutenant to a conference with the Judges, so as to ascertain whether new Courts may be established?

MR. MADDEN: I presume the question was considered by the Judges when they framed the Consolidated Rules within the last few months. I have explained that the matter cannot be dealt with by the Executive Government. However, I shall bring the matter under the notice of the Lord Chancellor.

MR. SEXTON: I shall take the earliest opportunity of moving that the City of Belfast should no longer labour under so absurd a difficulty.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Cork): I would ask whether, in addition to the rules of Court, an amendment to the law does not require certain Treasury arrangements for providing the necessary staff?

MR. MADDEN: The matter cannot be dealt with at all except by a majority of the Judges; but, of course, if a majority of the Judges came to the conclusion that there should be a local issue of writs in Belfast, it would, no doubt, be necessary to make provisions to utilise existing offices, or to make other arrangements. The matter, in the first instance, is one for the decision of a majority of the Judges.

LABOURERS' COTTAGES IN ATHLONE.

MR. DONAL SULLIVAN (Westmeath, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that considerable dissatisfaction prevails amongst the labourers of the Athlone Union at the delay in the erection of labourers' cottages in that union; whether any representation on the matter has been made to the Irish Local Government Board; and if he can state how many cottages have been erected by the Poor Law Guardians in Athlone Union since the passing of the Labourers' Act?

*MR. JACKSON: The Local Government Board are not aware of any general dissatisfaction in regard to this matter. No cottages have yet been erected under the Labourers' Act, but a final order was issued on the 23rd of December last providing for the erection in the union of 15 cottages, and the Local Government Board now have under consideration an additional scheme for further cottages.

IMPERIAL TOBACCO CORPORATION OF PERSIA.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs what steps Her Majesty's Government are taking to protect the interests of Major Talbot and other British subjects, shareholders in the Imperial Tobacco Corporation of Persia, and of the employés of that Corporation, who are injured by the refusal of the Persian people to permit of its establishment in Persia, although a considerable sum of money had been paid for the concession given by His Majesty the Shah?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. J. W. LOWTHER, Cumberland, Penrith): Her Majesty's Government are in communication with the Chairman of the Company on the one hand, and with the Persian Government on the other, with a view to proper compensation being given to the Corporation for the abolition of the concession.

MR. C. GRAHAM: May I ask the hon. Gentleman whether Her Majesty's Government propose to force this compensation from the people of Persia after they have refused to allow the monopoly?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER: I have informed the hon. Gentleman that Her Majesty's Government are in communication with the Persian Government with a view to arriving at a satisfactory solution.

MR. C. GRAHAM: What I want to ask the hon. Gentleman is, who is to pay this compensation after the people have refused to establish the monopoly?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER: That I conceive will be a matter for the Persian Government to settle with the Persian people.

MR. C. GRAHAM: Whilst recognising that this is a matter for the Persian Government to settle with the Persian people, I hope that our Government will not commit the infamy of forcing this compensation upon the Persian people. That is what I wish to arrive at.

SMALL ARMS FACTORIES.

MR. C. GRAHAM: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether a "Maxim Lock," which is supplied by contractors to Government at £20, is made at Enfield for about £1; whether a five-barrel Nordenfelt gun, for which contractors charge £338 8s., can be made at Enfield for £120; whether about 20 operatives have been dismissed from Enfield; and whether contracts have been given to Sheffield firm for greatly higher rates than cost price at Enfield; and, if so, will he explain this course has been adopted?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincoln, Horncastle): The Enfield price for Maxim lock cannot be definitely stated as the manufacture is not yet complete, but it will probably be about £6. Contract price was £20. A five-barrel Nordenfelt gun could be made at Enfield, with appliances complete, £135. The contract price was as stated in the question; but it is a pattern which no purchases are now made. More than 20 men have been dismissed from Enfield. The only contract out at Sheffield was for sword-bayonets in 1889, to a firm who were encouraged to take up the trade to avoid our having resort to Germany. The price was 8 per cent. above the then cost of manufacture in the Ordnance factories. I say generally that all these questions point to the satisfactory conclusion that articles are produced more cheaply in Ordnance factories. Of course, this is under their present management, it does not affect the principle which have often laid down, and which House has accepted, that, instead of extending Government factories, much wiser, in the interests of country, to encourage private firms to assist in producing the necessary war material.

CAPTAIN BOWLES (Middlesex, Enfield): I wish to ask whether it is the fact that the establishment at Enfield has been reduced rather than extended?

MR. E. STANHOPE: It has been reduced, but only by a very small number.

MR. HOWARD (Middlesex, Islington): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether arrangements have been recently made to turn out 4,000 rifles per week at the Royal Small Arms Factory, Sparkbrook, instead of 4,000 formerly, whilst the number turned out at the Enfield Small Arms Factory have been reduced from 1,200 to 500 per week; and whether any men have been discharged from the Small Arms Factory.

sparkbrook, during the last two or three weeks, other than fitters, though the numbers at Enfield have been largely increased?

MR. E. STANHOPE: No alteration whatever has been made in the output Sparkbrook, which has always been a small one. On the other hand, the output at Enfield has been very large; and, owing to the reduced orders to be expected next year, some reduction is necessary there, though not to the extent anticipated by my hon. Friend.

BRITISH COLONIES AND THE M'KINLEY TARIFF.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, under the Reciprocity Section of the United States M'Kinley Tariff Act, the Government of President Harrison constrained Her Majesty's Government to grant admission, without Customs duties or any other national, colonial, or municipal charge, to 58 classes of American goods, manufactured and otherwise, and a reduction in other classes, 50 per cent. and 25 per cent. on the duty designated in the respective Colonial tariffs, into the British Colonies of British Guiana, Trinidad, Tobago, Barbadoes, Antigua, Montserrat, St. Christopher, Nevis, Dominica, St. Vincent, and their dependencies; if such remission of duties in the Crown Colonies applies equally to the staple manufacturers of Sheffield and other parts of the British Empire, hitherto taxed from 7 to 10 per cent., and to the natural products of Canada, Newfoundland, and Australia; if the United States will reciprocally give a free market or more favourable terms to similar articles, the production of such British Colonies, than to goods the production of the United Kingdom or other parts of the British Empire; if this fiscal change has met with the approval of the unofficial Members of the Legislative Councils of the several Colonies concerned; if the inhabitants thereof have been or will be consulted as to the levy of the Colonial revenues by direct instead of indirect taxation as heretofore; and if all Papers on the subject will be laid upon the Table?

BARON H. DE WORMS: The Colonies named in the first paragraph of the question have decided to lower or abolish their import duties upon certain articles of food and other goods entering largely into popular consumption. Such remission of duties applies to those articles whatever the country of their origin. There is no question of differential duties in the matter, nor was there any constraint upon Her Majesty's Government, who readily assented to a step in the direction of a policy of reduction of duties upon articles of food, which has been pressed upon the Colonies by successive Secretaries of State, and which had the approval of the unofficial Members of the Legislative Councils of the Colonies concerned. Any taxation required to make good the loss of revenue caused by the remissions to which I have referred has been the subject of Debate in the Legislatures of the Colonies concerned. Papers on the subject have been laid on the Table.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT: I wish to ask whether the American Government have not obtained a remission of the duties on manufactured articles in the West India Islands named?

IRISH MAIIS.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether, in view of the fact that the Great Southern Railway of Ireland and the Midland Great Western Railway of Ireland have refused to carry Her Majesty's mails over their lines from Newcomen Bridge Junction on the Dublin Junction Railway, on the ground that the junction is unsafe, he will inquire into the nature of the alleged danger?

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: The Post Office has not had occasion to make any proposal to the two companies mentioned, but we are expecting to receive from the Loop Line Company a time-table for the through conveyance of the mails. We have heard that the chairmen of the companies named have expressed themselves unfavourably to the use of the line, but as it has only just been passed by the Board of Trade perhaps these objections may be got over. At all events, the Post Office could not intervene in questions of railway engineering and management.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Is it not a fact that owing to the condition of the line the mails are carried from one point to another?

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: Yes, that is so, and we shall be exceedingly glad to avail ourselves of the loop line, so that there may be no break of bulk of the mails between Queenstown and Kingstown.

SCOTCH PRISONS.

MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the Committee of inquiry on Scotch Prisons has reported; and, if so, whether he will lay the Report upon the Table of the House?

SIR JOHN GORST: I am informed that the Committee have not yet presented their Report to the Secretary for Scotland.

MR. CALDWELL: Can the right hon. Gentleman say when it will be presented?

SIR JOHN GORST: No; I think the question must be addressed to my right hon. Friend the Lord Advocate.

THE CONGESTED DISTRICTS BOARD.

MR. CONWAY (Leitrim, N): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that a Sub-Committee has been formed in the Glenanif Electoral Division, scheduled in the Manorhamilton Union, to assist in the working of the Congested Districts Act by the Congested Districts Board; and whether the Congested Districts Board would have any objection to consulting that Committee regarding the steps it proposes taking in that division?

*MR. JACKSON: The Congested Districts Board will give careful consideration to representations or suggestions made by any person connected with the electoral division mentioned, or with any other electoral division in a congested districts county.

THE INDIAN CIVIL SERVICE.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether, notwithstanding the fact that the Despatch of Lord Cross of the 12th September, 1889, recommends certain offices in the Uncovenanted Civil Service of India to be filled exclusively by Indians, an executive order can at any time authorise the introduction of Europeans to any extent to these offices?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. CURZON, Lancashire, Southport): I must refer the hon. Member to the Despatch itself, which is contained in the Blue Book of 1890. The precise nature and number of the applications which will be thrown open to natives of India in the re-organization of the Services is still under consideration, and any unofficial statement that has hitherto appeared upon the subject is premature.

MR. MAC NEILL: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that in the despatch to which he refers me my question was fully borne out? I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India, how many Europeans (including Eurasians), and how many Indians in both the Covenanted and Uncovenanted Civil Services of India were, on the 31st March, 1886, drawing annual salaries of Rs.5,000, and upwards, and what was the proportion at that date of Europeans (including Eurasians) to Indians?

*MR. CURZON: The figures asked for were all given in my answer to a similar question of the hon. Member on Friday, and I can only refer him to that answer.

MR. MAC NEILL: I think the hon. Gentleman is under a mistake. The figures were given collectively, and not individually. I must repeat my question to-morrow.

THE ALLOTMENTS ACT, 1887.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he has, or can procure, the necessary information to enable him to state how many Rural Sanitary Authorities in England and Wales have acquired, by voluntary arrangement under the powers given to them by "The Allotments Act, 1887," any land by purchase or on lease or any other tenancy, and how many acres have been so acquired by each Authority, and how many allotment tenants hold such land as tenants of each Authority?

* PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I am unable to give the information for or without obtaining Returns from us Local Sanitary Authorities. The hon. Gentleman, no doubt, desires to have information as to the total number of allotments provided since the coming of the Act of 1887; but the Return so desired would not give the information sought for, as by far the greater number of allotments have been made by voluntary agreement between owners of land and the labourers. My right hon. Friend the President of the Agricultural Department is considering the desirability of having a Return which will include the information desired by the hon. Gentleman, as well as the particulars of the total number of allotments, and I think, will meet the wishes of the hon. Gentleman.

M. COBB: May I ask the Minister of Agriculture when he thinks that the Return will be ready?

M. CHAPLIN: I am afraid not less than three or four months.

M. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): Coming out of the question of the Member for the Rugby Division, I would ask the President of the Local Government Board if he can see his way to accepting the motion I have put on the Paper for a Return including the Urban Authorities, I have accidentally omitted?

M. RITCHIE: I thought in all probability that what it was desired to do was to obtain information as to the total number of allotments which are in the possession of labourers, and the Return for which my right hon. Friend is considering, I believe, be more acceptable to the hon. Gentleman than the extremely long Return for which he has moved.

M. CHANNING: I would ask the hon. Gentleman whether he is not anxious as we are to obtain information as to the acquisition of land under the specific Act passed for that purpose.

House of Commons?

M. RITCHIE: I attach no importance whatever as to whether or not allotments were provided by the Local Sanitary Authority; but we do attach importance to this, that the allotments should be obtained, and I point out to the hon. Gentleman the object of the Allotments Act was to provide machinery for obtaining them, if owners of land could not themselves enter into voluntary arrangement with the labourers who desired to have them.

M. CHANNING: Do I understand that the form of Return I have moved for is definitely refused by Her Majesty's Government?

* M. RITCHIE: I shall be very glad to have some conversation with the hon. Gentleman on the subject; but considering that that would be a very partial Return, I am pointing out that it would by no means show the operation of the Act of 1887.

M. COBB: Let me quite understand. Will the right hon. Gentleman, before the Return of the Minister of Agriculture, which will take three or four months, is produced, give us a smaller Return of the number of allotments acquired under the Act, not compulsorily, but voluntarily since 1887?

* M. RITCHIE: The answer to the question of the hon. Gentleman is covered by my reply to the hon. Member for Northamptonshire.

THE DEATH OF JAMES CHOULES.

M. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is now able to lay upon the Table the Report of Major Marindin, and the Correspondence with the Midland and South Western Railway Company, relating to the death of James Choules, who was killed on the 16th of October last?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I am still in communication with the Company, whom I have asked for certain Returns which I think will insure a proper understanding of the matter, and I hope no great delay will take place in laying the Report and Correspondence on the Table.

M. CHANNING: May I ask whether it is proposed to lay the Papers before the Select Committee on Railway Hours?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Certainly: they will be laid on the Table, and the Committee will have them.

OVERCROWDING ON RAILWAYS.

M. J. WILSON (Lanark, Govan): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade what power, if any, the Board of Trade possesses to restrain Railway Companies from overcrowding their first and second class carriages with passengers who pay only third class fare?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: The only statutory provision which, as far as I am aware, deals with the matter referred to by the hon. Member is contained in a byelaw applicable to all Railway Companies which enacts that—

"Any passenger persisting in entering a carriage or compartment of a carriage containing the full number of persons which it is constructed to convey, when any such person objects to his so entering the carriage or compartment, is hereby subjected to a penalty not exceeding 40s."

It would not, however, be the duty of the Board of Trade to prosecute in such a case.

THE TUBERCULOSIS COMMISSION.

MR. PARKER SMITH (Lanark, Partick): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if he can say when the Commission appointed to inquire into the question of tuberculosis will be prepared to report?

MR. RITCHIE: I have not yet received the information for which I have asked on this subject. As soon as I receive it I shall be happy to reply to the Question.

CASE OF CRUELTY AT HELSTON.

MR. NORRIS (Tower Hamlets, Limehouse): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his attention has been directed to a case of cruelty at Helston, in Cornwall, where, as reported, a Mrs. Elizabeth Rowe was charged and found guilty of very gross ill-treatment to her step-daughter, consisting of strapping her to a beam, beating her with a whip, and other cruelties, and for which the only penalty inflicted by the local Magistrate was a fine of £10; and if he will state whether any further proceedings can be taken in the matter?

MR. MATTHEWS: Yes, Sir; I have received a Report from the Magistrate's clerk referring to this case. It appears that the defendant was convicted of beating her step-daughter, and that, inasmuch as she elected to be dealt with summarily, the Magistrate fined her £10 and costs, or in default two months' imprisonment with hard labour, and he ordered the custody of the girl to be given to her uncle. I am informed that the Court would have inflicted a s punishment had they been satisfied the other acts of cruelty which alleged had, in fact, been practised the girl. The law does not admit further proceedings being taken matter.

THE WASHINGTON MARITIME CONFERENCE.

MR. GOURLEY (Sunderland): to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether any and what progress has been made with regard to the recommendations of the Washington national Maritime Conference?

*SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Many of the recommendations of Washington Maritime Conference already provided for by British International Regulation, and with regard to such as the Rule of the Road at Sea, International Code of Signals, and Load Line, I am still in communication with Foreign Governments. The suggestion of a uniform classification of lights under the consideration of the General Lighthouse Authorities, and I already presented to Parliament a Report of the Committee I appointed to advise upon the efficient bulkhead ships, and this Report is now being considered by the Board of Trade. With regard to the recommendations of the Conference on the subject of a "uniform system of Buoys and Beacons" a Conference has recently been held, at the Trinity House, the Presidency of H.R.H. the Duke of Edinburgh, to deliberate upon the proposals made at Washington, and to advise the Board of Trade what steps Britain should take in regard thereto. That Conference has made its recommendations which I propose to lay on the Table at an early date. The recommendations contained in it have been communicated to the Foreign Governments represented at Washington.

HAULBOWLINE DOCK.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Midleton): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if the channel excavated by the floating dock at Haulbowline a deep water river channel is now passable, and, if so, what is the greatest height there obtainable at ordinary high water for permitting the passage of whether it is now possible to dock any first-class armoured vessel; if it is true that leakage still occurs into the dry dock in Haulbowline Dockyard; what has been the total amount of money spent upon the construction and the equipment of this dockyard; and what is the character of the dockyard work for which this yard has been built?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: The channel between the dock at Haulbowline and the deep water river channel is clear, and the depth obtainable at ordinary high water spring tides is not less than 26 feet 9 inches. This will allow all but the heaviest ironclads to be docked. At high water neap (or low) tides the depth of water would be 2 feet 6 inches less, or 24 feet 3 inches. The dolphins now being erected at the entrance of the channel will be completed by 31st March, and additional dredging will then be carried out. Water still leaks into the dry dock, but there is nothing unusual in this, as leakage occurs in every dock of the same kind. The total expenditure upon works in this dockyard up to the present time has been about £611,900, including £8,900 for machinery. The character of the work for which the dockyard has been established is primarily the repair of Her Majesty's ships in an emergency.

DR. TANNER: May I ask the noble Lord whether it is not the fact that, having in view the statement of the First Lord of the Admiralty in 1875, that Haulbowline Dock was to be used for the construction of ships, the present Government are going back upon the undertaking given by a late Conservative Administration, and that this yard is to be used, according to the Civil Lord of the Admiralty, merely for the repair of gun-boats?

LORD G. HAMILTON: No; I never understood that a pledge was given to make this a building yard, and it certainly has not been so constructed.

DR. TANNER: I would call the attention of the noble Lord to a statement made by the First Lord of the Admiralty in 1875, in reply to a question addressed to him from these Benches.

STATE PENSIONS.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if, having regard to the statements laid before the country of the extent of old age pauperism among the industrial classes, and to the circumstance that the Committee on National Provident Insurance, presided over by the hon. Baronet the Member for Wigtownshire, was "practically narrowed into an examination of one particular scheme, that formulated by Canon Blackley," the Government will assent to the early appointment of a Royal Commission or Select Committee to ascertain the facts, and the best means of remedying the evil, and enabling the thrifty to secure State guaranteed pensions in old age upon easy terms, through friendly societies or otherwise?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): In answer to my hon. Friend, I have to say that although it is true that Canon Blackley's scheme of national insurance was the only one examined very minutely by the Committee named in the question, because it appeared to be the only one worked out in sufficient detail to make the examination necessary, the Committee collected a vast amount of information that would have to be taken into account in the consideration of any scheme that might be presented to the public. I do not think it will be expedient to appoint a Select Committee, which would have to traverse the ground already traversed by the Committee which sat two years ago.

THE SAVINGS BANK ACT, 1891.

MR. JOHN ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will lay upon the Table for distribution the scheme of appointment of an Inspection Committee under "The Savings Banks Act, 1891," and append thereto the names of the members appointed?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I shall be very glad to comply with the hon. Member's suggestion.

IRREGULARITIES IN THE POST OFFICE.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): I beg to ask the Postmaster General can he state the number of postal officials dismissed for irregularities last year; the number sent for trial and convicted; what guarantee for honesty is exacted from postal officials in this country; and whether he has copies of the guarantees demanded from postal employés against dishonesty by Indian and Australian Governments?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: The number of postal officials dismissed for irregularities last year was 227. The offences included drunkenness, insubordination, and persistent neglect of duty, as well as acts of fraud. The number sent for trial and convicted was 60. These numbers, out of a total employed of 117,989, amount to about 1 in 520. The guarantees for honesty enacted from Post Office servants are bonds of an approved guarantee society or of private sureties. The Post Office is not in possession of the guarantees used by Indian and Australian Governments. I should like to add that while the proportion of dishonest persons in the service of the Post Office is shown to be very small, I have seen with concern the number of cases which have occurred, and I have taken some steps, and I have others in contemplation, whereby the opportunities and temptations to dishonesty may be diminished.

INSUFFICIENTLY STAMPED LETTERS.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether his attention has been called to the high charge or fine, often amounting to double the deficiency, imposed on the recipients of letters insufficiently stamped; and whether he has made any recommendation to the Treasury on the subject?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: Letters unpaid or insufficiently prepaid are, not in this country alone, but throughout the Postal Union, subject to a charge upon delivery equal to double the deficiency. It is not quite accurate to call the whole of this charge a "fine," as one-half of it represents postage which the sender has omitted to pay. There has been no recommendation to the Treasury on the subject.

HAROLD'S CROSS POST OFFICE.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE (Dublin Co., S.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he is aware that the recent closing of the Harold's Cross Post Office has resulted in great inconvenience to the neighbourhood, and how soon the office is likely to be re-opened?

Mr. Henniker Heaton

SIR J. FERGUSSON: The su master of Harold's Cross (Dubl signed on the 15th ultimo, a necessary steps for the revision salary were at once taken, as well finding a suitable successor. The will be re-opened as soon as the n pointment has been made, but I say how soon that will be.

IRISH RECEIVERSHIPS.

MR. BLANE (Armagh, S.): to ask the Attorney General for I whether his attention has been dr the fact that Captain O'Conor, Palace, Elphin, and now a director Freeman's Journal, limited, is de as a receiver under the Land Jud a book compiled and edited by Mr den, Q.C., and another member Irish Bar; whether Captain O has been appointed to this office whether the practice in such mat for the person desiring to be app to send in a notification of his willi to act?

MR. MADDEN: I am informe the gentleman mentioned in the tion was entered on the Judges' 1889 as suitable for the appointm Receiver, but has not been appoin to this date. I am also informed is not necessary for a gentleman name is on the list to send in a sation.

MR. BLANE: Did this gent apply for the situation himself?

MR. MADDEN: It is inaccurately described as a "situation." The places on the list certain gen whom he considers suitable to act. not necessary that any application be sent in by the gentlemen so and the gentleman whose name is tioned in the question, as a matter of fact, has not been put in charge particular office.

FOOT-AND-MOUTH DISEASE.

MR. DARLING (Deptford): I be permitted to draw the atten the President of the Board of A ture to a question of which I have notice with reference to the outbreak foot-and-mouth disease, inquiring w he has seen the resolution of the Chamber of Agriculture, recomme that cattle should only be allowed landed in this country at the animals wharf for immediate slaughter; and if, in view of the serious outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease which has already taken place, he is prepared to act upon that suggestion?

COLONEL DAWNAY (York, N.R., Thirsk): I beg to ask the Minister of Agriculture whether it is true that the recent outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease was brought into this country in a cargo of raw hides landed at Harwich from a German port and whether steps are being taken to prevent the importation of raw hides from infected countries?

MR. CHAPLIN: In reply to the last question of my hon. and gallant Friend, I can only say that so far as I know there is not the slightest foundation for the rumour to which he has alluded. I have not therefore taken any steps at present to prohibit the importation of raw hides, and, so far as I can learn, they are imported under conditions that almost preclude the risk of infection. But the question is now under my consideration, and if I am satisfied that there is any danger whatever to be apprehended from the importation of raw hides their importation will be prohibited immediately. The question of my hon. Friend the Member for Deptford (Mr. Darling) divides itself into two parts. In a notice which I have just received from him he asks me if it is true that the Board of Agriculture has agreed to allow cattle within the Metropolitan area to be removed from licensed premises to be slaughtered within two days. Well, Sir, no order that I am aware of to that effect has been issued by the Board. I have had to consider a great number of orders within the last few days, but I am unable to charge my memory with any such order. But I have been informed within the last few minutes, since I came into the House, that the London County Council have passed an order empowering their veterinary inspectors to grant licences for the removal of fat cows from cowsheds, from which their removal would be otherwise prohibited, to be slaughtered within two days. If I may be allowed to do so, I should like to take this opportunity of offering one word of caution against some statements which have appeared in the Press on this subject. I noticed yesterday an article in a Sunday paper calculated to excite grave alarm in the minds of the agricultural community, the greater part of which, so far as I know, was entirely without foundation.

MR. DARLING: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered the question I asked. It was, whether he had seen the recommendation of the Bucks Chamber of Agriculture, that cattle should not be allowed to be landed at all in this country except at the foreign animals wharf for immediate slaughter, and whether he is prepared to act on that recommendation?

MR. CHAPLIN: I beg the pardon of my hon. Friend, but I had forgotten that part of his question. I have not received any official intimation of that resolution, but I have seen it, and what I have to say at present upon the question of imposing any further restrictions upon the extremely limited number of animals still allowed to be imported from the Continent of Europe is, that it is a proceeding which ought not to be taken except upon serious consideration, and I do not think it is a question which I ought to be asked to decide at a moment's notice.

THE DEATH OF MARY HELEN MONTAGU.

MR. P. O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to an inquest, held on the 15th inst., touching the death of Mary Helen Montagu, aged three years, daughter of Robert Acheson Cromie Montagu, J.P., Portstewart, Coleraine, Ireland, in which the Coroner's jury returned the following verdict:—

"That the deceased, Mary Helen Montagu, died from asphyxia. We further say that Annie Margaret Montagu did feloniously kill and slay the said Mary Helen Montagu by binding her body with a stocking, and fastening her when thus tied by a cord to a ring in a dark room at Cronmore House, townland of Ballyleas, and parish of Agherton, on the 13th day of February, 1892;"

whether he is aware that Mrs. Montagu acknowledged on oath before the Coroner that she bound the arms and limbs of her child, and caused its death by hanging, as set out in the verdict; that Mrs. Montagu was returned for trial to the Assizes, and bail accepted for her appearance; and that she has since left the country to evade trial; what were the reasons why the police did not arrest Mrs. Montagu, and proceed by depositions before a Magistrate; and whether he proposes to take any, and what, action to investigate the conduct of the police authorities in the matter?

*MR. JACKSON: The woman was arrested by the police, and dealt with by the Magistrates in Petty Sessions, and committed for trial.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: That is no answer to my question. Why did the police not arrest her till a week after the offence, and, also, does the right hon. Gentleman intend to take any notice of the conduct of the police?

MR. JACKSON: There is no necessity for such action. No irregularity has taken place.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

SIR GEORGE O. TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): I should like to ask the First Lord of the Treasury after what hour he will not take the Bill for the application and distribution of the grant to Scotland, and also whether he has noticed that the Scotch Bill has been moved from the first place on the Paper, and there are now two other Bills in front of it, and if he will take into consideration the convenience of Scotch Members in the matter?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I thought the Scotch Members would have preferred discussing the Bill when they have it in their hands. This is a matter on which there has been much discussion among Members in all parts of the House, and the proposals which my right hon. and learned Friend will lay before the House are of great interest; and I hope the right hon. Gentleman will not resist the Bill being read a first time to-night, as the sooner it is read a first time the sooner it will be printed and in the hands of Members.

SIR GEORGE TREVELYAN: Can the right hon. Gentleman give me an hour after which the Bill will not be taken?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It will not be taken after half-past 11 o'clock. If it be taken by that time, it will give ample time for my right hon. Friend to explain the Bill to the House.

MR. J. DILLON (Mayo, E.): May I ask when the First Lord of the Treasury will make a general statement as to the business during the next few days; and when the Irish Estimates will be as this would be for the convening of Irish Members?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I hope on Thursday next if we are able to trust we shall be, to introduce the Scotch Bill which is put down on to-night, we shall take the Supply Estimates; and if they are got through as I think they might be, in the course of the evening on Monday next, we shall take the Indian Councils Bill which comes down from the Lords which is very urgently required and which will no doubt require some discussion. As the hon. Member there will be a good deal of business to get through at this time of the year, the Bill, other than the Indian, which I desire to press forward first, will be introduced first by my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture.

MR. DILLON: May I ask the hon. Gentleman if he will, on Tuesday or Monday, make a more general statement as to the course of business especially in regard to the Irish Estimates? It would be a great convenience to Irish Members.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: On Tuesday

THE COUNT OUT.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, C.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, in regard to the count of Friday, whether the first Order of Supply was the introduction of the Education and Local Taxation (Scotland) Bill? What I wish to know is whether he is not aware that the principle laid down by successive Ministers of the House—Lord Palmerston, Mr. Gladstone, and the late Mr. Disraeli—was that it was the duty of the Government to keep a House open at night, and I will ask why the Government allowed the House to be closed out at a quarter before 8 when they had enough of their supporters in a House, and when their own Bill of such importance to Scotland and Ireland, as the Private Bill Private Bill stood next on the Paper, had the chance of getting them on at that hour in the evening?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Gentleman has put to me a particular question and a general question. The particular one is, why on last and other sources of information, we can make some generalizations about the nature of the system. First, there is no evidence of a single dominant mechanism of control. In fact, it appears that the system is controlled by a number of different mechanisms, each with its own set of characteristics.

The first mechanism is the control of the system by the environment. This is evident in the fact that the system is highly dependent on the environment for its survival. It is also evident in the fact that the system is highly sensitive to changes in the environment. For example, if the environment changes, the system will change in response to the change. This is a general characteristic of all systems, and it is particularly true of biological systems.

The second mechanism is the control of the system by the internal dynamics of the system itself. This is evident in the fact that the system has a certain degree of autonomy, and it is able to make decisions based on its own internal logic.

The third mechanism is the control of the system by external factors, such as other systems or external events. This is evident in the fact that the system is highly sensitive to external factors, and it is able to respond to them in a variety of ways.

The fourth mechanism is the control of the system by internal factors, such as internal processes or internal events. This is evident in the fact that the system has a certain degree of autonomy, and it is able to make decisions based on its own internal logic. This is a general characteristic of all systems, and it is particularly true of biological systems.

The fifth mechanism is the control of the system by external factors, such as other systems or external events. This is evident in the fact that the system is highly sensitive to external factors, and it is able to respond to them in a variety of ways. This is a general characteristic of all systems, and it is particularly true of biological systems.

It is clear from this analysis that the system is controlled by a number of different mechanisms, each with its own set of characteristics. The system is highly dependent on the environment for its survival, and it is highly sensitive to changes in the environment. The system is also highly sensitive to external factors, such as other systems or external events. The system is also highly sensitive to internal factors, such as internal processes or internal events. The system is also highly sensitive to internal factors, such as internal processes or internal events.

It is also clear from this analysis that the system is highly dependent on the environment for its survival, and it is highly sensitive to changes in the environment. The system is also highly sensitive to external factors, such as other systems or external events. The system is also highly sensitive to internal factors, such as internal processes or internal events. The system is also highly sensitive to internal factors, such as internal processes or internal events.

It is also clear from this analysis that the system is highly dependent on the environment for its survival, and it is highly sensitive to changes in the environment. The system is also highly sensitive to external factors, such as other systems or external events. The system is also highly sensitive to internal factors, such as internal processes or internal events.

It is also clear from this analysis that the system is highly dependent on the environment for its survival, and it is highly sensitive to changes in the environment. The system is also highly sensitive to external factors, such as other systems or external events. The system is also highly sensitive to internal factors, such as internal processes or internal events.

It is also clear from this analysis that the system is highly dependent on the environment for its survival, and it is highly sensitive to changes in the environment. The system is also highly sensitive to external factors, such as other systems or external events. The system is also highly sensitive to internal factors, such as internal processes or internal events.

THE CONCLUSION

In conclusion, the system is controlled by a number of different mechanisms, each with its own set of characteristics. The system is highly dependent on the environment for its survival, and it is highly sensitive to changes in the environment. The system is also highly sensitive to external factors, such as other systems or external events. The system is also highly sensitive to internal factors, such as internal processes or internal events.

I said that I hoped to have it printed in the first half of this week, by Thursday at latest, and I trust before.

SMALL AGRICULTURAL HOLDINGS BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): Mr. Speaker, it now becomes my duty to submit to the House the proposals of the Government for giving effect to the paragraph in the Gracious Speech from the Throne which referred to the question of small holdings of land in the agricultural districts of the country, and I commence by saying this at once, that the proposals I am about to make being, as I believe they are, entirely novel to our legislation, must be necessarily of a somewhat tentative character, and the Bill I shall lay on the Table, if the House approve is more or less of the nature of an experiment, which the Government have decided, after full consideration, that it is right and expedient to make. One of the chief objects which we have in view is a wider distribution of the land among the people of this country; to bring back upon the soil, if it be possible by legislation—I had almost said to re-create, if I may use the term—a class of the community which has been gradually dwindling for many years, and which is now rapidly becoming extinct, but which, at the same time, we must remember, existed, and not only existed, but flourished, in former days in far greater numbers than is the case at present, and which I am persuaded that all sections of the House would desire, if possible, to see maintained. I am speaking now, Sir, of the class which used to be described as yeomen, or, in other words, the owners of small properties in land. That is an object which must thoroughly commend itself not only to gentlemen sitting on this side, but also to gentlemen sitting on that side of the House, and which is most thoroughly in accord with all the traditions of the Party to which they belong. Indeed, I think, Sir, I have only to mention the name of Mr. Bright, whose views on this subject were so well and so widely known, and which he has so often defended with his unrivalled eloquence in this House, to carry the unanimous assent of hon. Gentlemen opposite in the assertion I make. Sir, I cannot doubt that, whatever may be thought of the means which I shall propose to-night in order to give effect to our views, all Parties in the House will agree that the object is one which is deserving of support, and that the experiment which we propose is one which it is desirable to make. Among other reasons which have guided us in our decision, I will begin by mentioning to the House one in particular. No one who is well acquainted with the agricultural districts of the country can fail to be aware of the constant migration of the rural population from the country to the towns, which has been so prominent and so unwelcome a feature of the rural situation during the last few years, and which I am afraid is still progressing, and perhaps at an ever-accelerated pace, to-day. There are various reasons which may possibly account for it. For instance, there is the great increase of education, which of late years has taken place in the country districts as well as in the towns, and which many people think has given rise to a growing distaste for actual labour on the soil, especially when that labour is employed under conditions which, in the opinion of the workers themselves, gives no sufficient opening for the improvement of their lot and their position in the future, especially when old age begins to advance upon them. Again, Sir, there are the higher wages which can be so easily obtained for labour in the towns, and the generally greater attractions which are offered to the life of the labouring man who dwells in the city as compared with the life of the man who lives upon the land. And, thirdly, there is the great and constantly increasing demand for active and intelligent labour in numerous walks of life, such as on railways, in the Police Force of the country, and various other works, which will readily occur to hon. Members, which are all eagerly sought for by the youngest and smartest members of the rural population, and which, not unnaturally, I am bound to say, I think they infinitely prefer to the comparative dullness and drudgery of the labours in which they are engaged in the country. These are all causes which it seems to me, at all events, may partly account for the tendency which, in my humble judgment, is nothing but an evil to all parties whom it concerns. It is bad for the labourers themselves, because they constantly take their labour to markets which they find already congested, and where they can only obtain work by reducing the wages of their fellow-workmen, or, as only too commonly happens, they fail to find employment at all. It is bad for the owners and occupiers of land, and for the land itself, which constantly suffers from the want of sufficient labour being employed on it: and it is bad for the community at large, because of the lesser amount of produce which the land yields. And that, Sir, being so, the question naturally arises whether there is nothing which can be done, whether there is not something that we can do by legislation to aid in arresting a process which is so injurious to all? Well, Sir, the Government think that there is, and that one of the measures which is likely to have some effect, and probably considerable effect, in this direction, is to afford to the rural population, whose labour at the present time, apart from their wages, is spent on the land directly in the interests and for the profit of others, some greater facilities than they enjoy at present for sometimes working on the land in their own interest, and for the profit of themselves. We believe that in doing this we shall be taking a step which is not only in the interests of the labourers, but greatly also in the interests of the farmers as well, and I say so for his reason. The greatest danger I see ahead for the farmers of this country, and the agricultural interest generally, at the present moment, is not so much the increase of foreign competition, of which I think myself—although I speak on this subject in most guarded accents—we may, perhaps, have seen the worst, not so much in a future fall in the prices of agricultural produce, but in the great and growing difficulty of finding sufficient labour for the effective cultivation of the land; and in anything we can do in this respect to lessen and remove that difficulty and so retain the labour on the land, I believe we shall be conferring on the farmers of this country one of the greatest benefits in our power. For, in the first place, what I wish to point out is this—in the case of men who occupy small holdings, who may be the future occupants of small holdings—it does not necessarily follow that the whole of their time will be engaged; on the contrary, I believe there will always be times and seasons when part of their labour will be available for service on the larger farms in the vicinity. And, in the second place, the mere possibility of being able to obtain for himself, by his own industry and thrift in the future, a small holding for his own purposes will, I believe, be no small inducement to the younger labourers to remain in the country in far greater numbers than they do at present. Well, Sir, there is another reason which has always had considerable weight with me. So far as I can observe, there is a widespread and general desire that at least the experiment should be tried. I am sure it is the case—and I am speaking from my own personal knowledge—among the labourers themselves, although I believe it to be of comparatively recent growth. It is very natural and very easily explained, and I attribute it to two causes: In the first place, the lower wages which in the past few years they have been in the habit of receiving since the agricultural depression has weighed so heavily on the farmers, and there is also the almost constant want of employment to which they have always been subject in recent years, especially in the winter months, the very time when good and regular employment is of more importance to them than at any other; and, secondly, Mr. Speaker, I attribute it to the great increase in the number of allotments which has followed the passing of the Acts which became law a year or two ago. I know perfectly well that it is a regular Party shibboleth on that side of the House, that the Allotments Acts passed by the present Government have been shams and failures, and especially on country platforms. A right hon. Gentleman on that Bench made that statement not many nights ago, not on a country platform, but on a platform in one of the City constituencies. What I have to say on that point is that these gentlemen know as well as I know—and if they do not know they ought to—that they are absolutely contradicted by the facts. Those Acts have had precisely the effect that I always hoped and expected they would have. They have been the means, either directly or indirectly, of providing allotments for thousands and thousands of labouring men throughout all parts of England who never knew what it was to have the enjoyment of allotments before; and what is more, in the great majority of cases, they have attained it by what I have always maintained, and always shall maintain, to be the easiest and the most convenient mode, namely, by friendly and voluntary arrangements with the owners of the land. I know scores of instances which have come under my notice during the present year where men with a single acre for an allotment, or sometimes with even less, have been able to make a profit out of the land for themselves of sums which ranged, as I am told on very good authority, from £5 to £8, and where in one case, I am informed, of as much as £10 in the year; and having been so extremely successful with their small allotments, and having had this experience of the profits which they can make from little plots of land, they are naturally anxious to see what they can do with more. How far they are right in the desire to exchange a small plot for a holding of a larger and different description remains to be proved. I never had a doubt upon the question of allotments. I knew, I was always certain, that it could only be an unmixed good for the rural population; but no one can speak with equal certainty upon the question of small holdings. There is a wide and a clear distinction between them. Neither capital nor buildings are required in the case of allotments, except in the case of the pig-sty, which generally goes with the cottage; but it is these very questions of capital and buildings which constitute our chief difficulty in dealing satisfactorily with the question of small holdings. As to the cultivation of the holdings—I judge from what I have seen of their allotments—I have not slightest misgiving whatever; and in dairy countries, with which I am best acquainted, to say I am not altogether so acquainted as I am with other agricultural parts of the country—there, I understand, all the information which reaches me, the system of small holdings has already been established and proved to success. Sir, it is a very common thing in districts where there are numerous allotments, to give prizes for the best—those which are cultivated the best—it is usual from among the large farms in the neighbourhood that the Judge selected—and many a large farmer, of whom I know well, have told me they have been perfectly astonished to see the admirable manner in which land was cultivated. Well, I venture to think that is very encouraging to those who are seeking to bring about an extension of this operation upon a wider and a broader scale; and I think the House will agree with me in this, that it is clearly true that if a man has been eminently successful in the cultivation of one acre of land, it is a fair reasonable presumption that he is likely to be successful in the cultivation of more. I frankly own that I arrive at this opinion in the light of new experience that I was formerly opposed to attempting to establish by law a system of small holdings; and further, I had no belief at all in the probability of success of any such system; and I am bound to say that the opportunity which I have had in former years of seeing the results of that system in counties where it is already established were more than ample warrant, more than ample justification for this opinion. I remember visiting a district in the north east part of the county which I represent, and that many years ago—a district which was cultivated entirely under such a system I do not remember exactly, but I think it must have been some 10 or 15 years ago; at all events, it was at a time when agricultural depression was at its highest—some three or four years ago; it had commenced—and I am bound to say this, that a more lamentable, a more deplorable spectacle of agricultural disaster it never was my misfortune to witness.

to witness. It made a deep impression upon me at the time, and that impression was confirmed by the evidence which was received by the Richmond Commission. But I am inclined to believe—indeed, I am confident from inquiries which I subsequently made, and from inquiries which I have more recently thought it my duty to make—that in one respect, at all events, we were at that time very insufficiently informed. We did not realise at all—it was not put before us; I do not know if even the information was attainable, because upon that point the people were most reticent themselves—we did not realise at all the extravagant prices which had been given for the land. The holdings of which I am speaking were acquired at a time when the prices of agricultural produce were probably at their highest; when the condition of agriculture in consequence was one of great prosperity; when the tendency of land was to continually increase in value, and when it was sought for, and eagerly bought by the population of those districts at prices which, in relation to its present value, would be twice and sometimes three times as much as it was worth. Consequently, when the bad times came—commencing as they did with a succession of two or three of the worst seasons in the memory of man, and followed by a sudden and almost unparalleled fall in the price of agricultural produce—these poor people, over whose farms I walked myself, and whose condition I had every opportunity of seeing, were ruined, one after another, in hundreds of cases. I am informed, however, that a large amount of the land in those districts since those days has changed hands again, and of course at greatly reduced price; and where that has been the case, where that has been done, there I understand the cultivation of these holdings has been carried on, and is being carried on to-day, with very different results. That being so, and in view of the greatly altered circumstances of the times, of the greatly reduced price at which land can be obtained at present; and lastly, but not least, in view of the admirable cultivation of numbers of allotments by the labouring population in the counties, I have come to the deliberate conclusion that there is no reason whatever at the present time why, even upon economic grounds, the experiment may not be tried with a fair and reasonable prospect of success; and as to its advantages upon social grounds, I hardly think there will be any difference of opinion. Now, Sir, having stated the general views of the Government upon this question, I think the House will probably be anxious to know something as to the means by which we propose to carry them into effect; and I will endeavour, as briefly and as clearly as I can, to explain to the House the provisions of the Bill which I propose to lay upon the Table of the House to-night. The scheme of the Bill, generally speaking, is as follows:—The Public Works Loan Commissioners, that is to say, the State, are empowered to lend at a rate of interest that is not to exceed  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent., and the Local Authority are empowered, either from them or elsewhere, if they prefer it, to borrow money in order to acquire land for the purpose of providing small holdings for persons who are resident in the county in which the land is acquired, and who will themselves cultivate the holdings. But, in view of the fact that this is avowedly an experiment, we have thought it right to proceed with due caution in the first instance; and following the recommendation of the Select Committee on Small Holdings upon this point, we limit the borrowing powers of the Local Authority as follows:—The amount to be borrowed is not to exceed a sum which would involve a charge upon the rates, exceeding for any one year one penny in the pound. It will naturally be asked, what is a small holding? And a small holding as defined in the Bill means this: it means land which is suitable for agriculture, and exceeds an acre, and either does not exceed 50 acres or is of an annual value not exceeding £50. The Local Authority being the instrument for giving effect to our scheme, we have had to consider upon what area it will be that the charge upon the rates should be levied. The House is aware there is more than one Local Authority in existence at present. But although we hope, and we confidently expect while we remain a Government, to carry proposals in the future, for the provisions both of District Councils and also of Parochial Reform, yet, unfortunately, it is the case, that we have only one popularly elected body at present, and that is the County Council.

Now, the House is aware that as regards allotments there is precedent for the acquisition of land by the Guardians, and for the management of the land by Parish Authorities. But although I have adopted, as the House will see directly, some of the provisions which are afforded by this precedent, I have not adopted them entirely, and I have abstained from doing so for this reason—I have made some calculations as to what the borrowing powers at the rate of 1d. in the £1 will impose, and this investigation has made it quite clear that in the case of parishes it would absolutely be beyond their power, and even in the case of Unions I doubt if their resources would be anything like adequate for the purpose. In view, therefore, of these considerations, and also of the fact that the County Council is the only elected body at the present time, we have come to the conclusion that the County Council is the proper and fitting authority for the purpose of acquiring land to be devoted to small holdings. And I may mention that the amount which the rate of 1d. in the £1 would produce in England and Scotland on the County Rate, exclusive of London and of the county boroughs, would in round numbers, roughly speaking, amount to something like £10,000,000. The County Council having been invested with these powers, the next thing to consider was the means of putting them in motion, and accordingly it is provided in the Bill that every County Council, not being a Council of a borough, who may do so if they please, shall appoint a committee for the purpose of putting the Act into operation; and, secondly, upon a petition being presented by one or more county electors, upon reasonable and bona fide grounds the committee shall cause inquiry to be made, who shall report the result of their inquiry to the Council. Assuming that the report of the committee is in favour of the petition, the next stage in the process is the acquisition of the land. How is it to be acquired? Is it to be by purchase? Is it to be by hire? Or is it to be by both? I grant that this is a question which is deserving of very careful consideration; and I own I was much taken at first sight by a proposal made during the Recess by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian—namely, that the Local Authorities, in addition to powers to buy the land, should have power to take it upon hire as well. But on looking more carefully into this proposal I found that there were numerous objections, which prevented my adopting it in the Bill. In the first place, the House will see at once that if the land was only hired by the County Council it could not be sold, and that would have been contrary to all the evidence and to all the recommendations of the Select Committee on Small Holdings, all of which went to show that ownership was preferable to tenancy. In the second place, you would at once convert the Local Authority into a middleman, an institution which has always been regarded as exceedingly objectionable, and which I think there is no reason whatever to revive. In the third place, if you make the Local Authority into a landlord the risk would be far greater to the ratepayers, and the Local Authorities must take all the chances and all the vicissitudes of the position of a landlord. For instance, in bad times, the first thing that would happen would be this, that the Local Authority would be subjected to great pressure to reduce the rents. But this could only be done at the cost of the ratepayers. On the other hand, if the reduction were refused they would at once become the most unpopular landlords in the world. Fourthly, it would add very much to the difficulty of providing buildings, a difficulty, in my opinion, which is quite sufficient already. And, lastly, it would defeat what I have already described to the House as one of the main objects of the Bill, which is to add to the number of owners of land. We had, therefore, no hesitation in deciding that the land should be acquired by purchase by the Local Authority, and we also attach this condition to the purchase, namely, that the price to be given is not to exceed what they would reasonably expect to receive for it themselves including expenses when the land is again disposed of for small holdings. We have also considered whether the land should be acquired by agreement only or by compulsory provisions being included in the Bill. Now, I am aware that there are ample precedents in our legislation already for the acquisition of land by compulsion for public purposes; but then I am distinctly of opinion that compulsion ought not to be resorted to unless it is clearly shown that

It is necessary, and that the object cannot be obtained without it. But there is no such proof in this case; on the contrary, all the evidence that we have before us points in exactly the opposite direction. There never was a time when there was so much land in the market as there is at present. There are thousands of acres in every direction of the country which owners are only too anxious to get rid of, and only too anxious and willing to sell if they can only find purchasers for the land, and certainly the enormous increase which we have witnessed during the last few years in the number of allotments, most of them acquired by voluntary means, shows that there is no unwillingness on the part of the owners to find the land necessary for these purposes. Moreover, this question was carefully examined by the Select Committee on Small Holdings, and, with the permission of the House, as I know that in some quarters this is regarded as an important point, I will read the following passage from their Report:—

"Your Committee having given full consideration to the arguments upon both sides, have resolved not to recommend compulsory power. They feel that any scheme adopted now must necessarily be tentative, and they are convinced that enough land will be attainable by voluntary agreement to ensure a fair trial for this experiment. They do not think it desirable to alarm landowners by a provision which is unnecessary, and which is not likely at any time to be largely availed of."

I am quite aware that that recommendation of the Committee was not arrived at by a unanimous vote. I find, on referring to the proceedings, that it was arrived at by a majority of 7 to 4; that, later on, they repeated it, and we have no hesitation whatever in adopting, upon this point, the recommendation of that Committee. The House will perceive that we have reached the stage when the Local Authority has become the owner of land, and the next provision is this, that, having bought it, they may then adapt it, by fencing, or whatever means may be most convenient, for the purpose of small holdings—they are then to offer it for sale under the rules laid down in the Bill. If a sale be effected the purchase is to be completed in the course of a month from the time of sale, and upon the completion of the purchase one-fourth of the purchase money is to be paid down at once. That I regard as a very important provision. In the first place, it gives security at once to the Local Authorities; in the second place, it insures that the man who is able to pay down one-fourth of the purchase money is, in all probability, a man who has been careful, who has been saving, who has been thrifty, and who, therefore, deserves to be encouraged, and who is likely to do well; and, in the next place, it excludes the idle and the worthless who, probably, without this provision, would be the first to make an experiment under the Act. In regard to the remainder of the purchase money; another fourth may be secured by a perpetual rent-charge redeemable at will; and the remaining half is to be paid by instalments, or by terminable annuities, within 50 years, the purchaser being at liberty to pay off the whole of the debt at any time he wishes to do so. So far, although we have been able to make provision for the man who has been able to put by some savings of his own, little has been done for the labourer who is not in that fortunate position, and who is wholly unable to find the means of purchasing a small holding at all. And it is provided that where this is the case, the Local Authority may let small holdings in quantities which are not to exceed 10 acres of land. It is hoped that by this means a ladder may be provided to enable a man, by the exercise of his own industry, in the future to look forward to a time when he may be able to purchase a small holding. I must also point out that in the case of all these holdings—whether they are to be let, or whether they are to be sold—for 10 years in any case, and after 10 years until such time as the whole of the purchase money has been discharged, are to be held under certain conditions, the chief of which are as follows:—In the first place, they must be cultivated by the owner; in the second place, they must not be sub-let, or sub-divided, without the consent of the County Council; thirdly, it is provided that any dwelling-house erected on the holding must comply with the conditions, the sanitary conditions, which are required by the County Council; and then there is a fourth condition which is one of considerable importance, and to which I desire to direct the attention of the House. This provision stipulates that not more than one dwelling-house shall be erected on a holding, and that no dwelling-house shall be erected at all where the holding is of an annual value not exceeding £25, unless it is sufficient in the opinion of the Council to enable the occupier to maintain in comfort his family and himself by the cultivation of the holding. Now, I think the reasons for this condition will be obvious to the House at once. We are anxious to avoid doing anything in this Bill by which we may be instrumental in creating anything in the nature of congested districts in this country. But the House will see that that provision has also this effect: it divides small holdings into two parts. And with regard to the smaller class of holdings, which are conceived to meet what, in the nature of the case, must be purely local needs and local requirements, we make provision by which the County Council will be enabled to delegate the entire management of the smaller class of holdings to a Committee, which is to be composed partly of County Councillors and partly of allotments managers in the parish in which the land is situated; and if there should be no allotments manager, then to a person, who should be elected as if he were an allotments manager, expressly for the purpose. I am afraid I have wearied the House, but I shall not trouble it very much longer. Now, I come to the most difficult of the questions which we have had to meet in a measure dealing with this subject, and that is the provision of the necessary buildings. In some cases, of course, there would be buildings which are already in existence, which are either suitable or easily capable of being adapted to the purpose; in others, there will be none. Where that is the case, how are they to be provided? By the Local Authority? by the purchaser from his own resources? or by the purchaser with the aid of the Local Authority? It has sometimes been suggested that the Local Authority should advance to the purchaser money for this purpose. With regard to the last of these suggestions, I have been altogether unable to entertain it; and for this reason, that I have found no security whatever that appears to me to be adequate for the purpose. And with regard to the other two alternatives, we are clearly of opinion that the buildings, if possible, ought to be erected by the purchaser. We think they would be built, under these circumstances, with far more economy, and they would also provide an additional guarantee for the security of the ratepayers in the event, under any circumstances, of the purchaser not being forthcoming with his annual instalments. But, on the other hand, of course, there may be cases where the provision of buildings in addition to the payment of the purchase-money would so seriously encroach on the capital of the purchaser as to seriously cripple him in the cultivation of his holding. Where that is the case we thought it right to make a provision by which, under circumstances of that kind, the Local Authority may provide the buildings themselves as part of the agreement, either for the sale, or the letting of the holding; and I am bound to say myself that, in cases where the land is let, I do not see how the Local Authority can escape from the burden of providing the necessary buildings themselves. I now hope I am coming very near the end of what I am afraid has been a very long story. There is one more provision in the Bill which I must submit to the attention of the House. There may be cases—and very possibly there will be cases—in which the occupying tenant of a small holding may be anxious to buy his occupation from his landlord who may also be perfectly willing and perfectly ready to sell; where that is the case, and where the parties have already come to an agreement upon the subject, there the County Council is empowered to lend to the tenant three-fourths of the purchase-money on the security of the holding. If the holding is bought under these circumstances, it becomes at once subject to all the other conditions in respect of small holdings to which I have already referred. But no advance of this kind is to be made unless the County Council is satisfied that the price is reasonable, that the title is good, and that the purchase is made in good faith. And now I think the time has come when I should bring my observations to a close. I am exceedingly grateful to the House for the indulgence with which it has listened to them. I am perfectly well aware of the many imperfections which doubtless will be found in the Bill which I have desired to submit to the consideration of the House. Nor has it been either an easy or a simple matter to formulate proposals on the subject of this Bill; on the contrary, the difficulties have been great, and they have been all the greater because they are inherent in the nature of the case. We have to deal with conditions, of course, in which it is difficult enough for those who cultivate the soil to hold their own even when the work is done under the most scientific, and under the most economic, conditions. How is it likely, then, to fare with those who enter on this task without the aid of these advantages? Are we justified in hoping and believing that the greater industry which I think we may anticipate, encouraged and inspired by the stimulus of ownership, will more than compensate for the want of these advantages? That is the problem which, in my opinion, only time can solve, and which experience alone will be able to decide. But there is much to encourage us in believing that it will, and this, at least, may, with confidence, be asserted, that there never was a time more favourable for making such an experiment than is the present. Land in the market is very plentiful, and land never was so cheap; and although it is true that at the present moment the prices of agricultural produce are low, yet I believe myself that the prices both of land and produce are more likely to rise in the future than they are to fall. If that be so, and if I am right in my anticipation upon this point, then the small holders in the future will enter on their new career with every hope and every prospect of success, and most sincerely do I hope it may be so. If by any means we can succeed in attaching more closely to the soil the men to whose exertions the wealth it produces is mainly owing, I am persuaded we shall achieve a work which will add not only to the happiness and welfare of the people, but will redound to the credit of the Parliament which will pass the measure into law.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That leave be given to bring in a Bill to facilitate the acquisition of Small Agricultural Holdings."—(Mr. Chaplin.)

(5.40.) SIR W. VERNON HAR-COURT (Derby): I think the right hon. Gentleman will feel that by the cheers that followed the conclusion of his speech—and it is acknowledged on both sides of the House—he has discharged an important task with great ability and clearness. I am very glad that in bringing forward his measure, at all events, the right hon. Gentleman did not think it necessary to disparage his own Bill, or assure us that it was one which was not likely to have important consequences. It is impossible, I think, to conceive any measure which is more important in its character, and which, if it succeed, as we all hope it may succeed, will be more beneficial in its effects on this country. Now, of course, what we desire, and what I think the Gentlemen opposite desire also, is that this Bill should be made a thoroughly genuine and workable Bill. I give the right hon. Gentleman, and the Government, full credit for having that intention, and I hope, in the few remarks that I shall have to make upon it, that they will not believe that I am suggesting that there is any other design on the part of the Government. Now, the right hon. Gentleman has said that this is a tentative Bill. Well, I will not quarrel with the adjective. There is no doubt that there are provisions in this Bill—and, in fact, the whole machinery of the measure is necessarily such—somewhat novel in character. There was only one part of the right hon. Gentleman's address which, I think, might have been shortened, and which, indeed, was hardly necessary, when he endeavoured to convince the House that it was a matter of great importance that facilities should be given to attach the labourer to the soil. I can assure him that if there is no difficulty on that side of the House, he will never have any difficulty on this side of the House in bringing us to that conclusion. Indeed, if the right hon. Gentleman will forgive me for saying so, if he is converted on that subject, there will be no one left to be converted. That has always been the creed that we have held, and I am happy to know that he holds that creed in its orthodox form. The right hon. Gentleman has spoken so frankly of the change of opinion that has come over his own mind in this matter, that even if I had been so disposed to advert to former Debates, I should not think of doing so on the present occasion. It was quite worth while that the right hon. Gentleman should occupy the responsible position that he now holds if, by the further knowledge he has acquired, he should have come to a different conclusion to that which he tells us he at one time entertained. Therefore I think he may take it for granted now, that everybody is agreed that there ought to be a measure for facilitating the creation of small holdings; that everybody is agreed that small holdings are a good thing if they can be acquired; and that, therefore, the objective view is one upon which there is a general concurrence of opinion. Now, of course, we come to the machinery that the right hon. Gentleman has proposed in his Bill, and there, of course, we must expect that there will be a considerable difference of opinion among those who have long had to consider this question. I think the right hon. Gentleman has altered his opinion as to the expediency of small holdings in themselves. He still seems not to have become an absolute convert to the blessed word "compulsion." Well now, Sir, I do not object to the tone in which the right hon. Gentleman has spoken upon that subject, though I differ from the conclusion at which he has arrived. I think all that violence of feeling which at one time raged against the very idea of employing compulsory powers seems to have disappeared. It is natural that it should have disappeared, for compulsion has been employed with great advantage, and, indeed, under an obvious necessity, in a great number of measures cognate to the one now before the House. The right hon. Gentleman admits that, and says:

"I admit that compulsion has been employed, and might be employed, but there is no necessity in this case."

Now, I should like to remind the right hon. Gentleman of what the course of legislation upon these agricultural subjects has been. He will remember, and the House will remember, the first Bill introduced by the Government of Mr. Disraeli—for compensation for tenants' improvements. At that time it was maintained that compulsion could not be employed, that it was a thing not to be heard of for a moment; and the consequence was that in that Bill a provision was introduced that every landlord, by giving notice, might contract himself out of the Bill. Well, what was the consequence? Why, that almost all the landlords—I might almost say universally—contracted themselves out of the Bill; and the very same Government, if I remember right, were compelled to come down and strike that provision out of the Bill, and take away the power of voluntary contract in respect of that measure. That is an example of where you believed you could do without compulsion and found that you were mistaken in that belief. The next measure with regard to which we were told that compulsion was unnecessary, was in case of allotments. We were told, "voluntary power is quite sufficient, compulsion is unnecessary." Did you find compulsion unnecessary? Why, in the first Allotments Bill, you were obliged to bring in a second Allotment Bill. And what was the ground alleged? Why, that compulsion was unnecessary. I think that is a fair account of what happened in the case of a measure; and, therefore, I cannot conceive why the right hon. Gentleman and Government should have come to the conclusion that, having been obliged to resort to it, where compulsion had been dispensed with they can start a measure as an effective and workable measure when they depart from the principle, which, in other cases, they have been obliged, after experience, to resort to. Now, there is one authority on this subject—and I assure you, Speaker and the Government, that I am not going to cite a quotation from Hansard for the purpose of making an attack on anybody, but I am using it as an argument. When the subject of compulsion was under discussion, the position of the right hon. Gentleman in the Debate of 1886 was that small holdings were necessarily, in themselves, evils. That was not the point upon which the Chancellor of the Exchequer relied. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said that—he used a strong expression, to which I will refer. But his objection was, "substitution of the community for individual in the creation of small holdings"—that was his line of argument. And he said, arguing that question, that even if that difficulty were removed in order to make the plan a workable plan—the plan recommended by the hon. Member for Ipswich and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham unless they were to have compulsion, that Bill would be no good at all. I am only using that as an argument against the views taken by the right hon. Gentleman on the subject of compulsion. This is what the Chancellor of the Exchequer said :—

"If there is no compulsion, then the proposal of my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham will share the fate of the Act of George III."

That was an old Act, where the principle was not admitted, and under which, in point of fact, nothing has ever been done. And the Chancellor of the Exchequer said that if there were no compulsion, that then the measure proposed would share the fate of this obsolete, and, practically-speaking, abortive measure :—

"With the experience of that Act before us, I ask, is it wise to embark afresh on this legislation ?"

Then, an hon. Member said, "make it compulsory," and the Chancellor of the Exchequer said :—

"Yes, with compulsion you would do much."

And then he proceeds to say :—

"If compulsion is introduced, well and good; you may run great danger."

That is to say, by adopting the principle of compulsion.

"At the same time, you may give some effect to the proposal."

I give that as an argument in favour of compulsion. It was very well put by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Though he disapproved of the provision being introduced into the measure at all, he pointed out that "without the compulsion the measure would be practically ineffective." I am not proposing to trouble the House at all upon the details as to the manner in which the money is to be advanced, or on what I may call the minor details of this Bill. That, I think, cannot with any great advantage be discussed until we have the Bill before us, and have fuller information on the subject; and I would not myself be a party to inviting the House to go into details of that character. But I touch upon this question of compulsion as a question of what I may call principle in this Bill. Well, there is one other matter which is even more important than the question of compulsion, and that is the body who are to give effect to this Bill. Now, we have all known in former Bills that, in dealing with allotments, the body that had to put the Act into operation was unsatisfactory. It was unsatisfactory because it really had not the ability to deal with its provisions, and, therefore, to a great degree, the means of carrying it out. In the course of the Debate, when we get into Committee on this measure, we shall have the advantage of Gentlemen who are far better acquainted with the action of County Councils than I can pretend to be myself. But I must say, upon first sight, from what I can learn of the constitution and action of this body, I am by no means satisfied that they are the appropriate machinery for giving effect to such a Bill as this. I give the County Councils all credit for the admirable work that they have done, but they are a large body, who sit in a county town in the centre of the great counties, and they have no knowledge of the details of the localities, and they cannot possibly deal with this matter. Indeed, I could gather from the tone and expressions of the right hon. Gentleman he almost apologised for taking the County Councils, simply because he had got nothing else. The mainspring of this Bill will be the body that is to carry it into execution. I venture to express the opinion, and it is an opinion which I expressed often before, that if you are to do anything in this matter which depends absolutely and entirely upon the local knowledge of the persons interested—you may say, on the whole, people in every parish in the county—you must have your Local Authorities on small details, and unless you get a body of that kind there is no life in this Bill at all. Take the County of Devonshire. We have a body at Exeter trying to come to a determination on the question of the necessity and propriety of small holdings in some districts in that great county. Take the county in which I myself reside—a much smaller county; but I cannot conceive that a County Council sitting at Winchester could possibly enter into the considerations which are vital to the determination of these things. And when you come to consider what will be the character of the work which has to be done—whether Blackacre or White-acre is to be bought for this purpose: who is the man in a village who is a solvent man: who is an individual to be trusted — these are matters which, it seems to me, from what I know of them, it is impossible that a body of the character of a County Council can determine. Before this Bill has the breath of life in it, I think you must have these Local Councils—whether you choose to call them District Councils or Parish Councils. You will then have a body consisting of persons who understand the very limited areas whose wants this Bill is intended to meet. These, it seems to me, are two very important points in this Bill which you will have, when we come to discuss this Bill in Committee, carefully to consider. Now, the right hon. Gentleman spoke upon another point, which I think is a very material one, and that is the hire of land. We fought that out on the Allotments Bill at very considerable length. The right hon. Gentleman seems to have come to a conclusion largely adverse to the principle of hiring land. I hope when that question comes to be argued at further length he will be prepared to modify his views; but I understand now that, as regards the labourers, he is disposed to consider the question, and, as I understand, there are some provisions in the Bill with reference to the hire of land upon a small scale. I therefore think we have made a considerable advance since the time of the Allotments Bill.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): There is no provision in the Allotments Bill for the compulsory acquisition of land; but there was for the voluntary acquisition.

SIR W. HAROURT: I hope we shall learn in the course of the discussion what extent of hiring has been employed in the case of allotments. There is another provision which I confess I did not clearly understand, which was the limitation of the buildings for a dwelling-house. As I understand from the right hon. Gentleman no dwelling-house, except by special permission, is to be allowed upon any land under £25 a year.

MR. CHAPLIN: Under the value of £25, unless, in the opinion of the County Council, the cultivation of the holding would be sufficient to provide for the maintenance of the man and his family.

Sir W. Vernon Harcourt

SIR W. HAROURT: I think there are a great many holdings whose value would be under £25. There are numbers, not only under but under £20 and £15, where men living on their own resources, a should be extremely sorry to see right hon. Gentleman put any limit upon these.

MR. CHAPLIN: Do I understand that in the view of the right hon. Gentleman there should be no limitation?

SIR W. HAROURT: Certainly anything like to the extent of That is very extreme. I think right hon. Gentleman should take it and not be afraid of the creation of gested districts in the agricultural vinces of England. The alarm on subject is altogether unfounded, and very well be dismissed. Now, Sir, not desire to delay the House in fu discussing this matter. The right Gentleman may be assured that on side of the House the object he h heart is one we will be ready to sup and we are quite prepared to go int discussion of this Bill with a heart sre to make it a living and a wor measure.

MR. JEFFREYS (Hants, B stoke): I congratulate the right Gentleman the President of the Board of Agriculture on the introductio this Bill, which I believe will be a be to the country residents in general, will be the means of attracting a large number of people to the land. The objection to the Bill taken by the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down is that it does not contain the principle of compulsion. I am very glad, in that that principle of compulsion has not come in at the present time, because Sir, if the land can be got in a voluntary way there is no need whatever for compulsion. I believe the Bill will work well without compulsion. The County Council is the best authority for carrying out this Bill. In Hampshire there is already a Sub-Committee of the Council appointed to undertake the management of allotments, and I believe the work done very well. As farming a good deal of land, I do not think that any man who takes a small holding can immediately make a fortune. There is a difference between small holding and allotments; allotments only occupy man's labour, but directly you con-small holdings—holdings of anything like 50 acres—the owner has to engage labour, which will run away with a great deal of his profits. Still I hope, Sir, that the experiment of small holdings may be tried, and I certainly hope it may be successful. There is one point upon which I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Minister for Agriculture, and that is a question with regard to the 1d. in the £1 of the county rate. I should like to know whether the whole of that money is to go annually in payment for the land? I imagine it cannot be by means of a sinking fund. There is another question, namely, that with regard to tenants purchasing their holding from the land-owner. My right hon. Friend did not say what the size of those holdings was to be.

MR. CHAPLIN: From 1 to 50 acres.

MR. JEFFREYS: I am glad to hear that; anything else would be impossible, and I hope that these small holdings, from 1 to 50 acres, may be bought and sold, subject, of course, to the approval of the Board of Agriculture. I wish to congratulate my right hon. Friend in having brought in this Bill, which I hope will be the means of doing something to improve agriculture.

*MR. HALDANE (Haddington): Upon one point, at all events, Sir, we on this side of the House are agreed. We feel ourselves under an obligation to the right hon. Gentleman for the extraordinary clearness with which he has explained the provisions of this extraordinarily complicated Bill. But the right hon. Gentleman began by saying that it was desirable—this he assumed as a sort of axiom—to establish a system of small proprietors in this country. No doubt that is true; but it is true only, subject to certain limitations. I do not think the right hon. Gentleman realized the feeling of repugnance which some of us have to the creation of any new system of land tenure that would not be subject to public control. To me, it seems that the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman is defective in this respect. The right hon. Gentleman made one admission of great importance. He said the reason why this Bill had been introduced was not so much owing to the general depression in agriculture, but because of the difficulty of keeping labour on the land—the difficulty of stimulating the labourer to remain on the land unless you gave him some advantage. That is a very substantial admission; it shows that the agricultural labourer is raising his standard of living, and it shows the effect upon him of the extension of the franchise in 1885. There was another most important admission made by the right hon. Gentleman. He told us that inquiry into the reason of the failure of the system of small proprietorships convinced him that it was due to this—that the labourer had been obliged to pay exorbitantly high prices for the land. We know that extraordinary high prices have been paid for what is sometimes called accommodation land—land near a village, or where there was likely to be a special want for cottages or small holdings. People who take advantage of their monopoly to exact large prices are not acting fairly, and, if so, that would seem to necessitate the introduction into a measure of this kind of compulsory powers. The first and most formidable criticism therefore upon this Bill is one which the admission of the right hon. Gentleman, in presenting his case, goes a long way to justify. But there is another point. Under the Allotments Act of 1887 there is at least a partially local machinery. There is nothing of the kind in this Bill. A Committee is to be appointed, not for a particular locality, but for the entire county, and the administration will be in the hands of this Committee, which has no local connection of any sort or kind. Upon the petition of any elector the Committee is to come into action, and the only approach to a local control is to be that of the managers, who have functions analogous to those under the Allotments Act of 1887, which functions would be very limited indeed. It seems to me it would have been better to take another course. We should not have been satisfied with the Board of Guardians—we should not have been satisfied with anything else than Parish Councils—but the right hon. Gentleman might have put some power of initiative into the hands of a known local body, as he did under the Act of 1887, instead of attempting—

MR. CHAPLIN: The hon. Member will perhaps allow me to explain. The object and intention of the Bill in this respect is this—that the delegation of the smaller class of holdings should be committed to a Committee, which is to consist partly of members of the County Council, of whom the Member for the particular district shall be one, and partly of certain allotment managers selected from the parish in which the land is situated.

MR. HALDANE: I understand there is to be only one Committee for management. The General Committee is under no duty or obligation at all to the locality. There should be a duty on the part of the General Committee to act on the requisition of individuals in the locality, whereas the right hon. Gentleman has put every locality at the absolute mercy of the General Committee, with this exception, that the management of the allotment is put in the hands of the Local Committee, constituted as already explained. That seems to be a formidable point. There is another point. In the Bill which was promoted by my hon. Friend the Member for Bordesley there was a provision of very great public importance. As you were advancing public money for the benefit of a particular class, my hon. Friend in his scheme said that that was not justified unless you got out of the transactions some benefit for the public—let us say for the County Council. Therefore in his Bill my hon. Friend made provision that one quarter of the purchase money should be paid down, and that three-quarters should remain as a perpetual loan, on which 1 per cent. interest was to be paid beyond the rate at which the County Council could borrow from the Treasury. The result of that was a benefit of 1 per cent. to the county in which the land was situated. I think the right hon. Gentleman should have acted upon that principle, and given the county some benefit. As it is running some risk, and as the rates are to be pledged, it is only right and expedient that the county should get some benefit. The County Council would be all the more willing to put the Act in motion if something was to come from it to the county exchequer. There is a further point, Sir, on which I should like to make inquiry. The right hon. Gentleman proposed that the rent charges should in all cases be redeemable. I should like to ask why he did not propose a perpetual rent charge as a quid pro quo by way of compensation to the county for borrowing this money? If he had taken that course he would have enlisted sympathy in the county. Again, in this Bill there is no power of re-purchase on the part of the County Council, which is to buy and to sell. It might happen that the land was in the neighbourhood of a village or town, and owing to the movement or growth of the population it might acquire greatly enhanced value. If the value of the land became such as was not contemplated at the time of the sale by the local authority to the small holder, surely it is only right that the local authority should have the power to re-purchase on just terms. That was a provision which was made in the Bill of my hon. Friend the Member for Bordesley, and which, I think, ought to have been in the Government Bill. As I said before, we do not desire to see any new system of land tenure that fails to afford adequate protection for the interests of the community. There is another point, my fifth and last. The right hon. Gentleman told us there was to be no power of sub-division or sub-letting. That is so far right; but he did not tell us he had put any restriction on the power of creating limited ownerships in the land dealt with; that there was to be any prohibition, any restriction of the power on the part of the owner of small estates to prevent him creating life estates by will or by deed. As I understand, it will be possible under this Bill for the owner of one of these small properties to create a series of limitations in tail male with remainders over; and I can tell the right hon. Gentleman that in a Bill of this kind there should be some provision restricting the power of settlement. I should also like to ask whether this Bill is to extend to Scotland and to Ireland? Scotland is interested in this question of small holdings, nearly, if not quite, as much as England.

MR. CHAPLIN: I forgot to say that the Bill will extend to Scotland, but not to Ireland.

MR. HALDANE: I am much obliged to the right hon. Gentleman, and I must say that we are very grateful to him for extending his consideration across the Border. We on this side shall look upon this Bill as, in its general outlines, good, in so far as it is the first proposal of any Government to create a system of small holdings in this country—good in as it is worked out with great care with great knowledge of the institutions of agriculture, and with a view to produce a system of tenure beneficial in the interests of the men for whom it is intended. But there are great gaps in it; there are the parts, for example, which I have inserted; and I may say that we are unable to look upon the Bill as more than a first step in the right direction—a step in the right direction. The right hon. Gentleman should, and which we should not hinder from taking, but which we should fully consider if necessary in the light of further examination, with a view of improving the scheme he has proposed more thoroughly, more far-reaching, and more in harmony with the advanced opinions of law reformers which will obtain in ten years that are to be.

(25.) MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Borehamwood, Birmingham): I am only speaking with simple sincerity when I thank the right hon. Gentleman and the Government for the promptness with which they have dealt with this question of small holdings. Even if it is only one small step in the right direction, Government are entitled, and I have no doubt we will get, support from all sides of this House in carrying forward their experiment. The right hon. Gentleman has spoken in such eloquent terms the advantages of a peasant proprietary, that at least there is nothing more to be said. The deficiency of labour, the migration of labourers to towns, and all social problems connected therewith, are questions the right hon. Gentleman has handled so thoroughly, that no further comment is needed to show the necessity of the establishment of a peasant proprietary. The right hon. Gentleman speaks of the displacement of labour from the land. The right hon. Gentleman speaks of the labourers going from the land because of their distaste for the occupation. I venture to say there is no reason whatever why the labourers should leave the occupation to which they are accustomed, and which they like; and if the labourers leave the land it is because they are driven from it by the whip of poverty and discomfort. I think the Government for this earnestly desire, which they have, at any rate, put in a position that will compel future Governments to carry it further. It seems to me that the Bill goes mainly on the recommendations of the Select Committee. It is in advance of those recommendations on two points. One is the application of the principle to sitting tenants, for which we are thankful to the Government, and the other relates to buildings which the Select Committee could not see their way to recommend. I should like to know if the right hon. Gentleman intends to confine the supply of small holdings by purchase and hire to those resident in the district, because, if I heard the right hon. Gentleman correctly, I gather that is what he intends? If that be so, I trust the right hon. Gentleman will take out that one provision, for the simple reason that if this is to be an instrument in bringing back people from the crowded towns to the land, which is one of the objects of the right hon. Gentleman, he cannot do that unless the Act be put in operation by a suitable Authority. Although I am an upholder of the Parish Council for certain work, it would, I think, be better if the County Council, in very small areas, were the only people they had to look to for putting the Act in operation. The larger and the wealthier area is the better. We have experienced enough of the action of the County Councils, with regard to allotments and other matters, to say that their members not only understand the question, but that they will be willing to carry it into effect. There has been a good deal said about the County Council allotments. The County Councils have shown themselves ready and willing to act in the cases brought before them. With reference to the absence of compulsion, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby gave a very curious reason why the Government should adopt the principle of compulsion. He said they found, after the passing of the Allotment Act of 1887, that compulsion was necessary, and hence the Act of 1890. The right hon. Gentleman himself knows that the Act of 1887 had compulsory powers, and the Act of 1890 had nothing to do with compulsory powers. It was simply an Appeals Bill. Therefore, there is no reason contained in that argument for compulsion. There is a great deal of force in the statement that there is plenty of land in the market. I have said, 20 years ago, that, although an advocate of compulsory powers in Allotments and Small Holdings Bills, I hold that the compulsory powers once placed there will rarely be used. That is borne out by the working of the Allotments Act. Questions have been asked in the House as to the number of Local Authorities who have adopted the Act in a way which seemed to suggest that none have done so. I know between 100 and 200 who have put the Act in force, by hiring or buying land and letting it to the labourers who required it. I have the names of between 100 and 150 parishes where the Local Authorities have done that. That is sufficient to answer the statement that the Act is a dead letter, a delusion and a snare. Do not let it be supposed that we know nothing of these things here; and probably, now that this information has been given, the justice of making the statements elsewhere may be considered. The reason why I think compulsion is necessary is that it will get rid of a ground of agitation; for bear in mind that, although 100 Local Authorities have put the Act in force, compulsion has not been necessary in more than half-a-dozen cases, and of these half-dozen, only one has been opposed in Parliament. The difficulty in getting allotments is not so much due to the landlords as to the large farmers. One could not expect in these times a landlord to cut off a piece of a farm; but if he were compelled, the responsibility would be gone from him. It was the farmers who complained when land was wanted that the piece selected was the very best land on the farm. I want the right hon. Gentleman to be sure—for I am not lawyer enough to know—how will it be in the case of land in the hands of trustees? Have they the power voluntarily to sell if they wish? And, above all, how about land in the power of Corporations, such, for instance, as the college lands? I am in hopes that the right hon. Gentleman will make some modifications before we see the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman said that one-fourth would have to be paid down. I think a sum which would ensure the bona fides of the purchaser would be sufficient. The Ecclesiastical Commissioners find 15 per cent. enough; Lord Wantage's Land Company take 10 or 20 per cent. Perhaps the figures of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners would be a happy medium. There is one

very strong argument I wish to add on the lines of the hon. Member of Haddington (Mr. Haldane). The Bill adopts the perpetual rent system; but gives power to redeem it. It need not be in the Bill at all if there is any power to redeem it. I want the right hon. Gentleman to consider when we are entering on a new system which has to be tried, and which he and others have seen has failed so miserably on the Continent. It is quite true it has been a miserable failure in some parts of the Continent but happily we know the exact causes of that. In adopting the plan for Great Britain, however, we are bound to take safeguards against every cause which has created failure abroad. These causes are the curse of the money-lender, subdivision, and sub-letting. These are the three evils in France. I am not urging a system which will commend itself on the platform where men will get something for nothing. I want a system that will thrive and blossom. It will take some time to create a village proprietary. But let the right hon. Gentleman amend those drawbacks which he knows have caused failure. I remember when the Education Bill of 1879 was passed. I said to an American "We are far behind you in education." "Yes," he said, "but there is this peculiar thing in England, that are a long time in adopting a reform. They are slow to move; but when once they do move, they do so on improved principles, and go ahead quickly." It is the duty of the right hon. Gentleman who is about to try a new experiment—the greatness of which no words can overestimate—to avoid those evils, which are as plain as a pikestaff. As to the question of quit-rent, let it be two-fifths of what you like, but keep it. If you allow it to be redeemed, or do not confine it to the cultivating class, these rent-charges will be bought up, and the land will be released at exorbitant rents. There is one case where there are 90 small holdings among 60 occupiers in a population of 300. That originally had a rent-charge of £9 10s. What do you find there? Those who had the rent-charge and stuck to it are doing well; but a number of the rent-charges have been bought by some shopkeepers, and there are cases where the £9 10s. rent-charge has become £1. The man who has bought the rent-charge is a small landlord, and he is charging and 60 per cent., and in some cases double the price he paid. I would implore the right hon. Gentleman to guard against this. Everyone knows that the small impecunious landlord is the worst. The necessities of his position oblige him to get every farthing he can. Suppose, as I am sure will be the case in some years, that some of these holdings will be in the market. If they are confined to cultivators and not allowed to be sub-let, the small capitalist, as soon as he knows this, would go out of the room and cease to be a bidder, leaving it to the cultivators. Call these holdings Chaplin holdings or anything you like, but confine them to the cultivators. I would also urge on the right hon. Gentleman the desirability of allowing the Local Authority to advance money for putting up buildings. A man can put up the buildings sometimes at half the price of the Local Authority. There were some cases of this kind in connection with Lord Wantage's scheme. If the right hon. Gentleman does not extend the power of advancing money to the holders he will not meet the requirements of the poorer class of cultivators. Of course, this will have to be done under proper safeguards, but the greatest of all the improvements in the Bill is to make the quit-rent of an unredeemable character, and that Local Authorities should be allowed to charge somewhat more for the loan than they pay to the Exchequer. This would bring all the inhabitants of a district in favour of the scheme, as they would come within the range of the benefit that such a scheme will confer. I believe this is only one portion of the work of the reform of rural life. If the scheme of the right hon. Gentleman will allow this small extra allowance I have referred to, the localities would have an income for sanitation and other things without doing anyone any harm.

\(6.50.) MR. JAMES LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet):* There is a great deal in the friendly criticism of my hon. Friend opposite with which I am disposed to agree. I need hardly say, however, that I have no sympathy whatever with the preference he expressed, and which was also expressed by the right hon. Gentleman (Sir William Harcourt) in favour of the compulsory acquisition of land. That I look upon as a most perilous step, especially in connection with a measure which is of a tentative character. What my hon. Friend said of the necessity of taking full cognisance of the causes which have led to the failure of the system of small holdings is, I think, a matter well deserving the attention of the House. The hon. Member for the Bordesley Division referred to the failure in parts of the Continent. He should have carried his observations a step nearer home, and referred to the system of small holdings in England, and also urged the House to take cognisance of the causes of the failure in England. I think it is generally admitted that the system hitherto tried in England has been decidedly a failure. In the Counties of Cumberland and Westmoreland the system has been largely tried. The system was in the hands of those who were to the manner born—those who in most cases possessed ample capital, energy, and experience, which enabled them to give the system full and ample trial. The system, I much regret to say, has broken down in these cases. The main cause of failure was that the owners found they could invest their capital better in stock than in land. In parts of Lincolnshire, to which the right hon. Gentleman referred, a very different state of affairs prevailed. The value of land for selling purposes rose very high. The hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Haldane) entirely misrepresented what fell from my right hon. Friend. I understood him to refer to the fact that the competition for freehold ownership had been so keen that many owners had purchased their land at fabulous prices. I did not understand him to say that the price charged to the hirer of land had been unduly raised. What are the causes which have told against small, as well as large, holders? The hon. Member referred to the curse of the money-lender. I hope my right hon. Friend will insert a provision that the consent of some competent authority shall be necessary before any charge can be imposed upon land. The hon. Gentleman also referred to the case of sub-letting. Against that, also, I hope ample precautions will be taken. He also referred to the question of sub-division. I trust my right hon. Friend will take effectual safeguards against that. But my hon. Friend omitted to notice the main cause of the failure in small as well as large holdings—namely, foreign competition; and added to that is the ever-increasing burden of rates and taxes, which, combined with foreign competition, have contributed towards forcing the small holders to realise what remained of their property, and the practical extinction of what was undoubtedly most valuable, the institution of small holders of land in this country. I hope the House will bear these matters in mind, and there is another which I think ought to be urged very seriously. One of the main causes which has prevented land from passing from hand to hand in large, and especially in small, quantities, has been the excessive cost of transfer. The present Government introduced, a few Sessions ago, a measure dealing with the subject, but, for some inconceivable reason, they handicapped its most useful provisions, tending in that direction, by utterly uncalled for and most mischievous provisions, dealing with the wholly incongruous subject of primogeniture, and thereby brought about the rejection of the Bill. The hon. and learned Gentleman opposite spoke of imposing the most extraordinary conditions for preventing the land acquired under this Bill from being made the subject of any kind of settlement. But what would he do where the owners of the land died? I suppose it would be subject to primogeniture of the most rigid form.

MR. HALDANE: The land would be sold if the son could not carry it on.

*MR. LOWTHER: Of course, if the hon. and learned Gentleman is going to sell it absolutely, that removes to some extent the difficulty with which he surrounded his argument. I hope my right hon. Friend will, in Committee, note the suggestions which have been made for preventing grave abuses that would otherwise arise under this scheme, and that we shall have a measure which will, at any rate, give a chance of this system being fairly tried. I would, however, warn the House against anticipating any large results from any measure of this kind. In my own opinion, nothing in the shape of legislative action will induce persons to embark in the speculation of the ownership and cultivation of land, unless the conditions under which agriculture is conducted are made such that a man of average capacity and reasonable industry can make a living out of it. So long as they are ground down by rates and overwhelmed by foreign competition, very few practical men will be induced to embark in a business which has to be carried on under such hopeless conditions.

*(7.5.) MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I rise mainly for the purpose of putting a couple of questions to the right hon. Gentleman the Minister of Agriculture. I have always thought it unwise to enter into any lengthened criticism on the First Reading of a Bill, and although the right hon. Gentleman introduced this measure with very great clearness, when we have it printed, I have no doubt we shall find we have misunderstood it on some important points. He referred to the class of yeomen, and it seems to me that this is essentially a yeomen's Bill—a Bill to enable men in a comparatively good position in life to get land—and I do not believe it will be the least good to one in a thousand of the agricultural labourers. They do not want what, in this Bill, are called small holdings, at all; but what the bulk of the English labourers want is a thoroughly popular system of allotments in extension of the present system. It seems to me that there are two great blots in this Bill. The first is, that there is no compulsory power in it given to the Local Authority to purchase; and, what is still more important, that there is no compulsory power of leasing. The other blot is, that the authority which is to administer the Act, the County Council, represents too large an area. One of the main difficulties in administering the Allotments Act has arisen from the fact that the rural sanitary authority, the Board of Guardians, is composed of men coming from different parishes, so that it is impossible for them to know the circumstances of each parish. How much, then, will that difficulty be aggravated in the area of a whole county. We shall have an opportunity of discussing these matters at a later stage, and I will not go into them now, but will put these two questions to the right hon. Gentleman. Am I right in understanding that the restriction upon the building of a house upon a small holding applies, even if the tenant or owner is prepared to build that house at his own expense; and, secondly, I want to ask whether the 1d. in the £1, which will come out of the County Rate, will be borne by the whole county, or by the parish or parishes where small holdings are provided?

Mr. James Lowther

(7.10.) MR. CHARLES W. GRAY (Essex, Maldon): I think the measure which the right hon. Gentleman has introduced has shown that, at any rate, if we are approaching dissolution, we have got a kick or two left in us. The Bill is one which may reach a very long way indeed; but I should be the last to throw any obstruction in the way of a proposal of this sort. On the contrary, I rise to give it cordial support. It is sometimes said that the farmers do not want such a Bill, because it would set up a number of men to compete with them in their own industry; but I have never heard any objection coming from the farmers on that score, and I hope the right hon. Gentleman opposite, representing the great industries of the Midland and Northern Counties, will remember that fact. The hon. Member for Haddington (Mr. Haldane) criticised the Bill at considerable length; but his criticisms were very much those which a lawyer would probably pass upon any measure proposed from the other side of the House; and there was nothing in his remarks, or in any others we have heard, to show that there should be any hesitation in reading the Bill a first time, or that it should not have fair-play. I hope it will not only get fair-play, but that when it becomes an Act it will carry with it all the benefits which the hon. Member for the Bordesley Division (Mr. J. Collings) thinks will follow legislation of this kind. With reference to the explanation so lucidly made by the Minister of Agriculture, I want him to give us an idea as to how selections would be made in those cases where there are more applicants than small holdings. If this selection is to be made in accordance with common sense, I should think that if there were an applicant from the town, and also one from the country, you had better select the man who knows something about farming. The objections of any considerable degree of weight raised by the other side have been limited to two—namely, that this Bill is not compulsory, and that the authority to deal with this matter is the County Council. I understood that authority was only proposed because there is at present no better authority to undertake the responsibility. But there is nothing to lead me to suppose that, if District Councils are set up, they may not have either the entire, or some proportion of the authority on this subject. The present Government is more or less pledged to go on with the question of District Councils if they remain in power a sufficiently long time; and if the other side come in, of course we know, from the speeches delivered in the country, that in anticipation of Home Rule or any other question, one of the first measures it will bring forward will be one for establishing District Councils. The other point of criticism had reference to compulsion, but I think we should be very careful before making tentative measures of this sort compulsory. If it succeed, I suppose that later it would be quite in the power of our Party, or of the opposite Party if they should come into Office, to make the scheme compulsory. If we made it compulsory now, without more experience, we might do more harm than good, and cases might arise where small holdings were applied for, simply to prevent certain industries being set up in the locality. I hope those who wish the measure to be compulsory will have a little patience, and I hope it will be understood that the agriculturalists as a class have no objection at all to a measure of this sort being fairly tried.

*(7.25.) MR. T. E. ELLIS (Merionethshire): I desire to add my congratulations to those which have already been offered to the right hon. Gentleman. I had the pleasure of sitting with him on a Committee which inquired into this question, and I am extremely glad that he has found so early an opportunity of bringing its decisions before the House. Personally, I think it is by far the most important measure introduced by the Government since the President of the Local Government Board brought forward the Local Government Bill for England and Wales. It gives real value to the establishment of County Councils; for the value of the Local Government Bill lay, not so much in its powers, as in its possibilities, and this Bill is far more valuable in its possibilities than in its powers; and it would be so, especially in two points which were omitted, but were embodied in the Bill of the hon. Member for the Bordesley Division. They were compulsory power to purchase, and the principle of the final municipal control of all land on which operations may be carried out under the Small Holdings Bill. The principle of compulsory purchase may very well take care of itself in future Parliaments. I trust the right hon. Gentleman will accept an Amendment in favour of that most valuable principle of municipal control. I should like to call attention to one or two other omissions, which in some parts of the country will largely delay, if they do not frustrate, the operations of the Bill. I refer, first, to that large class of small holdings which exist in certain parts of the country, and notably in Wales and parts of Yorkshire, Westmoreland, and Cumberland, to which are attached large mountain pastures. No cause has tended so much to diminish the class of yeomen as the vast enclosure of commons which took place from the middle of the last century to within 20 years ago. It came out distinctly in the evidence before the Committee that in Wales the small farmers in the hilly and mountainous districts were able to live a comparatively thriving life because they had, attached to their holdings, common pasturage on the hill and mountain sides, the value of which I need not point out. If the right hon. Gentleman desire to enfranchise, so to speak, the present small holders in the hilly districts, and to create a larger number, he will have to look into the question of the regulation of these pasturages. In some cases smaller holdings had been consolidated, and the mountain pasturage belonging to each of the small holdings was also consolidated, so as to belong to the larger farm. Besides that, according to a witness before the Richmond Commission, the small farmers are only allowed to pasture two sheep to the acre of their holdings, while the larger farmers are able to pasture three. The right hon. Gentleman, therefore, if he desire to increase the number of small holdings, will have to make some provision for the new division of these pasturages attaching to farms. The right hon. Gentleman did not conceal from the House the enormous risks which all concerned in these transactions will take on themselves. There is the comparative inexperience of those who will obtain the new holdings; the question of having instalments paid regularly to the Local Authority so that the repayments to the Loan Commissioners may be properly made; then the further question, that the small holder may not be able to put up buildings; and the ever-existing fear of bad seasons, the cattle plague, and other evils affecting the farming community. Under these circumstances, it is of importance that we examine closely the amount of the purchase money which the County Council may pay for the land. The amount of the purchase money is the keystone of the Bill. Is the County Council to enter as an ordinary bidder into a public auction room to buy the land; for I know that in Wales certain forms and ingenious dodges well-known to auctioneers produce brisk competition, so as to secure fancy prices for the land. Many persons buy land not because they want to cultivate it, but because they desire to have a county position or to be made County Magistrates. If the duty of bringing back the labourers on the land is to be thrown on the County Council, will the right hon. Gentleman give them a right of pre-emption to the land? Further, what are his real guarantees that only a fair and reasonable price will be given for the land? If such a guarantee be not given, it seems to me that the Bill will land not merely the County Council, but the Loan Commissioners, in considerable difficulty. I think this is the crucial point in the working of the Bill. Can he give us further light on the rules under which the land, having been bought by the County Council, is to be sold to the applicants? Is it to be by public auction? If the County Council is to buy by auction and then to sell to the applicants by auction, the cultivator will be sorely over-burdened, and the Bill will topple about the heads of those who will try to work it. I should further like to say that, although this Bill will in its present form do a great deal to re-create a class that is of the utmost value to the community, it is only the first step, and many more steps will have to be taken, and will be logically and inevitably taken, by future Parliaments. I think the principle of compulsory purchase will have to be applied. I know large districts in Wales where the tenants would give anything to purchase their holdings at a fair and reasonable price, but the landlords are unwilling to sell. It is futile for the right hon. Gentleman to say that there is plenty of land in the market. There may be in Essex and some other parts of England, but in Wales there is little land in the market, and it is only very rarely that the present holders have any chance of getting it at a reasonable price. One of the first effects of the Bill will be, I believe, to raise a cry—on the whole, a reasonable one—that no private sale of land whatever shall take place without the sanction of a Public Authority. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will not only take every step to pass the present Bill, but will accept occasional Amendments from this side, and more especially do I hope that he will give considerable attention to the clauses of the Bill of my hon. Friend the Member for Bordesley, with a view to giving County Councils and the Local Authorities a real and permanent hold on the land.

(7.40.) MR. MARK J. STEWART (Kirkcudbright): I am one of those who feel the importance of this Bill as much as any Member of the House, but I do not think it is going to do so much good to the agricultural labourers as the right hon. Gentleman and some of his friends think it will. The speech we have just listened to will no doubt receive the deep attention of the House when the details of the Bill come to be discussed, but I hope my right hon. Friend will give the possessors of land a chance to do what they like with their own, and to get a reasonable and fair price for it. I am convinced that in the great majority of cases landlords would be only too glad to get a fair remunerative price to sell part of their land. In Scotland there are large tracts of land which few agriculturists would care to have much to do with, and others which might be made more fertile if the state of the farming industry permitted any degree of certainty of payment. The opposition to this measure appears to me to rest mainly on the non-compulsory clauses. I hope and trust the right hon. Gentleman will stand firm on this point. There is no reason why a fair measure should not be submitted to the country without compulsion, and have a fair amount of success. If you adopt compulsion in the first instance, you alienate a large number of persons who are in favour of giving the labourers a larger right and interest in the land than they now possess. But the right hon. Gentleman must not run away with the idea that by increasing the number of small holdings he will confer a great benefit on the whole community. While I hail with delight a larger number of small holdings in the country, I have had considerable experience of the nature and duties of working them. On those estates in which it is my lot to take a very deep interest it is not only the very small farmers that have at this time a great difficulty in meeting their rents, but the larger farmers, with the best machinery, driven by electricity, water, and steam, have difficulty in making both ends meet. Take away these advantages, and the small farmer is in many cases no better off in point of pecuniary emolument than the labourer. I have always taken the view that it is essential on the part of all large proprietors to have a certain number of stepping-stones into their larger farms, whereby the labourer may raise himself by going from one to another, and so become in time a large tenant farmer. It is the absence of these small holdings which I so deeply deplore. There is no doubt, however, that recent legislation and practice in the farming world has tended to the taking up of these small holdings and making them into larger farms. The Bill will not meet with any opposition from the landlords, who are glad to get their rent, whether from a large or small holder. They are more sure of it from the small farmer who works hard with his own hands, and has not to pay wages to any large extent. Fault has been found with the County Council, but where you have a body representing a large area you may depend that you will have greater fairness and impartiality than in the smaller Parish Councils, where there is always a certain amount of jealousy and rivalry which it is difficult to get rid of, but that is met by associating the representatives of a larger area in the County Council. It is said that the County Council is too large for dealing with such a question, but, of course, it would appoint Committees to deal with certain portions of the district, and the members of those Committees would not necessarily be connected with the district in which they had to deal. I would ask my right hon. Friend if there are to be two Bills on this question—one for England and one for Scotland? The interests of Scotland are likely to be somewhat lost sight of in considering the larger area of England. There is an apparent disposition in the House to pass the Bill. Let us hope it will be a useful measure, and may assist the labourers and those of the agricultural community who are anxious to push on and rise; and with this view I shall have much pleasure in supporting the Bill, though I fear the House may possibly find its results are not quite so favourable as they seem disposed to think.

\*(7.50.) MR. HENNEAGE (Great Grimsby): I must congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on his speech and the practical discussion which has followed it. I do not agree with the right hon. Member for Thanet that the small holders of the Isle of Axholme were brought to grief by the price of corn. They bought their holdings at a high price, and borrowed three-fourths of the purchase money from the solicitors from whom they bought the lands, and when they could not pay the interest the solicitors foreclosed, and most of them got neither capital nor interest. With regard to the question of compulsion, I, for one, am very glad it has not been adopted, and I think all the argument of the right hon. Member for Derby is worthless, for he was entirely wrong when he alluded to the Allotments Acts. The first Bill had compulsion in it; the second was purely an Appeal Bill. So I do not think the right hon. Gentleman need pay much regard to the precedents before him. What I wish to press on my right hon. Friend is this: I think the remarks in regard to the financial clauses have been exceedingly just, and are, I think, well worthy of attention. I am strongly in favour of there being a quit-rent on the land, and that precautions should be taken to prevent the land being saddled with a mortgage in the same way as in the case of the Isle of Axholme. The clause at present stands that a fourth is to be paid at once, a fourth as rent-charge, and half is to be paid off by terminable annuities. I would suggest that the first fourth be paid at once, the second fourth by terminable annuities, and that the other half should remain as a quit-rent for ever. Nobody would ever be inclined to lend money on land so encumbered. I agree, also, that the rate-payers should have some benefit out of the transactions. There will be no difficulty in getting money at  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent., and if the Local Authority charged  $3\frac{1}{2}$  or  $3\frac{3}{4}$  per cent. it would leave a margin for the benefit of the ratepayers. I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he cannot consider with the Law Officers of the Crown some clause which would keep down conveyancing expenses. I regret that the Bill brought in by the present Government three years ago was not passed in its entirety; but as it was not, I think something should be put in the Bill to prevent the running up of law costs with regard to these small holdings. As to buildings, the right hon. Gentleman is perfectly right in not allowing the County Council to bear the cost, as you would have no security for them, and they will be put up by the tenant if he is the sort of man to have the holding. I believe the Bill will be a great benefit, and I cannot see why it should not be further improved in Committee if the right hon. Gentleman will only consider some of the suggestions that have been made.

(7.55.) MR. W. C. QUILTER (Suffolk, Sudbury): I cannot allow this Bill to pass without a few words from me, as I take so much interest in the subject. I want to express, very shortly, the objections I hold to some of the proposals of my right hon. Friend. I think he will find it necessary to introduce compulsory powers, for, without them in the background, he will not be able to make arrangements with the landowners. I heartily approve of the County Council as a body to whom these questions must be remitted. In my own county the most interesting question has been the housing of the working classes, and the difficulty we had to meet was the smallness of the area dealt with by the Board of Guardians. It is now found that the County Council is the only body able to deal with questions of this kind on a scale of sufficient magnitude. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will consider whether the limit of £25 may not be reduced. I believe that this Bill will be of considerable benefit to the labouring classes, although I cannot join with my hon. Friend the Member for Bordesley in the sanguine anticipations in which he indulged. I believe that until the Land Laws of this country are radically altered all legislation of this kind will, to a certain extent, be in vain, and I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will pay some heed to the remarks of my right hon. Friend who has just spoken below me, as to the possibility of the law's delays and lawyers' charges being serious hindrances to the carrying out of the provisions of the Bill that is now being introduced.

(8.35.) MR. JOSHUA ROWNTREE (Scarborough): As I understand, from the right hon Gentleman's very clear and able statement, there is to be only one authority under this Bill, the authority of the County Council, and that the County Council will have absolute authority, so far as they think fit, over the whole county area, including, of course, county boroughs. But if that be correct, it means that the non-county boroughs of whatever size, whether Quarter Sessions boroughs or not, or having any general financial relation to the county or not, are really to be treated as non-existent. I may be quite mistaken in this matter, but supposing it is so, however much the boroughs may welcome this Bill on other grounds, I very much fear they would feel bound to protest against this part of it. It would be unjust that boroughs with heavy rates for special purposes of their own should be liable to rates from which, in the great majority of cases, they would derive no benefit. And, further, in many cases, as the right hon Gentleman is no doubt fully aware, where boroughs include in their financial area a large amount of land, and are in some cases large landowners themselves—as in the case of the borough which I have the honour to represent, which owns 500 acres or more of its own—it then would be felt a considerable hardship that another authority should invade the area of the borough, with powers to rate the burgesses, to buy and sell land, to let land and build houses, and fix their own sanitary conditions, all within the area of that municipal borough. I hope that is not proposed by the Bill. If it is proposed I am sure it will be a very strong objection to that part of the Bill.

(8.39.) MR. ROUND (Essex, N.E., Harwich): There are one or two boroughs in the county which I have the honour to represent, having a considerable acreage of land, and they, no doubt, as the hon. Member opposite has pointed out, will look with jealousy on the powers of other authorities to deal with that land. An hon. Gentleman opposite said a short time ago that he wished the time would come when no private property in this country should be sold without the intervention or sanction of some public authority. I think that such a state of things would be very detrimental to private individuals and to the community generally. I rose to offer my thanks to the right hon. Gentleman for bringing in this measure to-night. I think the measure has fallen into good hands. He has always taken a great interest in all matters connected with the agricultural interest in this country, and was instrumental in bringing about the appointment of the Royal Commission for inquiring into the cause of the depression in Agriculture, many of whose recommendations, which I think were most useful, have been carried into effect. There is no one who is familiar with the history of our country districts in former times but must regret the disappearance of the smallholders and old yeomen from the soil, who were a most industrious and useful class, and who have been squeezed out, as it were, by force of circumstances. I trust this effort of the right hon. Gentleman will meet with success. I look upon it as an experiment in the right direction, though I am afraid that if the price of wheat remain as it is now, or as it was last year, 30s. or 32s. a quarter—I am afraid there cannot be much profit made out of the land unless these prices alter. I agree with what an hon. Member said from these Benches a short time ago—that this Bill offers a stepping-stone to the labourers to rise and better themselves. In our wheat-growing districts I do not think the land can be better cultivated than it is now, when it is in the hands of large farmers who understand their business; but no opportunity then arises for labourers to better themselves, and I much prefer to see holdings of different sizes in our rural parishes. This is not the time to discuss the details of this Bill, but I trust the right hon. Gentleman will be able to pass it through this House this Session; and I shall conclude by asking him when the Bill will be printed and laid on the Table of the House?

(8.43.) MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): I rise with considerable satisfaction to congratulate the right hon. Gentleman and Her Majesty's Government for having, as we might say in Scotland, at the long length, recognised that there is such a thing as a land question in Scotland. We who have of late been sitting in this House for three or four years, and hearing the allotments question discussed as applied to England, we did not observe, when we had a Local Government Bill for Scotland passed, a recognition of the fact that there was a land question in Scotland. Her Majesty's Government introduced certain clauses into that Bill, but told the Scottish Members that unless they accepted them en bloc, and as proposed by Her Majesty's Government, no time could be given for discussing the question. On several occasions I reminded the First Lord of the Treasury and the President of the Local Government Board of the promises that they made, that this question would be looked into and remedied at an early date by Her Majesty's Government. But it has been the privilege of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Agriculture for the first time to recognise Scotland in dealing with this question of the allotments and small holdings, and I can assure him that this recognition of Scotland, as comprehended in this Bill, will be looked upon with gratitude on the part of the agriculturists of Scotland. I had a matter suggested to me by my hon. Friend the Member for Scarborough in regard to the question of rating. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Agriculture may recollect that on the passing of the Local Government (Scotland) Bill the rating question was dealt with in a somewhat exceptional manner; the county rate being stereotyped upon the average of a certain number of years. That is to say, a certain number of years of the average rate was taken, and that became the stereotyped rate for the county assessment. Now, what I would wish the right hon. Gentleman to recognise is, that any rate but the stereotyped rate—it was arranged by a clause in the Bill—that any rate beyond the stereotyped rate in after years would be divided between the occupier and the proprietor. I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, in the case of this penny, it will then be a penny on the occupiers and a penny on the proprietors; or whether it will be a penny divided according to the arrangement of that Bill, between occupiers and proprietors? I hope the right hon. Gentleman follows

my statement of the case, and that he will give his attention to the matter before the Bill is drafted. There are only two other points which I wish to bring under the right hon. Gentleman's attention. Speaking, as I have the honour to do, for one of the most agricultural counties in Scotland, I hope the right hon. Gentleman may excuse me in saying that in treating Scotland it must be with regard to Scottish rights and interests, and with considerations which differ in some respects from this Bill as applied to the English counties. There is one consideration I think I ought to press very strongly upon the Government, and that is, that so far as we in Scotland are concerned, we, I think, almost universally recognise that no Bill dealing with either allotments or small holdings will be of any great consequence to Scotland, or will be cared for very much one way or the other in Scotland, unless it is followed up by compulsory powers. I quite recognise what the hon. Member for the Bordesley Division said—that if we had compulsory powers in the Bill the compulsory powers might be very seldom put into execution; but it was the compulsory powers that enabled occupiers and proprietors to come to terms themselves. Therefore, I would strongly impress upon the right hon. Gentleman that he should consider now what has been pointed out to him. And I submit to him that this Bill will be ineffectual unless it contain within its four corners a compulsory power which is to effect the purposes intended. The right hon. Gentleman has said that no help or encouragement would be given to a man who built a house upon a holding which was of less value than £25.

MR. CHAPLIN: The provision in the Bill is that no dwelling-house is to be erected on a holding which is of less value than £25, unless the Local Authority have reason to think that the particular holding is sufficient to maintain the man and his family by the cultivation of the holding, and in that case he may be allowed to erect a dwelling-house.

*MR. ESSLEMONT: I understand the principle, and it is because I understand it so well that I doubt the wisdom of the provision. The right hon. Gentleman says that that class of individuals he wants to maintain in the country—he does not want so much that a man should be kept in the country who has as much land as he can cultivate and keep himself and his family as he does to keep in the country thousands of men who have not, and can never have, as much land; but who, on account of the circumstances of their position, have to make their living by working for others. If that individual, by his frugality and industry, got into the position that he could get into possession of five acres of land on which to make a permanent home for his wife and his children, and hiring out his labour to the neighbouring farmers, why should a disability be put upon this service man, that he should not be allowed to erect his little house upon these five acres of land? Why should I be told, because I am placed in circumstances in which I cannot stock or purchase 25 acres of land, that my wife and family are never to have a home? Why, these are the disadvantages that send the hire classes into the city. The right hon. Gentleman knows Scotland, and he cannot be ignorant of the fact that there is a great deal of dissatisfaction there, from the circumstances that, in order to get those homes, the people have to congregate in the villages in the country. What we want is to give a comprehensive scheme, to give the allotments and small holdings in the district where the labourer exists. The right hon. Gentleman says, "You shall not have a home there." He excludes the labourer under a value of £25. I hope, under these circumstances, the right hon. Gentleman will reconsider this, because, if I understand these conditions, I may at all events press this point upon him, that no harm could result to anybody by the industrial labourer building his house on any number of acres, or even on half an acre, if he can do it. I hope before the Government comes to any settled conclusion on this subject they will give this matter some more consideration, and I assure the right hon. Gentleman that it is one of very great importance, and one of very great interest to the constituency which I have the honour to represent. Unlike the right hon. Member for the Bordesley Division, who says he wishes that the Bill may fructify and grow, I am a practical politician, and therefore I wish that something will accrue the very year after the Act of Parliament is passed. We have been waiting to see some justice done to Ireland, and though very little has been done, something has been done with regard to the agricultural question. But nothing has been done for Scotland. We waited to see England get an Allotments Bill, and afterwards a compulsory Allotments Bill. If you want to preserve the unity of the Empire, and if you do not want to hasten Home Rule, I ask you to mete out equal justice to all parts of Her Majesty's Dominions.

*(9.5.) MR. BROOKFIELD (Sussex, Rye): I desire with very great sincerity to associate myself with the congratulations that have been bestowed upon the right hon. Gentleman for having formulated this very businesslike and comprehensive scheme. The right hon. Gentleman spoke of restoring the old yeoman to his place upon the soil. But the "old yeoman" is a thing of the past, and I much fear we shall never see him again. He disappeared chiefly through his improvidence. He was not at all a thrifty person, though his social habits did obtain for him a certain amount of popularity, but as this measure is to bring about a social rather than an economic change, I hope it will not restore that unthrifty personage. Although in regard to general agricultural sentiments I quite agree with the Minister for Agriculture, I entirely agree with the Member for the Bordesley Division that it will be a mistake, however desirable the sentiment may be, to place these small holders in the position of absolute freeholders, and so enable them, as in the case of the "old yeoman," to have recourse to the nearest solicitor to mortgage their land to him. With regard to what has fallen from my hon. Friend the Member for Kirkeudbright, I think, Sir, notwithstanding the fact that farming on a large scale will not pay, that fruit culture and similar agricultural industries will, especially if the small holding is in any way near a large town. If there is no market near, you had better abandon the idea that Parliament can make farming of any sort pay. Great stress has been laid upon the word "compulsion," which is a favourite word with the friends of liberty in this House. They seem unable to understand how it can be possible to make anyone happy, except at the expense of somebody else. I hope, however, that what has been said in the course of this Debate will strengthen the feeling of the House not to have compulsion if they can avoid it. There is one point which I did not catch in the statement of the right hon. Gentleman. I understood him to say that the Local Authority might provide buildings for which the small holder is to pay—I hope on easy terms. I congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on the Bill he has introduced, and I hope it will be pressed forward and become law without undue delay.

\(9.9.) MR. MUNRO FERGUSON (Leith, &c.):* In the lucid speech of the right hon. Gentleman there was only one omission, and that was in relation to the question as to whether this measure is or is not to extend North of the Tweed. I learned afterwards it was to extend to Scotland, and there is a special point on which the extension should be supported. Scotland, as the right hon. Gentleman knows, is divided into two portions, which are cultivated on very different systems. The Northern part and the Western part are already under legislation different from that known in any other part of Great Britain, and some provisions have already been made with regard to the extension of holdings there which involve the application of a system of compulsory leasing. There are very stringent provisions in the Crofters' Act, and there is a considerable demand for an extension of holdings. If the right hon. Gentleman introduces too many limitations in his Bill its results will not be so large as are expected or required. In the Highland area the rent received from the soil is exceedingly small, and does not, in many cases, represent the outlay on the buildings and improvements. Proprietors can hardly undertake the creation of small holdings, the burden is so great. The only way it can be done is either through some national authority, or some local authority, such as that to which the right hon. Gentleman gives scope for work under his Bill. Until the local authority is allowed to embark on the creation of a peasant proprietary on a considerable scale, very little will be done to meet the land question, which has assumed great proportions in the Highlands. There is great difficulty in fixing the area to which agrarian legislation should apply. I think the land question in the Highlands should be dealt with by the County Councils or local authorities, provided you make the powers of these local bodies sufficiently comprehensive. The hon. Member for Aberdeen mentioned a point as to the size of the holdings on which houses may be erected. The right hon. Gentleman knows that there are comparatively few holdings of £25 in the Highlands, and unless there is to be a prohibition of extending the Crofter areas, this £25 limit of annual value will have to be altered, for otherwise the Bill will be inoperative, in so far as the poorer parts of Scotland are concerned.

\(9.15.) COLONEL EDWIN HUGHES (Woolwich):* I desire to ask a question and to make a suggestion. First, I would ask why the Allotments Acts do not apply to London? There are a number of parishes on the edge of the County of London. There is Eltham with 3,000 acres, and Plumstead with 3,000 acres, only 500 acres of which are covered with buildings. In all these cases, those who want allotments can only get them at a very high price indeed. I do not see why the County of London should be excluded from the provisions of the Acts. There are many labouring men at Eltham and Plumstead who would be glad of the opportunity of getting allotments to occupy themselves with during their spare hours. Another anomaly is, that by the Public Health Act of 1891 Woolwich was placed under the Public Health Act of 1875, and has now become an Urban Sanitary Authority. Consequently, Woolwich will be the only parish in the Metropolis under present circumstances for which it will be necessary to appoint a Committee to act under the Allotments Acts. If this condition of things remains unaltered jealousy will be excited among the people on both sides of Woolwich which will have special advantages that were surely not intended by the framers of the Allotments Acts. Taking London as a whole, I admit there is not much scope for agricultural farms or allotments, but so far as there is scope I do not see any reason why these people should not have the advantages of the Allotments Acts and of this Bill, seeing that they are responsible as taxpayers for the working of the scheme. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will see that there is no ground for jealousy as between one Metropolitan parish and another, and that he will make all the Metropolitan areas alike.

(9.18.) MR. F. S. STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye): Although the right hon. Gentleman in introducing the Bill made an extremely lucid speech, there are one or two points that are still somewhat obscure. In the first place, as regards the financial aspect of the question, it is not evident from what source the money is to come which is to be used by the County Council for putting up buildings—whether it is to come out of the pockets of those who are set up as cultivators, or out of the money the Council will be able to borrow. The second point is whether the interest of 3½ per cent. to be paid by the County Council to the Government is not only to include the payment of interest, but is also to act as a sinking fund, and to include the gradual re-payment of the capital sum. These are two points I hope the right hon. Gentleman will make clear. It seems to me that the criticisms of this measure will crystallize round four principal points. The first point is the absence of the recognition of the principle of compulsion which might be brought to bear on those unwilling to sell their land. There are cases, especially in regard to settled estates, where the principle of compulsion will be absolutely essential to the successful working of this Act. The second point is that of the area. The County Council is too large for the purpose of settling the holdings under this Act, and if it is possible to secure a Local Committee of the County Council and the allotment managers under the Allotments Act, surely it might be possible to arrange for a Committee, consisting partly of members of the County Council and partly of representatives of the different parishes, who might take steps under this scheme for the management and for the provision of small holdings. The third point is the principle of compulsory leasing, which I do not think is open to the objections stated against it by the right hon. Gentleman. The principle is by no means novel. It was introduced in the Scotch Crofters' Act of 1886 by the Member for Bridgeton, it finds a place in the Irish Labourers' Act, and it is difficult to see why it should not have application to England, seeing it would facilitate the action of the county in letting land to applicants. The fourth point is that of price. It is not clear whether there is in the Bill any provision that the land purchased by the County Council for the purpose of small holdings is to be purchased at a fair price. Not only is it desirable that there should be provision as to fair price, but it should be stated on what principle the words "fair price" were used—in short, what constituted a fair price. My hon. Friends the Members for Haddington and Bordesley have raised the question of the perpetual municipal control of these holdings. I have no essential objection to municipal control, nor do I object to the levying of a small quit rent in perpetuity as a sign and symbol of that control. At the same time, if any scheme of this kind is to succeed, it is most desirable that those who buy should have the best means of turning their capital, their energy, and their industry to the best possible account, and they will only be able to do that if they can do what they like with their own, and if they are not liable to arbitrary interference on the part of any body or individual. With this reservation, I agree with the observations of my hon. Friends the Members for Haddington and Bordesley with respect to this point.

MR. CHAPLIN: I have to thank hon. Gentlemen for the manner in which they have received this Bill. I have no reason to be dissatisfied; on the contrary, I have every reason to be pleased with the mode in which it has been accepted, subject to certain reservations made by Members sitting on both sides. As regards the question of compulsion, I do not think I need say anything further, as hon. Gentlemen opposite will have opportunities of expressing their opinions at a later stage upon it. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby took exception, as had likewise been done by other speakers, to the County Councils as not being the most appropriate body for carrying out the provisions of this Bill. If not the County Councils, I want to know what body is more appropriate? The right hon. Gentleman said that unless the Parish Authority was to have control there could not possibly be any life in it. There is one reason which I think is conclusive against the Parish Councils, and that is, that this borrowing power of the parish at the limit fixed would be absolutely inadequate, and that it would not be possible for them to conduct operations of so large a magnitude as is contemplated by the Bill. Then the right hon. Gentleman referred to the question of land being hired as well as the power of purchase. He quoted the Allotments Act as an instance in favour of his argument. But the right hon. Gentleman forgot that in the case of allotments they are only let by the Local Authorities to the occupiers, and are not sold, whereas, in this Bill, one of the main objects we have in view is to sell them, and thus to create an addition to the number of owners of land. A great deal has been said with regard to the limitation which I pointed out was placed on the erection of dwelling-houses upon holdings which did not exceed the annual value of £25. Well, Sir, I am not pledged to that, and I am quite ready to consider any reasonable suggestion on that point. But I would put this question across the Table. Is there to be no limit at all? Because that is the argument which I understand was used by some hon. Gentlemen opposite, notably, by the Member for Aberdeenshire, who asked why a man should not be allowed to build on an acre or half-an-acre of land. I am quite ready to consider the question of the alteration of the present limit, but I repeat that I am totally adverse to any proposal to allow people to erect buildings all over the country on half-acres of ground; and I cannot conceive how the House could agree to such a proposal. I pointed out at the time that as regards these smaller allotments they were designed to meet purely local requirements, and that being so, it is not unreasonable to presume that in a great number of cases the persons to whom they are let or sold will be in possession of houses in which they reside already. But both in regard to this class of holdings and others, hon. Members must also remember this: that in the course of years the instalments will be paid; and whenever the purchase money has been cleared off, they will be free to do with their holdings exactly as they please. The Member for Haddingtonshire referred to something I said in reference to the extravagant prices which had been given in former days for some of the small holdings in Lincolnshire, to which I had referred; and he seemed to find in this statement the argument that compulsion was all the more necessary. But if I gathered anything from the argument of the hon. Member at all, it was this: that compulsion, according to him, was to be used, and used solely for this purpose—namely, that the land might be taken at a value which was considerably less than it was worth. That is an opinion in which I cannot for a moment coincide. Sir, it has also been urged by many hon. Members on that side of the House that some provision should be made in this Bill by which a certain amount of benefit, at all events, should be reserved to the Local Authorities, who, I understood them to desire, should for all time to come have some permanent interest in the property which they acquire. Well, I own that in preparing this Bill, the object I had in view has been rather to consider the benefit of the people who are to occupy these holdings instead of the benefit of the Local Authorities. Although I am quite willing to listen to anything that may be urged upon that point—and I think there are some matters connected with it of considerable importance—I must say that my views still incline chiefly in that direction. Then my hon. Friend the Member for the Bordesley Division criticised, in a friendly spirit, the amount of the purchase money which the Bill requires to be paid down, and he hopes that I may consider the propriety of relaxing, to some extent, that provision. On that, again, I say that, although I think myself that that probably is the limit at which it could best, or most properly be placed, still that is not a matter of principle, and it is one on which I am open to argument. He also called attention to the great dangers, to the probable and future success of this system which might arise from the action of money-lenders, and from the evils of sub-division and subletting. But although I do not pledge myself to the provisions of the Bill, I am strongly under the impression that when he sees the measure, he will find that all these dangers are already guarded against. If they are not, I quite recognise the importance of the subjects to which he has called my attention, and I shall be quite ready to consider them. Then the hon. Member for Essex, sitting behind me asked how the selection was to be made if there were to be an enormous demand for these holdings. Well, I am rather glad to find that he takes so hopeful a view of the operation of the Bill, and I think it will be time to consider what arrangements are to be made for such contingencies when they arise; but, under the circumstances, it seems to me that it is a matter which may well be left to the discretion and the judgment of the County Council, which is composed of men of business perfectly competent to deal with all matters of that kind as they arise. The Member for Merionethshire called attention to the small holdings in Wales which are connected with large grazing areas and in mountain districts of the country; and he desired me specially to direct my attention to those points, which I shall be exceedingly glad to do. But the hon. Gentleman spoke also of the enormous risks to the Local Authorities which will be incurred under the provisions of this Bill. I cannot agree with him upon that point at all. I am not aware of the enormous risks which, under any circumstances, the Local Authority would be called upon to encounter; and indeed, if I were of that opinion, I should not have felt myself justified in proposing any measure which would possibly have that effect. Nor do I think that he has any reasonable ground for the supposition. I take Clause 11 of the Bill, and I find that that clause provides that the County Council shall not acquire land under this Act save at such price that, in the opinion of the Council, all expenses incurred by the Council in relation to land will be recouped out of the purchase money of the land sold by the Council, or, in the case of land let, out of the rent; and they shall fix the purchase money or the rent at such reasonable amount as will, in their opinion, guard them against loss. Well, I think that is a reasonable provision, and one which ought to have the effect which it is intended to have, of relieving the County Council of the enormous risk.

MR. T. ELLIS: They must accept the risk of the price.

MR. CHAPLIN: Of course they must buy the land by agreement, and must take it at the market value. It will be open to them to buy as it will be for me to sell, and I hope that in some circumstances I myself will be able to sell some land for holdings at a price which will be mutually agreeable to the purchaser and to myself. The Member for Kirkcudbright asked me if the Bill would apply to the two countries. Yes, Sir; the Bill applies to Scotland as well as to England; and I am glad to think that that proposal meets with the favour of the numerous Members representing Scotland who have taken part in the Debate to-night.

MR. A. SUTHERLAND: Does it apply to Scotland without any exception whatever?

MR. CHAPLIN: Yes, without exception. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Great Grimsby spoke of a perpetual quit-rent. That is a subject which has received the support of many other Members; and he made proposals to me which would have the effect, to some extent at all events, of varying the provisions under which, as at present in the Bill, the purchase money is to be paid. I own that, so far as I have been able to consider the matter up to the present, I prefer the provisions in the Bill to the provisions he has suggested. But I entirely agree with him as to the inexpediency of lending money to the purchaser for the purpose of making buildings. The hon. Member for Scarborough and the hon. Member for Greenwich referred to Councils of boroughs; and they expressed some apprehension that, in the first place, the Borough Council would be overridden by the County Council; and I think I understood the hon. Member to complain that the County of London was entirely excluded from the operation of the Bill. As far as I understand the measure myself, that is not the case. The 1st clause provides that "if the Council of any county are of opinion that there is a demand for small holdings," &c., they may proceed to put the Bill in operation; and the definitions of the Bill provide this: that the expression "County Council" shall include the Council of a county borough; and therefore, I think these fears will be allayed. Now, Sir, I think I have dealt with most of the observations which have been made in the course of this Debate.

MR. ESSLEMONT: What about the question of the rate?

MR. CHAPLIN: I am afraid I quite forgot what the question was.

MR. ESSLEMONT: My question was whether this Bill would stereotype the rate, according to the Scotch Local Government Bill, by dividing it between the occupier and the proprietor, or whether it would fall entirely on the proprietor.

MR. CHAPLIN: I apprehend it will follow what is the custom in Scotland.

SIR C. J. PEARSON: Yes.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Hear, hear!

MR. CHAPLIN: The point ought to have attracted my attention more closely perhaps, but I think it is exactly as my right hon. Friends have stated, that in Scotland it will be a divided rate, following the practice which is usual there. Well, Sir, in regard to any other questions which may have been raised in the course of this discussion, some of which it is quite possible I have omitted, I can only say that before we proceed to a further stage of this Bill, they shall receive, one and all, my careful consideration; and, to some extent I have no doubt, I may be able to meet the views of hon. Members.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: What about confining the buildings on the small holdings to people who actually live in the locality?

MR. CHAPLIN: Yes; that is so. The Bill provides at present that the small holdings are to be purchased by the County Council for the labouring population in the county, and for persons who are resident in the county, and who desire themselves to cultivate a holding. But that is a matter I will take into consideration, and upon which I should be sorry to commit myself at present.

MR. F. S. STEVENSON: Will the right hon. Gentleman say where the money to provide buildings is to come from?

MR. CHAPLIN: I think I have explained the intentions of the Government with regard to buildings in the opening statement I made. The adaptation of the buildings in the Bill will be included as part of the purchase money.

MR. ROWNTREE: I am sorry that my question was not clear, but I asked whether the non-county boroughs were to be virtually non-existent, and placed entirely under the County Councils.

MR. CHAPLIN: Yes, Sir.

Motion agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Chaplin, Mr. Balfour, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, and Mr. Long.

NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND) BILL.

MOTION FOR LEAVE.

*THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N. Mr. Speaker, in asking leave to introduce the Bill for dealing with the question of education in Ireland, I may perhaps be allowed to refer very shortly to the circumstances in which we find ourselves, and which cause us to have to deal with this question of education. The House is aware that last year a grant of money was made, the result of which has been practically the freeing of education in England and Scotland. Following that grant there has been placed at the disposal of Ireland a sum which I may call, for the purpose of shortness, the equivalent grant for Ireland; and this, therefore, seems to me an opportunity for attempting to deal with a very important question, and putting, if possible, elementary education in Ireland on a broader and, I hope, a more efficient basis. Sir, the House is aware that the question of education in Ireland is one in which the Irish people take a very great and a very deep interest. For a long time, in fact, Ireland made more progress in its educational machinery, at one period in its history, than this country. Since 1831, when the National Education Commissioners were established, we have been indebted to the National Education Commissioners for very great and valuable services; and I would desire to take this opportunity of expressing a sense of appreciation of the valuable work which has been done by that body almost unique in Ireland, being a body which depends entirely upon its reward upon its own conscientious conviction of duty discharged, a body which has won the respect of all those who have been brought into contact with it, and which, in another degree, has set, I think, a great example, an example of great encouragement—I mean the fact that we have there a body, differing it may be in political principles, differing sharply—it is the fact—in their religious principles; and yet, so far as I know, there has never been any occasion on which difficulties have arisen either from politics or from religion in connection with that important administration. This, Sir, I think is a very encouraging feature, and one which redounds very much to the credit of the body of the Commissioners, whom we call the National Educational Commissioners of Ireland. They have carried on their duties under great difficulties sometimes. They have had great difficulties to contend with; or rather, perhaps, I might say, they have not had the great advantages which have been possessed by those who have had to discharge the duties connected with education either in this country or in Scotland. Since the year 1872 the average attendance in the national schools in Ireland has shown a steady and continuous increase. This may be due partly to the fact that at that time there was introduced a system which gave to the teachers some interest in the results of their work. Be that as it may, I want to press this point upon the attention of the House: that in 1872 practically the average attendance in Ireland, compared with the population of Ireland, ran neck and neck with the average attendance in England. Since that time, notwithstanding a diminishing population, the average attendance in the Irish national schools has shown a gradual and almost continuous increase. I may give the House just three or four figures which show the position. In 1872 the number of children in average attendance was 355,000, leaving out the odd figures; in 1876 it was 416,000; in 1880 it was 468,000; and in 1890 it was 489,000. Taken, as I say, in conjunction with the fact that during this period there has been a diminishing population, these results are not entirely unsatisfactory, especially when we bear in mind—and I ask leave to point this out to the House—that the conditions of the systems in Ireland and in England are not the same. There is a considerable difference in the systems. In England the unit with which the English Educational Department has to deal is rather the Local Authority. Practically, the English Department deals only with the questions of inspection and of certificates. In Ireland the relations of the State to education are very different. The Education Commissioners in Ireland not only deal with the individual schools, but they regulate and fix the salaries of the various classes of teachers in these schools; and, therefore, they have a far larger responsibility as regards the question of education generally than has the Education Department in this country. I need not remind the House that, whilst speaking roundly, the State contributes in England and Scotland about two-fifths of the cost of education; the State contributes in Ireland about four-fifths of the cost of education. In Ireland the remuneration of the teachers is, as I have said, fixed by the Education Commissioners, and they are brought, therefore, more directly in contact with the individual teachers and the individual schools. There is, again, another point to which I must make reference in passing; and that is, that the question of religion in Ireland has a very considerable influence on the question of education. It is true that the system in Ireland was planned and intended to provide for and to promote what has been called "combined secular and separate religious instruction." But it is also true that by the continuous efforts, both of the Protestants and of the Roman Catholics, there has been the gradual growth of unmixed schools; and the result is that we have in Ireland what almost amounts practically to a system of denominational education.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear!

*MR. JACKSON: I know my hon. Friend wishes—I will not say believes—that that was not the fact. But my hon. Friend knows that this tendency has been growing, and not from one side only but from both sides. There has been an increasing disposition, both on the part of the Roman Catholics and of the Protestants, to provide separate schools wherever they had a number of children sufficient to enable them to ask for a separate school to be provided. Speaking personally, and expressing only my own individual opinion, I regret that such should be the fact. I believe that the mixed schools have been of great service. The example that I have just quoted—of the body of Educational Commissioners themselves—of the good service they have performed in Ireland, leads me to the conclusion, along with other circumstances which have come to my knowledge, that it would be to the advantage of Ireland, it would be to the advantage of both Parties and of both denominations, that they should be brought together in contact as much as possible, and, by experience, taught that they could live and work together, each of them rendering good service to the State. I come now to a point of still greater importance, and that is the question of attendance at the schools. I need not remind the House that in 1870, when the Education Act was passed for this country, there was instituted at that time a system of what was called compulsory attendance. For a period of time it was what I may call optional upon the Local Bodies to adopt it or not, and for a time there was no very general application of it. But in 1876, I think it was, an Act was passed which made the bye-laws compulsory; and I will give the House one or two figures which show the extraordinary strides which the average attendance at the schools in this country made from the particular date to which I have referred. It is true that Ireland was excluded, I would say, from the compulsory clauses—I had almost said from the benefits of the compulsory clauses—of that Act. In 1872, then, the number of children examined in England was 661,000, again leaving out the odd figures, which represented 2·86 of the population of the country. In 1876 that percentage rose from 2·86 to 4·69 of the population. In 1880 it rose to 7·44 of the population; in 1884 it rose to 8·63 of the population; in 1890 it rose to 8·83 of the population. Perhaps the results will impress themselves more upon the minds of hon. Members of this House if I give just these five figures showing the average attendance at the schools in these periods. In 1873 the average attendance in the English schools was 1,314,000; in 1876 it was 1,984,000; in 1880 it had risen to 2,594,000; and in 1890 it had risen to 3,717,000. Sir, these are remarkable figures, and they show what an enormous stride was made in the average attendance in the schools of this country following upon the measure which was taken at that time. In 1890—and this is almost the last figure that I shall quote. But let me first say that, as I have already told the House, in 1872 the average attendance in England and Ireland respectively, compared with the population, was what I have called neck and neck. In 1890 the average attendance, as compared with the numbers on the register in England, equalled nearly 80 per cent.; whilst in Ireland the average attendance, in proportion to the number on the rolls of the whole of Ireland, was not quite 60 per cent.; and therefore the position is this: that whilst they were relatively equal in 1872, in 1890 they had fallen away in Ireland until they were 20 per cent. behindhand. I may put the figures in another way, which I think will bring them more clearly home to Members in this House. If you take the population of the respective countries, and test the average attendance compared with the population of the three countries, these are the facts. Taking the population of England at 29,000,000, we have an average attendance in the schools of 3,750,000, or 12·9 per cent. of the population. In Scotland, with a population of 4,000,000, an average attendance of 519,000 children, or 13 per cent. of the population. Bearing in mind that Scotland perhaps compares, in some respects, more nearly with Ireland than it does with England—for there are districts in Scotland remote and difficult of access, which possibly may have thrown the calculation a little on the other side—what are the facts in Ireland? With a population of 4,700,000, you have an average attendance of about 490,000, or about 10·4 per cent. of the population.

**MR. JACKSON:* I take the estimate from the Census of 1891, which puts the population of Ireland at 4,700,000, and I take the average attendance during the year 1890, giving a little turn to it because it has rather increased since.

MR. J. O'KELLY: Will the right hon. Gentleman say whether he is using the same Census for the three populations?

*MR. JACKSON: Yes, Sir; but now let me put the figures in another way. Supposing you apply to Ireland the figures which I have shown in England and Scotland, namely, 13 per cent. you get this result: that 13 per cent. of the 4,700,000 ought to give you an average attendance in your schools of 611,000; but you have about 490,000, and therefore the net result is that you have from 110,000 to 120,000 children in Ireland who ought to be in school, and who are not in school. Now, Sir, I think if any figures could convince the Members of this House that it is necessary to devise some means by which we can bring into the national schools in Ireland the children who ought to be there, the figures I have quoted are conclusive on that point.

MR. M. J. KENNY: Will the right hon. Gentleman give the number of pupils who present themselves annually for examination?

*MR. JACKSON: Well, I believe it would in no sense alter the proportion I have given, and it certainly would not affect the percentage, however good. I take the hon. Member's point to be this. I can imagine his saying: Though the attendance may not be so good in Ireland, the quality of education is better, because we pass a large percentage in examinations. But my answer to him would be at once that if the material is so good, and if the teaching is so good, why should you not bring within the scope of it the whole of the children who are capable of being brought. I think these figures point to the fact that we must devise some means by which we can bring within the education facilities which are provided in Ireland this large body of children who, at present, suffer from the want of it, and this points clearly in the direction that one of the measures to be taken is to provide in some form for applying to Ireland the principle of compulsory attendance. The idea of applying compulsory attendance to Ireland is not new to the House. In 1877, Mr. O'Shaughnessy, who was at that time a Member of the House, brought forward a Motion implying the principle of compulsory attendance in its application to Ireland. That Motion was—I will not say refused, but he was appealed to, as we are from time to time, to be satisfied with the discussion—and a very interesting discussion it was, as anyone will see who reads it now—and with having raised the important question, and he was satisfied with having done so. In 1883 he brought forward again a somewhat similar Motion, which affirmed the principle of compulsory attendance, coupled with a condition that possibly it might be necessary in some districts to modify it in its application to Ireland. That Motion was accepted unanimously by this House. In 1885 the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Stirling Burghs, who at that time filled the office of Chief Secretary, introduced to this House a Bill which not only embodied the principle of compulsory attendance, but also provided for several other matters connected with education in Ireland. The principle was not only recognised, but it was also applied; and I think I may say that in recent years we have witnessed in many quarters of great influence a great change in the direction of the acceptance of the principle of compulsion. I have seen lately a report of an interesting speech, made by the Bishop of Limerick, in which he accepts, as I take it, the principle of compulsion. It is true he points out that he thinks that in applying this principle to Ireland there should be careful consideration of the varying conditions of Ireland, and with that I have no reason to find fault. It is the duty of those who propose legislation of that kind to take into account the different conditions, and as far as possible to propose measures which are likely to create the least friction and be the most beneficial. If we could once get the principle of compulsory attendance tried in Ireland, I think no one would deny that the value of it must be very great. It is not only that you get into your schools a larger number of children in average attendance, but from an educational point of view you have the still more important fact that you get more regular and continuous attendance in your schools, and that is a matter of very great importance. In the Bill I am asking to introduce we have endeavoured to provide, as far as we can, a system of compulsory attendance which, whilst we attempt to apply it to certain parts of Ireland without delay, shall, at the same time, possess a certain amount of elasticity, and of consideration for the various conditions of the population of Ireland. I see my hon. Friend the Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) shakes his head, but I would appeal to him, if it is necessary to do so, to consider this: It is as clear as daylight that if you will once apply to any portion of Ireland the principle of compulsory attendance, and see its beneficial effects, there can be no doubt that the average attendance—the improved attendance—in those districts will be such that no other district in Ireland will long remain without the same advantages. Therefore, I attach more importance, it may be, to the introduction and acceptance of the principle than to its immediate application throughout the whole length and breadth of Ireland. But there is another reason which I shall allude to presently, which will explain to some extent why we propose to take the course we do. In this Bill—and it follows the system in England, and also, I may say, the lines of the Bill introduced by the right hon. Gentleman in 1885—we propose to make it the duty of the parent to send his child to school between the ages of 6 and 14. We propose to make it illegal to employ children at all under 11 years, and also to make it illegal to employ them between 11 and 14 years of age, unless they get a certificate of proficiency. I may say that this part of the Bill applies—

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Does it apply to the agricultural districts?

*MR. JACKSON: This part of the Bill, I was going to say, applies, and applies immediately, to towns under Corporations and towns under Town

Commissioners. I believe it may be stated, speaking broadly, that that represents only one-fourth of the population of Ireland. But one reason why we have adopted this plan is that the means for enforcing this compulsory attendance is to be provided by the School Attendance Committee appointed by the Local Authority. The Local Authority in the case of the Corporations of towns we have ready to our hands; and we provide in the Bill that all Local Authorities created in the future, whether County Councils or Baronial Councils, may apply this part of the Act to their districts. Therefore we are making, at present, arrangements for the towns, and we are making provision that as soon as the Local Government Bill is passed, the Local Authorities so set up shall have power to apply this part of the Act, and so cover all the districts in Ireland. But I have said that the School Attendance Committee is to be appointed by the Local Authority, and we have thought it desirable to provide some elasticity ~~as~~ regards the attendance to be given, ~~in~~ order to comply with the Act. ~~W~~ recognise that it may be necessary ~~and~~ desirable that we should not exact possibly the same number of attendances ~~in~~ the agricultural districts in Ireland ~~than~~ you exact in the town population; ~~and~~ in order to give that elasticity, ~~w~~ propose to leave to the Education Commissioners the power to determine ~~an~~ regulate the number of attendance which it is necessary to make ~~in~~ each district within the area ~~of~~ each School Attendance Committee. That, I think, will give the elasticity which will meet the views of the hon. Member for South Tyrone. In the Bill of 1885 it was proposed that the number of attendances should be 150. Well, now, 150 may be a very good number or it may not for all parts of Ireland, but we leave it to the Education Commissioners. The tendency will be always to screw up the attendance to that which is found to be possible in the very best attended schools in Ireland. Therefore, it will work automatically in the direction of screwing up the attendances from time to time.

MR. J. MORLEY: Do we understand that the application of compulsion is to be optional on the part of the County Council when it is created, but not optional on the Town Commissioners?

*MR. JACKSON: As the Bill is drawn it stands with the word "may." It is compulsory as regards towns under Town Councils and Town Commissioners, and it stands with the word "may" in the Bill in regard to its application to Local Authorities to be constituted hereafter. But I quite appreciate the point of the right hon. Gentleman, and if I can feel sure that I shall have his assistance in turning that word "may" into "shall," I shall be glad to avail myself of it. Now, Sir, I come to another part of the Bill which is, perhaps, after all, the part which will interest most Members of the House, and that is the financial part; and here, Sir, I must take the opportunity of reminding the House of the position in which we stand as regards Ireland in his matter. We have a sum of about £90,000 due to Ireland for the current financial year—that is to say, for the year ending on the 31st of next month. It proposed, as hon. Members are aware, to dispose of that £90,000 by means of a vote of this House in the form of a supplementary Estimate, and it may be inconvenient—and probably hon. Members would prefer—that I should state now how is proposed to deal with the £90,000. In, there have been indications that for some time past that Members of this House, the great body of school teachers in Ireland, and others, have been taking considerable interest in the question of teachers' pensions. The question put to me to-day was practically to ask whether, in accordance with the understanding when the Teachers' Pension Fund was established, there had been the usual periodic revision and actuarial calculation showing the present position of the fund. I am sure this House will tell that there would be, and naturally would be, great disappointment on the part of those teachers who have contributed towards that fund, and who are looking forward to the time when they may expect to derive the benefit and pension they have earned from it, there would be, I say, great disappointment if it were felt that there was any doubt as to the permanence and solvency of the fund. Sir, it is my duty to say that the revision, which the accounts of the fund have recently undergone, has shown that the benefits which have been, or are being given, or the contributions being made, either the one is too great or the other is too small, and the consequence is that the fund shows a tendency towards getting into backwater; and under these circumstances I think there can be no doubt that the duty is imposed upon us, and I think it would be the view of the teachers themselves that this £90,000, which is neither more nor less than a windfall, should be utilised for the purpose of aiding the capital sum of the Teachers' Pension Fund, and it will be my duty to propose to the House that the sum for the current year shall be handed over to the fund for the purpose of improving its position. Now, Sir, we have, further, a sum in round figures for the ensuing year at our disposal of, say, £200,000. The House is aware that this is an equivalent grant to the grant given to England and Scotland, which in England and Scotland produced free schools for the population of those two countries, and I gather, so far as I am able to gather from the opinions of those who are justified in speaking with authority, there is a feeling in Ireland that whatever is done with this money one of our first objects should be, if we cannot free the whole of the schools in Ireland from school pence, we should free the largest portion of them with the money at our disposal. I think I shall be able to show that this proposal is a perfectly reasonable one, and meets with acceptance in the opinions of those to whose opinions great respect attaches. I believe it also meets with the acceptance of all the people of Ireland. I take it there can be no question about its being desirable to the teachers in Ireland, because they would benefit by it. There is no doubt that it is a very important question; and the Bill proposes that, under certain conditions, there shall be a considerable proportion of the schools in Ireland freed from school pence. There have been, I need hardly say, a great many suggestions made for dealing with the £200,000, which have reached me. I have had the advantage of seeing the report of a great meeting held in Dublin, presided over by the Archbishop of that city, in which was evinced what I suppose is the opinion, mainly, of the Protestants of Ireland. At that meeting there was a very decided expression of opinion in favour of applying the money in the shape of additions to class salaries. I have had the advantage of seeing, following that, the opinions expressed by the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Dublin, in which he took a strong line in the extreme opposite direction, that the money should be granted in the form of capitation grants. I have had the advantage of hearing from a deputation of teachers, who waited upon me, their views as to the particular form they would desire, and so far as I am able to judge, although starting off with the view that it would be desirable to appropriate the money in class salaries, they have modified their views, and are now of opinion that it might be disposed of rightly and properly, partly in one way and partly in the other. They have expressed fears lest, if the whole be given in the form of capitation grant, they may be placed at the will of parents, and their remuneration depend too much on the school fees. Now, I do not think the result of fees on attendance in Ireland shows anything except that it has been beneficial both to the children and the teachers. I have had the advantage of seeing the view taken by the great Presbyterian Body, and also the view recently expressed at a meeting of Roman Catholic Bishops. I should like to mention at this point what appears to me to be rather an important fact, and one which, perhaps, gives us a certain amount of freedom of action, which otherwise we might have felt some difficulty about, and that is the effect in pounds, shillings, and pence of the application of the general methods of distribution of this money on the great divisions of the Roman Catholic and Protestant populations of Ireland. I have had certain calculations made; I have had the question tested in order to ascertain what would be the effect of applying the money wholly in class salaries, what would be the effect of applying the whole of the money in capitation grants, and what would be the effect of applying half in one way and half in the other. I am told that these calculations show that there is practically no difference whatever in the aggregate amount of money which will go to Roman Catholics and Protestants respectively, whichever plan we may adopt. That is a very important matter, I think, because it leaves us, at all events, more freedom, without creating unnecessary friction, without doing injustice to either of these great denominations. It leaves us a little more freedom as regards the distribution.

MR. O'KELLY (Roscommon, N.): If the whole of the money were applied to the abolition of school fees what would be the effect? How far would it go?

*MR. JACKSON: I do not quite appreciate the hon. Gentleman's question. I was pointing out——

MR. O'KELLY: I beg the right hon. Gentleman's pardon. What would be the effect on the school fees if the whole sum were applied to abolish the fees all over Ireland?

*MR. JACKSON: I did not quite catch the question. I think I may answer it by this fact. He may take it that the whole school fees in Ireland are represented by about £104,000, and therefore to really abolish the whole of the fees would absorb about half the amount in our hands. Well, Sir, I have said that I have had a great many suggestions, but I have not felt it in my power to accept in their entirety any of the proposals that have been made. It has come to my knowledge, and I think it is in the knowledge of a great many of the Members of this House for Ireland, that there has been for some time past a feeling that teachers in Ireland are not very adequately or liberally paid. It has also been brought to my attention that the class of assistant teachers, failing to get beyond that position, may go on for a great number of years on a very small and, I must say, inadequate salary. There are, therefore, little grievances of that kind which, I think, it is desirable to take advantage of this opportunity to endeavour to remedy. We propose to make an addition to the class salaries of teachers. We propose to make some improvement in the remuneration of assistant teachers who have seven years of service as assistant teachers. We propose to make a little provision in order to improve the position of the smallest schools in Ireland. The smallest schools in Ireland, I will remind the House, are not confined to one denomination; they belong to both denominations, and, therefore, it is not a question of religion. We propose to make a capitation grant practically of the balance. Stated roughly, the apportionment of the money will take the form of half in capitation grants and one-half in the other directions I have indicated. For these benefits which we propose to confer we propose to ask something in return; we propose to ask that all schools, the fees of which do not exceed 6s. per child per annum, shall in future be free from school fees. It may be asked why I have suggested 6s. I will tell the House. I recognise the principle that it is desirable not only to compensate the teacher for the abolition of school fees, but also to give him a little improvement in his position in addition. The total sum at our disposal practically represents 8s. per head on the average attendance. I should have been glad if it had been possible to obtain enough for the abolition up to the point of 8s., but, as hon. Members will see, if that were done the teachers in schools, the fees of which were 8s. per head per annum, would gain no benefit whatever under the Bill. Therefore I have, in order, if you like, to make a compromise—for it is a compromise—adopted 6s. as the limit, in order to leave the teacher something in addition to the compensation that is given for the abolition of school fees. The effect of this distribution will be this—and I must not conceal it from the House—that it will give the greater benefit to the poor districts and the poor schools than to the larger and better schools. I do not know that that in itself is unjust or ought of necessity to be objected to. I have now practically given to the House all the information—

COLONEL NOLAN: Anything for the Christian Brothers?

MR. JACKSON: I do not know about the Christian Brothers. The Christian Brothers, if they come under the Act, will benefit by it. I omitted to mention that where there are in Ireland schools paid by capitation grant and not by class salaries, it will, of course, be necessary to make an augmented capitation grant in order to compensate for the addition to the class salaries. I apologise for detaining the House at such length. The question is a most important one. There have been measures, no doubt, from time to time introduced into this House which seemed to be of greater importance, but I venture to think that if we can devise some means by which the benefits of education shall be extended to the whole of the children of Ireland of school age; if we can bring within its influence the whole of these children, we shall confer, not only upon the children of Ireland a great advantage, but we shall confer upon Ireland itself a great advantage, and I feel that I shall not appeal in vain to the Members of this House when I ask them to help. It may be that in some of its details the Bill may not meet with the unanimous approval of the House. I believe, however, that it is fairly constructed, that it is equitable in its distribution, and I think I may appeal with confidence to the Members of this House to endeavour to make it a success.

*(10.45.) MR. JUSTIN McCARTHY (Londonderry): I am sure we all heard with the deepest interest the statement of the right hon. Gentleman, and I am equally sure we are all willing and resolved to give his measure, which he has so lucidly explained, the very fullest consideration. The right hon. Gentleman made a clear statement, but at the same time the Bill is a very complex measure, necessarily a very complex measure, dealing with a complicated question, and in a case like that the clearer the statement in which it is explained the more the difficulties and complications become apparent. Of course, we do not intend to offer any opposition at this stage of the measure, and I am bound to say we recognize very cordially some good things and some benefits in the measure as it has been sketched out by the right hon. Gentleman. At the same time I think there are many faults in it, into the details of which I shall not go at the present moment. I think the right hon. Gentleman might have made some provision for recognising the great claims of the schools of the Christian Brothers. I did not understand from him that they are included in the benefits of this measure. I think that the standard of seven years for the assistant teachers is surely rather high. Then the right hon. Gentleman made a comparison between the progress of education in Ireland and in England, as shown by the attendance at schools. At one time, he said, they ran neck and neck, which is a very good and clear expression, but that, later on, one went forward—that while England had gone forward, Ireland had fallen back. But is it not a fact that things have taken place in Ireland which made popular education in Ireland at one time less palatable than it was before? Of course, I understand that the right hon. Gentleman compared the national schools of Ireland with the national schools of England. But then again you leave out of the calculation all the teaching under the Christian Brothers, and all the teaching in the many other such voluntary schools of the country; and I fancy if all were put together, the Irish people would be found not behind, not running neck and neck, but even in advance of the education of children in English schools. The right hon. Gentleman spoke at some length on the question of compulsion. I never understood that there was, in Ireland, any absolute objection to the principle of compulsion, provided there was a certain amount of care in the time, the development, and the application of it. The right hon. Gentleman has spoken as to the necessity of elasticity in the application of the principle. What we want to know is, whether the elasticity is to be elastic enough, and whether the elasticity always means that it will be elastic at the right time, and in the right places. Again, the right hon. Gentleman seemed to make his measure a little too much a companion to that valuable measure the Local Government Bill, which is about to be introduced for the extreme benefit of the people of Ireland. I think the right hon. Gentleman made a little too much a Calais-Dourres consortship of the two measures in the palliative principle to be applied to Ireland. I should recommend the right hon. Gentleman to rest his measure on principles wholly independent of that other measure which it is barely possible may never be passed into law. On the whole, I have to say that we do certainly recognize some points of advantage in this measure. I admit cordially the sincerity of the right hon. Gentleman in his experiment to try and satisfy the wishes of all classes of the Irish people, and I can only say that we desire to give the measure full consideration. The matter is a complicated one, but I can assure the House that we are anxious to give the measure fair and full hearing.

(10.50.) COLONEL WARING (Down, N.): I do not wish to intrude upon the time of the House at any length upon this question. I can only say that I agree with the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down in recognising that this measure is well intended, and may result in great advantage to the people of Ireland. At the same time, I know how very different a measure may be when we see it in black and white, to what we think it is when laid before the House by a right hon. Gentleman on the Front Bench, and I shall therefore reserve any decided opinion until I shall see it presented to the House in the form of a Bill. One suggestion I earnestly agree with, and that is as to the use proposed to be made of the £90,000. I think that no reasonable person could object to it. As to what should be done about the other sum, I should like to see how the figures work out. At the same time, I think the Bill is one which, with some little alterations that will be made in Committee, may be rendered a fairly satisfactory measure to all parties in Ireland. I do not intend to delay the House with any further remarks.

(10.55.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I am sorry I cannot agree with the right hon. Gentleman in regard to the £90,000. I think that is the weak point of the whole Bill. The Chief Secretary for Ireland called it a windfall, and it appears that when the Chief Secretary for Ireland gets a windfall he can do what he likes with it. That is his view. I do not think it at all. It is Ireland's share of taxation on whisky and tobacco, and whisky is taxed in Ireland because it is one of our chief products.

An hon. MEMBER : Scotch.

COLONEL NOLAN : I do not thank my Government for the share of that sum. I think Ireland has got a little less than her share, and I think it was not quite reasonably calculated as to its being windfall.

MR. JACKSON : I did not mean that was so much a windfall to Ireland; what I meant was that it was more a windfall to the teachers.

COLONEL NOLAN : My point is this, that he has not improved the pensions, as he hoped he will in the Bill. If he would use the pensions, or make them commence at an earlier age, it would be an advantage to the teachers, but all he has done is to use this money, which is purely Irish money, to remedy the errors of his own calculations. It was not the Irish Members who settled the rate of pensions. They have made their calculations wrong, and they now propose to put the matter right by using this £90,000, without giving any additional benefit to the teachers. Nothing additional is to be done for the teachers; they are to get no higher rate of pension. It is not to date from an earlier time, as the Treasury made all these wrong calculations with our money.

MR. GOSCHEN : It is not the Treasury that made these calculations. The hon. Member will find he is in error, and that the Treasury was not responsible.

MR. T. M. HEALY : Who then?

COLONEL NOLAN : As the right hon. Gentleman never allowed an Irishman to be Chancellor of the Exchequer, we are, of course, in a certain amount of mist. But I need not go further. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer may toss over responsibility from one Department to another, but it seems to us in Ireland to be pretty much the same thing. I dare say he is playing on some official difference between the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Educational Department in Ireland, who are responsible to the Treasury. Of course the Chancellor of the Exchequer has a natural wish to disclaim, and for his own peace of mind I will grant the disclaimer; but the English Government is responsible, and the Irish Members have no responsibility, as they have had nothing to do with it. I must say that the Treasury has muddled away this money, and I repeat, either the pensions should be raised, or they should be made to date from an earlier age. On the whole, I think the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary as to the £200,000 a year very judicious, and I think he has hit the medium pretty fairly between class and capitulation. I am sorry that nothing has been done for the Christian Brothers, and am glad that the hon. Member for Londonderry has referred to that point. I would like to explain that the Christian Brothers are the link between primary and secondary education in Ireland, and they do not get a penny of public money except under the head of science and art. The reason why they do not get any money is because they insist upon having certain Christian emblems in their schools. They represent the voluntary principle in Ireland, and yet they are excluded from all benefit under the Bill. I think this argument was used by the Bishop of Limerick, as to how the system of the Chief Secretary is going to work: that the Christian Brothers are in towns and only in towns, and in a great many towns there are no other Catholic schools. So that in the very place where you are going to make education compulsory you will have chiefly the Christian Brothers' schools, and you are going to compel the children to attend those schools; the Christian Brothers are to receive no benefit. The Christian Brothers' schools in Ireland represent the voluntary principle in Ireland. The plate goes round in the chapels, and subscriptions are sent in. The Christian Brothers give their own time practically for nothing; but they are kept and supported by the voluntary principle in Ireland. If you drive all the children into these schools, we say, at any rate, give us something. These are the very people excluded from pensions and benefits under this Bill. As to the general question of compulsion, I think the Chief Secretary has been rather in a hurry to apply the principle, not only to the towns, but to the country. I am speaking entirely for myself, though not wholly for myself, but as at present instructed by my constituency. It is possible my constituency might say that they wished to be compelled to send their children to school, but my impression is that they would object; but it is possible that they may change their minds on the subject. But I should say at present that the rural population do not want to be driven into the schools. The right hon. Gentleman should recollect that in Ireland the distances from the schools are long, and the climate generally wet. I would advise the right hon. Gentleman for the present not to apply the compulsory system in the rural districts, unless the rural population vote for it.

MR. JACKSON: That is the proposal of the Bill.

COLONEL NOLAN: I know that is the proposal of the Bill, but some hon. Gentlemen seem to be anxious to go further. What I say is, the Chief Secretary has been urged to go further than the Bill; I advise him not to go further than the Bill at present. There is another point in the way of statistics, which I hope the Chief Secretary will look into. He seems to think that the number of children of school-going age bears the same relation to the population in Ireland as they do in England and Scotland. There is a very great difference in Ireland.

MR. JACKSON: That is so. As a matter of fact, the number of children is what is called within the total on the rolls, and, therefore, is within the number having made one attendance at the school.

COLONEL NOLAN: I do not think the right hon. Gentleman has quite grasped my point. My point is this: I do not know that the number of children in relation to the population is the same in Ireland as in England and Scotland. With regard to the number in attendance, the whole population of England and Scotland is chiefly urban, and the whole population of Ireland is chiefly rural, so that I do not think it fair to compare the two. Of course, there are districts in Scotland—for instance, the Highlands—where the difficulties as to distances and climate are as great as in Ireland. I think the right hon. Gentleman should correct his figures with reference chiefly to the rural population. However, on the whole, I really think the Bill might have been very much worse. It is a very good Bill, with the exception of the provision about the £90,000, which is simply being confiscated. I think this is a Bill which ought to be passed; and I should like to see it passed during the present Session. I hope the Government will give priority to this Education Bill over the Local Government Bill, because, whatever may be said in favour of the Local Government Bill, it does not bring us any money whatever.

(11.10.) MR. JOHN O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): I agree with my hon. and gallant Friend that the Bill before the House might easily be a worse one, but I am very far from saying that it could not have been better in some of its details. I am sure that when it arrives at the Committee stage we shall be able to make it more perfect than it is. I am glad to find that at last the poor teachers of Ireland and their claims are going to be recognised. With that part of the Bill I heartily agree; although I should be very sorry indeed if any surplus in the hands of the Government should be entirely devoted to the amelioration of the condition of the teachers, because the National School teachers of Ireland, for whom I have pleaded in this House for many years, are not above human nature, and very possibly they might desire more than we should be inclined to give them. For year after year I have endeavoured to press upon Government after Government, and particularly the Government now in Office, the grievances of that meritorious and well-deserving body, the National School teachers of Ireland. I was told by officials sitting upon that Bench from which this Bill has been fulminated to-night that they had no grievances whatever; that all their cases had been considered, and there was no want that was not supplied. Yet, now we have the Chief Secretary for Ireland standing up in his place an-posing a Bill recognising the claims at one time denied, and proposing to satisfy them by the application of £10,000. The only thing I have to say about that is this—"better late than never." I welcome the proposals; and, far as I am concerned, that portion of the Bill, at least, shall receive no opposition whatever. With regard to the principle of compulsion, I have to say at I trust the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary will stick to his principle of elasticity. In Ireland—and I know our people well—there is no necessity, or almost no necessity, for applying the principle of compulsion. The intention of an Irish parent is to educate his children better than he has educated himself, and place them in a position higher than the position he has occupied in social or commercial life. That has been the main tendency of the Irish character, and where there has been any want of it, or where it could not be supplied by the intention of the parent, it would be cruel to enforce it by any legislation. If the Irish parent has not been able to fulfil his desire with regard to the education of his children, it is because the wants and other conditions were not favourable to such intentions; it is because the schools were too far away, or the children too badly clad; or because they had no boots to their feet, and perhaps sometimes no food to eat, that there was any halting in that respect. I therefore hope the right hon. Gentleman will stick to his elasticity with regard to the application of the principle of compulsory education. There is one disappointment that I feel with regard to this Bill. The right hon. Gentleman does not provide in the Bill in the slightest degree for any application of the funds towards technical education in these primary schools. The Irish people are absolutely devoid of technical education. Ireland suffers from the want of manufactures. Ireland is on the eve of the resuscitation of her manufactures; and there is no provision in that Bill for the purpose of applying any of the funds at the disposal of the Government in order to promote technical education in Ireland. It not only does not provide in the primary National schools for the promotion of technical education, but it absolutely denies it to be only National Schools in Ireland that provide the people with technical education. The only schools in Ireland where an Irish boy is taught to handle a tool, by which he may have to provide himself with a future, are the Christian Brothers' Schools of Ireland. In the Christian Brothers' Schools you have technical education, and not in your so-called National Schools, upon which you are going to expend £200,000—£90,000 in pensions. But perhaps the English Government do not wish the Irishman to go into the world fully equipped with technical knowledge? ("No!") It appears very like it. The hon. Member for South Belfast (Mr. William Johnston) says "no." But I will put it on a lower ground. Why not give the Irishman a technical education for the sake of the development of the resources of his own country? I certainly should have thought that any Government who wished to come at the root of education in Ireland should establish through all the primary schools of Ireland—those that were established on the National School system and those that were not—technical schools to be subsidised by Imperial funds. There is a great want in Ireland in this respect. In this Bill there was a splendid opportunity for the Government to supply that want. There was machinery in existence which they might have used. The Christian Brothers alone form the true national schools in the towns of Ireland, and any system of State aid which does not take them into account, is halting, false, and will not go to the root of the evil you desire to deal with. I reserve further criticism of the Bill; there are some details I do not like, but the Bill is in many respects an excellent measure, though it is not perfect. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will receive with a generous mind the representations made on behalf of existing representative institutions in Ireland, and will endeavour to make the Bill perfect.

*(11.23.) MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): The right hon. Gentleman in opening his speech, said, that this subject has aroused very strong feelings in Ireland. It has aroused very strong feelings indeed, as more than one Government has learned to its cost. As regards the Bill, I am bound to say it is rather better from my own point of view than I expected. I am glad the right hon. Gentleman paid a tribute to that much maligned body, the Commissioners of National Education, a body which during 60 years has carried on a great work and done it, with certain drawbacks, uncommonly well. There is one point—though I am not going to commit myself to anything in the Bill—which I should like to comment upon. The right hon. Gentleman drew attention to the fact that although this system of national education was a mixed system, yet by the consent alike of Protestant and of Catholic it was rapidly becoming denominational. I challenge the fact itself, and I challenge the description of the fact. There were 8,000 schools on the operation list in 1890, and close upon 4,000 of these were mixed schools where Protestants and Roman Catholics received the same secular education. When he says to the House of Commons that Protestants are becoming more and more denominational, I wish to point out that there are at least 500,000 Protestants in Ulster who will be surprised to hear this; because if there is one thing that the Presbyterians of Ulster have been strong upon, it is this system of mixed education, in which they are supported by the Methodists, the Unitarians, and three-fourths of the Protestant Episcopalians of Ulster. In the Episcopalian as well as in the Presbyterian Church there is a very strong feeling in favour of this system. At all events the system is not denominational, and in the second place the Protestants, as a whole, are not in favour of denominational education. I do not wish to enter upon the question of compulsion; but I will say that the only objection I have to the Bill, is that it does not go far enough. I think the rural districts will have a right to complain, and that the rural districts in Ulster will complain, and the teachers all over Ireland will complain of this, because it will have an effect upon the capitation grant. As to the distribution of the £200,000 as between the capitation grant and the class salaries, I am agreeably surprised that the right hon. Gentleman appears to have taken a little bit of everybody's advice, and the only persons left out in the cold are the Christian Brothers. The answer to that is, let them do as the monastery schools do, and the convents do; and they will come under the national grant at once, but so long as they insist upon a Catholic atmosphere in the schools, they cannot expect the rules of the National Board, upon which this system is founded, to be broken down to suit them. I complain that nothing has been done in respect of technical education; there can be no question that the system of education in Ireland can be improved. The books are old-world institutions, and the whole thing wants to be taken to pieces and re-modelled. No place is given to cookery and domestic economy, subjects which ought to be taught in the large towns especially. In Dublin, Limerick, and Cork the people are not fed, and they are not fed because their wives and daughters do not know anything of cooking. Reserving to myself the right to criticise the details at a later stage, I can only say that I am agreeably disappointed. This is a much better Bill than I expected, and it is a much worse Bill than was expected by gentlemen below the Gangway.

(11.32.) MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.): The hon. Member who has just sat down has, in somewhat dubious terms, blessed the Bill. In the first place, the hon. Member has taken the Chief Secretary to task for not making provision for technical education. Some improvement was made in technical education during the administration of the Chief Secretary's predecessor, especially in the matter of sewing, and I well remember that the only opposition to that came from the hon. Member for South Tyrone and his friends. We all know the difficulties of starting a system of technical education where you have a large number of rural schools. I quite agree that something should be done, but I confess I cannot see how anything can be done in connection with the Bill which is already overloaded. As regards compulsion, the right hon. Gentleman said that by the Act of 1876 it was made compulsory upon School Attendance Committees to make bye-laws in England; but in England

Instead of rushing headlong into compulsory education the course followed was an extremely cautious and slow one. I am told that in many rural districts in England compulsion is nothing more than a name, and I cannot think the right hon. Gentleman is acting unwisely in confining his Bill to the urban districts. The right hon. Gentleman said he proposed to fix the age at from 6 to 4. I fancy that is rather a longer period than was the case in England originally, so the number of children left school who are over 14 years of age is larger in Ireland than in England. One thing which should be greatly deprecated, and which I hope the right hon. Gentleman will consider and guard against, is that anything connected with the unpopularity attending the enforcement of other laws should attach to education. If these School Attendance Committees work through the ordinary engines of the law, if, for example, they use the police, it would be possible for them to cause, in many districts, a very general feeling against the attendance altogether amongst considerable classes of the population. Another point of difficulty, and I cannot mention it without the deepest shame, is that in the more Protestant parts of Ulster the Catholics have no representation on a Local Body. In Belfast there is a system of religious exclusion. I avoid the use of stronger words—such as has parallel in no other part of the United Kingdom. In the City of Belfast not one single elected Poor Law Guardian is a Catholic. There is not a single member of the Town Council who is a Catholic.

MR. JOHNSTON : Roman Catholics; do not call them Catholics.

MR. KNOX : I do not quarrel about words; I am stating facts. I say as a Protestant, as a professor, every 12th of July, of the principles of civil and religious liberty, the hon. Member for South Belfast has reason to be ashamed, as I am ashamed, of the conduct of his co-religionists.

MR. JOHNSTON : I am not.

MR. KNOX : I go on to state facts in spite of the hon. Member's interruption. Not one single elected member of the Board of Guardians in Belfast is a Catholic, not a single member of the Town Council is a Catholic. There is just one member of the Water Commission who is a Catholic; there is not a single member of the Harbour Commission who is a Catholic. In a city containing 70,000 Catholics among its population, there is no representation of Catholics on the Local Governing Bodies. This is a scandal and shame to the City of Belfast, a shame to the Protestant religion, a condition of things I, in common with every right-thinking Protestant, deplore. Having this state of facts to deal with, I ask the right hon. Gentleman if he purposes to give to a body which has shown in the mode in which they are selected their exclusive, if not their intolerant, character, the right to govern in these matters, in the way they would, the non-Protestant—the Catholic—population of Belfast? Everybody except bigots knows that the law of compulsory attendance requires much more careful working than most laws. It is necessary to work it with considerable regard to particular cases, or else you may, in many cases, do a great wrong and make your system generally unpopular. Everybody who sees anything of the working of education laws knows that. You want a sympathetic authority to work it, and can you believe, in the face of these facts, that the Catholic minority would not feel themselves placed under a School Attendance Committee of the Town Council—placed in a position, to put it mildly, of the utmost difficulty? The hon. Member opposite may say, "They can only make the children go to school." But I do say this: that if attendance is forced, if the law is enforced, without regard to particular cases, without respect to Catholics, while allowing considerable latitude to Protestants, the effect will be disastrous, and there is very great fear that the law enforced in this form would have this effect. I understand the right hon. Gentleman by his Local Government Bill brings in the principle of cumulative voting in county districts in Ireland. It is a point I am not quite certain of, that in rural districts the cumulative vote is introduced, but there is to be no change in the system of voting in boroughs?

MR. JACKSON assented.

MR. KNOX : Well, if there is a case where cumulative voting is required it is in the City of Belfast, for it is the one place in Ireland where you have a considerable minority not represented at all on Public Bodies, and in the matter of education there is more to be said for cumulative voting than in any other respect. I do say here you must, if you are to have the law working fairly, give some representation by some means to the Roman Catholic minority on the School Attendance Committee of Belfast, a representation to which they are fairly entitled. The City of Belfast was divided into five wards at the time when it was much smaller than it is to-day. I do not think that hon. Members should be proud of that. There has been no re-adjustment of wards; the city still remains divided into five, and the reason why there has been no re-adjustment is that with such, the Catholics would gain representation. It is in order to prevent this representation that the wards have been left in their old and now inconvenient method of division. Therefore, looking at the facts, it is incumbent on the right hon. Gentleman, if he does not intend to inflict great hardship on a large body of the population, to make some further provision for increased elasticity in his scheme.

Mr. JACKSON: It is provided for.

Mr. KNOX: I am glad to hear it is provided for, that some provision for religious liberty is made. I venture to hope, also, that the School Attendance Committee will be so constituted that it will not be required to give to any unpopular officials, but to an entirely new body, the carrying out of the law carefully. It may then do great good to Ireland; but if not applied with the utmost consideration for diverse interests, and, I may say, the touching feelings of various denominations, it will end in disaster. The right hon. Gentleman's successor in the post of Secretary to the Treasury has visited the schools of the Christian Brothers in Cork. Now, I want to make a fair offer to the Chief Secretary. Will he allow his right hon. Colleague the Secretary to the Treasury to decide whether or not the Christian Brothers' Schools are worthy of State aid? These schools are carried on under great difficulties, and they will find their difficulties increased under this Bill. It is surely necessary in making provision for compulsory education to make provision for voluntary schools? There are voluntary schools of the Protestant persuasion in the North. None of my hon. Friends object to seeing these included in provisions made for the schools of the Christian Brothers. Your Bill will put a greater strain upon voluntary schools, and it is right that these schools should have some grant from Imperial resources. If they only receive support in the same way voluntary schools receive it in England we shall be content. I hope that these various points, which need careful consideration, have been met in a way that will make the Bill work for the advantage of education in Ireland.

(11.48.) MR. M. HEALY (Cork): I do not think the right hon. Gentleman has any reason to complain of the reception his Bill has met with from this quarter of the House. I do not now intervene for the purpose of offering any hostile criticism, nor do I intend to enter upon any detailed examination of the proposals which have been explained to us; but I would like to verify some of the observations which have fallen from my hon. Friends on some of the points they have dealt with. Unquestionably, there will be great disappointment in Ireland that the right hon. Gentleman has not taken this opportunity of dealing with the question of the schools of the Christian Brothers. It may be said the Bill does not touch the question of denominational as distinct from undenominational teaching, but simply introduces the principle of compulsion, making certain financial arrangements; and, therefore, no occasion arises for the change indicated. Now, there are many parts of Ireland, and many small towns, where the principle of compulsion will come into operation, where the only schools available are these very schools of the Christian Brothers, but which will be exempt from all benefit under the Bill. Take Lismore, in Waterford, as an example. Some 20 years ago the National School there was abolished and a Christian Brothers' school introduced in its place, largely by the aid of the late Duke of Devonshire, who handed over the school building, which was his erty, to the community of the Christian Brothers, and contributed very handsomely to their establishment. Are you going to compel the inhabitants to send their children to school, and compel the school masters to receive them, and, at the same time, exclude the school from all benefit under this scheme? The hon. Gentleman (Mr. T. W. Russell) says a Catholic atmosphere is not to be encouraged—

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Not to be sted into a National system of education.

MR. M. HEALY: The hon. Gentleman objects to the State making any payment to any school with a Catholic atmosphere. But when you have schools tended by Catholic children, of Catholic rents, and with a Conscience Clause, why should you not have a Catholic atmosphere? If you have schools exclusively of Protestant children, and with the protection of a Conscience Clause, why should you not have a protestant atmosphere? That is all we ask. The Bishops of Ireland have never asked that in schools attended by children more than one religion — mixed schools—that this relaxation of the present system of the National Board could be introduced. All they ask is that purely Catholic schools or purely protestant schools, if they have fulfilled the other conditions which are prescribed by the National Board, that these schools could not be excluded from pecuniary advantage. The hon. Member for Tyrone has denied the tendency to make the national system more and more a denominational system, but I appeal to the right hon. Gentlemen opposite, Have not repeated declarations of authorities in the Protestant Episcopalian Church, over and over again, made on the subject, been in favour—by a large majority in favour—of denominational education? I am quite free to concede that among Presbyterians the same opinion is held. If that be so, if the state of thing is as I have stated, why should not the Government recognise the fact in Ireland, and put an end to this anomaly, by which the teaching which does the most for the education of the Irish children is wholly excluded from any State aid? If this body, the Christian Brothers, were established and teaching in England, every school established would be drawing result fees. Wherever in England you have a Catholic community you have schools conducted on precisely the same principle as the schools of the Christian Brothers, and these schools are drawing result fees—are receiving State aid—and this the hon. Gentleman objects to have applied to Ireland. These schools are shut out from State aid so far as primary education is concerned; but under the Intermediate Education Act the schools of the Christian Brothers are most successful in passing their pupils through examinations and getting prizes and result fees. Now, if it is right that Government should promote the schools of the Christian Brothers and give them aid under the intermediate education system, what principle is involved in refusing similar assistance in regard to primary education? I do not intend to continue this subject; but I think the right hon. Gentleman will see that, so long as this state of things is persisted in, so long must the question of national education in Ireland remain unsettled. One other word I will add, to express a doubt as to whether the body to which is to be entrusted the carrying out of the principle of compulsion is the best for the purpose. I quite admit it is exceedingly difficult to set up in Ireland anything in the nature of School Boards, so that there is no great choice left; but I do think the right hon. Gentleman will find that Corporate Bodies elected to look after an entirely different class of matters—bodies having no dealings, generally speaking, with educational matters, having totally different functions to discharge, will be bodies which will not effectively discharge the duties the right hon. Gentleman intends to cast upon them by this Bill. However, that is a matter open to argument at a later stage, and, having regard to the hour, I will not discuss it now.

(11.58.) MR. M. J. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid): This is a Bill which is of the utmost importance to Ireland, and it was a late hour when the right hon. Gentleman rose to introduce it, and not many Members have had the opportunity of making any observations upon it. Considering the importance of the subject, I apprehend the right hon. Gentleman will not object to some further observations from Irish Members. My hon. Friend the Member for Derry (Mr. M'Carthy) spoke only for a few minutes, and the Bill was taken in the absence of my hon. Friend the Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton), who has devoted extraordinary attention to the subject with which the Bill deals, and who has been in communication during the past twelve months with the leaders of Catholic education in Ireland on these matters. My hon. Friend has not had an opportunity of speaking. It is a Bill of the widest importance; it proposes the application of a principle perfectly novel in Ireland, and hitherto never required, a principle to which some of us, to some extent, may be opposed. It is perfectly true that the Resolution adopted in 1883, and moved by the then Member for Limerick, pledged the House to support a system of compulsory education, but it was subject to certain modifications, and therefore the principle of absolute compulsion has never been accepted or enforced. The right hon. Gentleman himself, although he accepts in principle, goes through the form of introducing a system of elasticity—

It being Midnight the Debate stood adjourned.

BETTING AND LOANS (INFANTS)
BILL. [H.L.]—(No. 13.)

SECOND READING.

Mr of the Day for the Second Reading.

MR HERSCHELL: My Lords, in the Second Reading of this Bill it is not necessary for me to detain your Lordships with any explanation of visions, or any arguments in our, because there was a community in your Lordships' House session, when this Bill was introduced, that it was expedient that legislation of this nature should be undertaken with the view of preventing an evil which undoubtedly exists, which is now growing, and has ended—as is well known—the ruin of many. My Lords, the Bill was passed your Lordships' House earlier, and went to the other House, it was read a second time and passed into Committee; but, owing to the close of the Session, and certain opposition with which it was met,
it became impossible to pass it into law.
My Lords, I am glad to think that the opposition that was given to the Bill was a very one indeed. I believe the condition of opinion in favour of the Bill in the other House of Parliament was very nearly unanimous, and there was a general accordance with the view taken by your Lordships in this House. But, My Lords, I think it is desirable—inasmuch as I have endeavoured to acquaint you with the reasons which influenced those who objected to the Bill—with those objections so far as I have been able to gather them, and I believe did gather them completely.
It was said, as one objection, that the Bill was a rich man's Bill.
That statement rests on an entire misapprehension of fact. It is not a Bill which will protect the rich any more than it protects the poor, in any sense, come under that designation. It is well known that this evil extends to, and affects all classes of society, and it is no sense be called rich; and I am quite sure that, if those, who took that objection, had seen the letters that I received in relation to this Bill, they would have found that it excited interest in classes as far removed as possible from the description of the rich, who were as desirous of seeing it pass into law as any could be who were well endowed with this world's wealth.

Therefore, I say, that is an objection founded on a misapprehension. I do not believe that, under this Bill, those who are rich, or have the prospect of riches, would, in nearly as many instances, be beneficially affected (if this Bill should be successful) as those whose means are very limited indeed.
Then, my Lords, another objection was taken. It was said that the person inciting an infant to these transactions was alone made punishable, while no punishment was provided for the person who yielded to the incitement.
My Lords, the whole foundation of legislation of this description relating to infants is that protection may well be afforded to them which you would not afford to those who do not come within that description. It is, my Lords, a fact, that is known to us all, that, although a person may have passed the years of childhood, yet, nevertheless, he has not arrived at a condition of well matured judgment, and he is likely to be easily tempted, by those who know the world infinitely better than he does, into action which, if he possessed the judgment which he will possess a year or two later, he would be the first to see was unwise and ruinous. The whole basis of legislation is that you may properly extend protection to those, under a certain age, who need it, which it would not be possible to extend generally. My Lords, there are plenty of precedents for legislation of this description, but it is only necessary for me to refer to one. A person is subject to a criminal charge who induces a woman, under an age when she can no longer be called a child, and is, in every sense of the term, an adult, to leave her home and parents, or those under whose care and protection she is living; whilst no one has ever suggested that it followed, as a logical consequence, that you ought to make her responsible as well as the person who abducts her or induces her to leave her home. My Lords, I think that illustration is enough to show that no new step is taken in the legislation to which I am inviting your Lordships to give your assent. Another objection, my Lords, that was taken was that, under this measure, you compel the person charged to prove himself innocent. I do not think that is a just or adequate description of this legislation. The Bill does that which has been done very frequently—I could cite almost numberless instances—for many years past; it is to make certain facts prima facie evidence unless they are displaced; that is to say, when you know that certain facts will in general, in almost every case, or in the great majority of cases, indicate some inference, you should take that inference to be established, unless the person, within whose power it is to make the facts known, and who is in full possession of them, should show that the facts are otherwise. My Lords, I think not only is that not contrary to the spirit of English law, but it is in accordance with common sense, and is a principle that ought to be adopted. So far as I know, my Lords, with one exception, those are the only objections I have heard to this Bill; and, dealing with all those objections, I would say at once that I should be most pleased to consider any suggestions that might be made, by way of Amendments to the Bill, which would remove any difficulty which may be felt by any of those who have raised those objections. I do not feel bound, by any spirit of pedantry, to the exact provisions of the Bill; and, if, without defeating its object, any of those difficulties can be removed by suggestions from any quarter, no one will be more pleased than myself to alter its form in those respects. But, my Lords, if those who have objections to the Bill are unable to suggest any way in which it can be made safer or more advantageous, you are reduced to this question: whether, because there may be possible difficulties in some quite exceptional case, or some possible danger in such legislation, you ought to forego legislation which, on the whole, is felt to be necessary and beneficial, on account of some possible danger which nobody sees any way of remedying or avoiding? It seems to me, my Lords, that, if we were to act on such a principle as this, it would be practically to forego legislation; because you cannot pass any Act of a remedial character without carrying with it some possible serious consequences. I said, my Lords, that there was one other objection raised to the Bill. It has been said that the Bill does not deal with an important matter of public interest which it ought to deal with. I have no doubt that your Lordships are aware that there is under legislation that has existed for a long time, a bet cannot be recovered in a Court of Law; but it has been notwithstanding those provisions of the Legislature, that, if you employ a son to make a bet for you, and payment is made by him, the amount of the bet can be recovered from the person who gave the directions to make it. I believe the Courts arrived at that conclusion somewhat reluctantly, but they themselves bound to it by the terms of the enactment. Consequently, we have seen of late in a good many cases what I call the scandal of the time of Justice and juries occupied often for hours, I believe, in some cases for days, determining betting disputes which ought not to have come within the cognizance of a Court of Law at all. My Lords, I felt that it was possible to introduce that matter in a Bill which deals with infants, without changing the framework of the Bill which would be creating difficulties, but, so far as that subject is concerned, I trust that those who take that position will feel that it will be remedied when I tell your Lordships that I propose, in a short time, to present a Bill dealing with that matter by itself, and to ask you to give your assent to it.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Lord Herschell.)

*LORD NORTON: My Lords, may I be allowed in one word to express deep gratitude to the noble and learned Lord for again introducing this Bill, which, by an accident almost, failed at the last moment of last Session to pass the other House. I am sure your Lordships all agree in feeling grateful to him for having persisted with most useful measure, which has been proposed for a long time to Parliament, for the general welfare of this country. Your Lordships not only agreed unanimously to its propositions when it was introduced at the beginning of last Session; but the only amendment which you made was to carry it out still further. The first proposition was merely to check betting agents from inciting youths to a system of betting in their young days which was sure to grow into a system utterly demoralising to them, and with consequences miserable to their families. Your Lordships brought within the revisions of the Bill the making of oans to an infant an invalid contract. That was a very considerable advance in the proposition, which was carried, without one word against it, in this House. When the Bill went before the Lower House there was, apparently, the same unanimity on all sides; there was not an appearance of my opposition to thus protecting infants from such demoralising influences. But at the last moment in the Session, when this measure and others had been thrust into a corner by more pressing business, it was possible for any one individual merely to put a notice on the Paper to be fatal to the Bill—and so it happened. I believe none wished to frustrate the Bill, and I believe that the idea in putting such notice of Amendment on the Paper was a simple fallacy as to the objections which the noble and learned Lord has just shown to be absolutely futile. My Lords, as to being a Bill for the rich and not for the poor, anybody who makes that objection shows that he knows nothing whatever about the object and circumstances of this Bill. It is perfectly true that there may not be gambling on so large a scale now in this country as there was in the days of Fox, as we read; but—which is infinitely worse—the spirit of gambling permeating the whole of Society from high to low. There is not a house in which the servants are not exposed to his temptation; there is no tradesman, however small, who is not more or less engaged in it. And, my Lords, when once lads are trained and engage in it, I do believe that, in general, all sense of honour ceases, and a lower state of morality takes place in the minds of those engaged in its pursuit. It may be said that these betting agents, who number thousands in this kingdom, are dealing with young lads in a very small way—only a few shillings; and there are parents who are foolish enough to think that there is not much harm in that. They do not know the seeds of corruption that are being bred in young minds, to their demoralisation and ruin, and to the misery of their parents and families. There can hardly be, my Lords, I believe, a more important measure brought before this House, and I really do believe that there is no greater source of mischief in this country at this moment than the temptation of the young to begin life by indulging in this spirit of gambling. I really believe there is nothing that so much militates against all that we are doing in the way of the advance of education, and the amelioration of the morals of the country, and the reduction of crime, (in which we are so interested at this time) as this growing spirit of gambling. I know the noble and learned Lord will not lose a moment in pressing this Bill through this House, as there is a unanimous consent of your Lordships to assist him in carrying it as speedily as possible, in order that it may begin in the other House at an earlier time, which may prevent its being again stifled by some ignorant or senseless individual, who, by the mere fact of putting a notice upon the paper, can frustrate the progress of the Bill.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2<sup>d</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

COUNTY COUNCIL CANDIDATES.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, the question that I desire to ask Her Majesty's Government relates to the point whether a Clerk to the Petty Sessions is disqualified from being a member of the County Council? The point turns upon certain sections in the Municipal Corporations Act, which is incorporated with the Local Government Act, and a section in the Local Government Act itself, which I will read, as it is very short. The disqualifying section is to this effect :—

"A person shall be disqualified who has, directly or indirectly, by himself or his partner, any share or interest in any contract or employment with, by, or on behalf of the Council."

My Lords, the clerk of the Petty Sessions is not appointed by the Council, but he is dependent upon the Council for his salary; because, by Section 84 of the Local Government Act, it is provided that the Joint Committee of the County Council should be substituted for Quarter Sessions as to all powers connected with the fixing of salaries or fees to be received by the clerk of Petty Sessions and the payment of such salaries. The question therefore arises whether, inasmuch as the Clerk to the Petty Sessions, if elected to the County Council, would be qualified to be a member of the Joint Committee as a member of the County Council, and might be appointed as such, he would not be so indirectly interested in this pecuniary question of the fixing of his salary that he would be disqualified? The point is not by any means an abstract one, for I understand that there are several candidates in different parts of the country who are clerks of Petty Sessions; and, if it is possible to clear up the doubt, it will be a great satisfaction to those who are interested in those elections. My own feeling is—while not attempting for a moment to say what is the right interpretation of the Act, which is a legal question—that it is desirable that such an officer should not be a member of the County Council, under all the circumstances.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, I regret that the noble Lord who would properly respond for Her Majesty's Government is not in his place. Lord Henniker, I am sorry to say, is kept away by reason of suffering from the prevailing epidemic. I should be glad if he were here to answer the question for more reasons than one. In the first place, I think it is a very difficult question; and, in the next place, my noble Friend, who represents the Local Government Board in this House, would be able to answer it without the responsibility that attaches to a Judge who may have hereafter to discuss that very question when it comes before him in his judicial capacity. But the point which is no doubt an important one and, as I have said, a very difficult one, seems to me to turn very much upon the nature of the relation between the County Council and the officers in question. Those officers were appointed under certain provisions, and fulfil certain functions which do not directly place them under the County Council—that is quite true. On the other hand, the language of disqualification is very peculiar. I did not catch whether the noble Lord read the language of disqualification from the Statute.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I did

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I you put the language of disqualification in the Statute, and you see the relation that these officers bear to the County Council in respect of their remuneration and what they have to do and ask whether they were to be under the County Council or not, that raise an extremely difficult question. I giving an opinion on the subject I hope your Lordships will understand that have not had the point argued before me, and therefore it is an opinion which I am entirely at liberty to retract when the question is properly argued before me; and I say that the more impressively because I understand that my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General has given an answer to-day to the very question in the House of Commons with which (I speak always under the reserve that I have mentioned) I should not entirely concur. The impression that I should form, upon the whole, would be that the object, and meaning and spirit of the Statute is that these officers should not be qualified as County Councillors—that the disqualifying section would apply to them. But, as I say, it is certainly not directly said; it is only said by reference, and reference in such a way as to make it extremely doubtful whether the words of disqualification apply to them in the character in which they would be members of the County Council. I am afraid, my Lords, that the proposition is not very clear as I put it; but that is not my fault; it is the fault of the Legislature in passing the Act in the form in which it was passed. The only thing I can say is that my own impression (and I do not give it as anything more) would be that they are disqualified, and that—inasmuch as they do receive their remuneration from the County Council, although that is not the word contained in the disqualifying section, yet, looking at the object, and purpose, and meaning of the Statute as a whole, considering what it was intended to prevent in the event of offices of that sort being held under a body who themselves had, in some sense, the control over them—the holders of those offices should not be members of that body. My impression, therefore, at present is that they are within the disqualifying section, and could not properly be elected to the County Council.

Tuesday, 23rd February, 1892.

QUESTIONS.

---

IRELAND.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): On behalf of my hon. and learned Friend Mr. T. M. Healy (Longford, N.), I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can state what has been done by the Congested Districts Board in any of the congested districts, and how often has it met since the passing of the Act; and if he can explain why, although the Act transferred from the Inspectors of Irish Fisheries and the Board of Works the money available for fishing loans under the Irish Reproductive Loan and the Sea Coast Fisheries Funds to the Congested Districts Board, the two former bodies are still administering these funds in the name of the Congested Districts Board?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): Since the passing of the Act I am informed that the members of the Congested Districts Board have met on 45 occasions; nine times at Board meetings, and 36 times in committee meetings. Several schemes for the development of sea fisheries, and the improvement in the breed of horses, live stock, and poultry, involving an expenditure of about £8,400, have been approved, and are being carried out. The Board are also engaged in making local inquiries respecting the condition of the congested districts. The arrangements whereby the Irish Reproductive Loan and Sea Coast Fishery Funds have continued to be administered by the Inspectors of Fisheries and the Board of Works, on behalf of the Congested Districts Board, is merely a temporary one, pending the necessary legal arrangements connected with the transfer, which are now almost concluded.

MR. SEXTON: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman, is it necessary that the Board should sit in private? There is great public interest taken in its proceedings; could not representatives of the Press be admitted, or, failing that, could a summary of the proceedings at each meeting be supplied to the Press?

MR. JACKSON: I should not like to answer that question without consideration. I think it will be obvious that if a decision is come to by the Board, or by a committee, to take certain action which may involve certain expenditure, it is not desirable to make that known until it is actually carried out. But I do not think there would be any objection to a communication being made by the secretary, possibly conveying information for publication, but I will mention the question.

MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): Will the right hon. Gentleman say for what districts have the sums sanctioned been appropriated?

MR. JACKSON: I have no details; but, of course, as the hon. Member is aware, the Board is divided into committees for dealing with certain proposals, and, of course, these proposals may apply to the whole of the districts.

REPORTED ATTEMPT TO WRECK A TRAIN.

MR. M. J. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if the attention of the Irish Government has been called to reports which appeared in public newspapers describing an alleged attempt to wreck a train by which the hon. Member for South Tyrone was travelling from Fintona to Omagh on the 27th inst; whether he is aware that the matter has since been investigated before a Petty Sessions Court, and information against the person accused (a child of eight years) refused by the Magistrates; and if the Sessional Crown Solicitor who appeared for the Railway Company is correctly reported as having said—

“That the Railway Company had investigated the matter very carefully, and had come to the conclusion the offence was not the result of a deliberate act, and that they were now fully satisfied that the first report was an erroneous one”?

MR. JACKSON : I understand the facts appear to be substantially as stated in the question.

THE KILKENNY COAL-FIELDS.

MR. M'DERMOT (Kilkenny, N.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the passages in the Report of the Royal Commission on Irish Public Works (1887) as to the necessity for a railway connecting Castlecomer and the Kilkenny coal-fields generally with the surrounding railways, and the public advantages likely to result from such a line; whether he is aware that the output of those coal-fields, though capable of indefinite expansion, is now limited to the production of purely local supplies, owing to the want of facilities for carriage; and whether, in view of the fact that the Board of Inland Navigation in the year 1801 offered to grant a sum of £40,000, out of moneys voted for the purpose by the Irish Parliament, to construct a canal intended to develop these coal-fields, the Government will now grant a similar sum to induce the Great Southern and Western Railway to construct and work such a line of railway as that suggested?

MR. JACKSON : Yes; I have seen the passage in the Report referred to—I have no specific information on the subject-matter of the second paragraph of the question. With regard to the subject generally, I may say that seven years ago a scheme was proposed for a railway to connect Castlecomer with the Kilkenny coal-fields under the Tramways Act of 1883. This came before the Committee of the Privy Council, and it was decided that the evidence did not warrant a recommendation of the scheme, inasmuch as, though it might be useful to the collieries, it was really a matter for private enterprise, and its general importance was not such as to warrant the taxing of a whole barony, no money being available from Imperial sources for such a purpose.

SERGEANT MAJOR WEBSTER'S PENSION.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he could state why Battery Sergeant Major Webster, discharged on the 24th April, 1883, has only received a pension of 1s. 5½d. instead of 2s. 1½d.; and was he not entitled to a pension calculated as follows: seven years' continuous service as sergeant, Class III., 1s. 9d.; promotion after 21 years, 3d.; four years over-time, 4d.; less five years' service under age, 2½d., giving a total of 2s. 1½d.?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle) : Battery Sergeant Major Webster was not entitled to the rates of pension as stated in the question. He received all that could be awarded to him under the Warrant in force at the time he was pensioned; but there are peculiarities in his case, and I am prepared to give it further consideration.

PENSIONS FOR CRIMEAN AND INDIAN MUTINY SERVICES.

MR. LENG (Dundee) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War what number of applications have been made:

for special pensions to aged and distressed soldiers who served in the Crimean and Indian Mutiny Campaigns, what number of these special pensions have been granted, and what will be their aggregate annual amount; whether the conditions laid down by the Chelsea Hospital are found to exclude many urgent and deserving cases; and whether it is intended to relax them in any way?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: The total number of applications for special pensions to aged and distressed soldiers who served in the Crimean and Indian Mutiny campaigns received has been about 600. The pensions granted have been 39, amounting to about £720 a year. The remainder were refused, for the reason that the men had not completed 14 years' service. This and other questions are now being considered in consultation with the Treasury.

MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): Will the right hon. Gentleman consider the fairness of granting pensions, irrespective of length of service, to men who have served in the Crimea and elsewhere, and who have become permanently disabled in and by their service?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: It is not for me alone to consider that, but I shall be very glad to give it consideration, in connection with other matters.

MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman to say when he will make a definite statement on this subject?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I think I have made a very definite statement. As to a further statement on the matter undergoing consideration, that shall be made as soon as possible.

COUNTY COUNCIL STOCK AND ACCOUNTS.

MR. MAC INNES (Northumberland, Hexham): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board when he proposes to prescribe regulations for the issue of county stock, in accordance with Section 70 of "The Local Government Act, 1888," and also to prescribe the form of accounts of the receipts and expenditure of County Councils, as provided for in section 71 of the same Act?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): Regulations as regards the issue of county stock in accordance with Section 70 of the Local Government Act, 1888, were issued in July 1891, and were confirmed by an Order in Council in September last. The Local Government Board have not yet prescribed forms of accounts for the receipt and expenditure of County Councils. At the time when the County Councils were constituted it was found that there was great diversity of practice as to the mode of keeping the accounts, but some greater approach to uniformity has been obtained through the suggestions of the District Auditors when engaged on their audits. As yet, however, the Board think that it is desirable that further experience should be obtained before prescribing one form of account for all the counties.

THE POSTMASTER AT HARLESDEN.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether Mr. Timothy Smith is the postmaster at Harlesden, in Middlesex; and, if not, upon what day he resigned his post; who is now the postmaster at Harlesden, and upon what day the appointment was made; whether he is aware that Mr. Smith still lives at the Harlesden post office, and is now a candidate for the Middlesex County Council, and that a large number of bills are pasted on the windows of the post office, which is Mr. Smith's property, calling upon the electors to "Vote for Timothy Smith," and generally in support of his candidature; and whether this is an infringement of the Regulations of the Post Office; and, if so, what course will be taken?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Sir JAMES FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): The office at Harlesden is what is called a Receiving House or Sub-Post Office, kept by a tradesman under regulations. Mr. Smith resigned his appointment on the 3rd instant, with a view to becoming a candidate for the County Council; and his wife being recommended was appointed on the 12th and installed on the 22nd. There is no Post Office rule against a husband residing with his wife, although she is a sub-postmistress; but the exhibition of election bills in the post office window was contrary to regulation, and has now been discontinued.

MR. COBB: Will the right hon. Gentleman undertake to make further inquiry; because, as I am credibly informed, the resignation of the postmaster was a mere colourable device to avoid disqualification as a candidate for the County Council, and the late postmaster does practically discharge the duties of the office in his wife's name?

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: I am not prepared to make inquiry into the truth of a general allegation, but I will inquire into any specific allegation the hon. Member desires inquiry made into. As I have said, there is no impropriety in a man resigning the appointment in favour of his wife, and there are many precedents for the course followed in this case.

NAVAL REPAIRS ON THE IRISH STATIONS.

MR. MORROGH (Cork Co., S.E.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty how many of the Queen's ships, of all classes, stationed at Naval stations on the South and West Coasts of Ireland, have been refitted, overhauled, or repaired during the past five years; what was the nature of such overhauling or repairs; where were these repairs effected; and what was the cost, in each case, of such works?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): Fourteen of Her Majesty's ships, including coastguard cruisers, have been stationed off the South and West Coasts of Ireland at various times during the period in question, on all of which, with two exceptions, certain expenditure has been incurred for repairs, &c. In nearly every case the amount so expended has been comparatively small, the exception being in the case of the Shannon. The details are somewhat minute, and it is hardly possible to compress them within the limits of a Parliamentary answer, but if the hon. Gentleman desires the full information, I will give him the whole Return; the names of the ships, the nature of the repairs, and where these were done. The Return is as follows:—Revenge, £271, and Triumph, £617, Queenstown and Passage Docks Company, Haulbowline, and Devonport; Shannon, £10,580, Devonport and Portsmouth; Banterer, £1,473, Devonport, Sheerness, Haulbowline, and Queenstown and Passage Docks Company; Britomart, £648; Orwell, £190, and Argus, £2,358, Devonport, Haulbowline, and Queenstown and Passage Docks Company; Shamrock, £30, Queenstown and Passage Docks Company and Haulbowline; Gipsy, £9, Haulbowline; Victoria, £874, Devonport, Plymouth, and Dartmouth; Stag, £922, Londonderry, Devonport, Sheerness, Haulbowline, and Queenstown and Passage Docks Company; and Fly, £453, Devonport.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): But were any of the repairs carried out at Haulbowline?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Well, I think the hon. Member had better wait until he can see the Return. Some of the repairs were done at Haulbowline.

ROYAL SMALL ARMS FACTORY, ENFIELD.

MR. JAMES ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether an order for 30,000 Martini-Henry carbines has been given to the Henry Barrel Company; and whether the cost will be more than the cost of the last order executed at the Royal Small Arms Factory, Enfield?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: An order for Martini-Henry carbines, required by the Government of India, has been given to the Henry Barrel Company, at a price above the cost of those last produced at the Small Arms Factory. Apart from some mechanical difficulties in executing the order at Enfield, consequent on alterations in the machinery for the purposes of the Lee-Metford rifle, this course has been taken in fulfilment of my pledge that a fair share of production shall be given to the private trade of the country.

MR. J. ROWLANDS: Will the right hon. Gentleman state the difference in cost as between the Small Arms Factory and the Company?

Sir James Fergusson

*MR. E. STANHOPE: My recollection is that the difference was as between 42s. and 60s.

THE COMMITTEE ON FINANCIAL RELATIONS (ENGLAND, SCOTLAND AND IRELAND).

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA (Monaghan, S.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will in the present Session give such early notice for striking the Committee on Financial Relations (England, Scotland, and Ireland), as will obviate its falling through in consequence of blocking Notices, as happened in the two last Sessions of Parliament?

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College) had notice of the following question:—To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he intends this Session to ask the House to re-appoint the Select Committee on the Financial Relations between England, Scotland, and Ireland, which met towards the close of the Session before last?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I am in communication with my right hon. Friend the Member for the St. Augustine's Division (Mr. Akers Douglas) with regard to this Committee, and I trust he will soon be able to put down a notice for the appointment of the Committee.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): Will the opportunity be given to discuss the question raised by Welsh Members and others?

MR. GOSCHEN: I must consult my right hon. Friend the First Lord; but I do hope that we shall be able to come to such an arrangement that hon. Members will abstain from blocking the Motion for the appointment of the Committee.

MR. SEXTON: Has the right hon. Gentleman made up his mind not to put the notice on the Paper to be taken at such a time when it could not be blocked?

MR. GOSCHEN: No; I have not made up my mind upon that, but I will confer with my right hon. Friend as to whether the Government have any time for the purpose when a blocking notice would have no effect.

POLICE PROTECTION AT GLASHKINLEEN, COUNTY CORK.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what was the nature of the answer returned by His Excellency to the memorial signed by over 100 ratepayers asking for the removal of the police protection hut at Glashkinleen, Newmarket, County Cork, which was presented to him some months ago; and whether, in view of the facts referred to by the memorialists, namely, the peaceful state of the locality, and the heavy cost of the extra police upon the ratepayers (amounting to 3s. in the £1 upon the valuation), he will advise the removal of the police hut? Mr. FLYNN had notice also of the following questions: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what is the cost to the ratepayers of the district of the police stationed in the protection hut at Glashkinleen, Newmarket, County Cork; how many police are there stationed, and what is the nature of their duties; and on what parish or districts does the burden of this extra police tax fall? To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that a man named Cornelius Murphy, of Glashkinleen, Newmarket, County Cork, who is still under police protection, has been frequently charged with firing off his revolver on the public road, and on some occasions at unoffending parties; what action has been taken by the police authorities in regard to him; and whether police protection will be continued to him?

MR. JACKSON: I will answer the three questions of the hon. Member together. The reply sent to the memorialists was to the effect that the police were required for the protection of a man named Murphy, and since then the constabulary report that continued police protection is necessary for the preservation of the peace of the district. The extra cost to the ratepayers is 1s. 11d.—not 3s.—in the £1, and the amount is £137 annually. The police, five in all, are employed in the special protection and in general police work, including patrol duty. Murphy appears to have been charged on three occasions with firing revolver shots in the public road, but the Magistrates had no conclusive evidence that he fired at any person. My reply to the last paragraph in the last question is in the affirmative.

MR. FLYNN: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that in the vicinity of the hut, or in the near neighbourhood, there are three police barracks; and is he aware that this man, who claims and receives police protection at this enormous cost to the ratepayers, has been convicted of firing off a revolver in the public road, and his revolver has been taken from him; and will police protection still be afforded to him?

MR. JACKSON: Yes, Sir. I have given an answer to the question.

MR. FLYNN: I will call attention to this matter in Committee of Supply.

PENSION SCHEME FOR TEACHERS (IRELAND).

MR. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, in reference to the Commissioners of National Education, Ireland, whether the revision of the pension scheme (for teachers) has been made in the past every five years?

MR. JACKSON: The Act establishing the National School Teachers' (Ireland) Pension Fund came into operation on 1st January, 1880. The first valuation was concluded in the middle of the year 1885, the revised rules resulting therefrom coming into operation from 1st January, 1886. The second valuation was made in 1891, and the results are now under the consideration of the Treasury.

CERTIFICATES FOR INTERMEDIATE EXAMINATIONS (IRELAND).

MR. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that children intending to compete in the intermediate examinations in Ireland are required to produce certificates of birth, and are obliged to pay 3s. 7d. each for such certificates to the Registrar; and whether, in view of the fact that many of the pupils belong to the poorer classes, the Government will undertake to reduce the sum so charged to a nominal amount, say 6d., as is done under the English Elementary Education Act?

MR. JACKSON: I have received a Report from the Assistant Commissioners for Intermediate Education, to the effect that the charge for certificates is not regulated by the Board. The charge does appear to me to be rather a high one, and I will make further inquiries on the subject.

COLONISATION VOTE.

MR. SETON-KARR (St. Helen's): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer in what form the Government propose to ask the House for a Vote for colonisation purposes, whether in the Scotch Estimates or by a Supplementary Vote, or otherwise; whether this will be done at an early date, and whether any decision has been arrived at by the Government or by the Colonisation Board as to what particular locality in the Colonial Empire it is proposed to colonise with the funds referred to; and whether the Government have taken any steps since the month of July last, or propose shortly to take any steps, to facilitate or hasten an agreement with the Government of British Columbia as to colonisation of Crofter families or others in that Colony, in accordance with the recommendations of the Colonisation Committee of last Session, or otherwise?

MR. GOSCHEN: An application from the Scotch Office for the insertion in the Estimates of a sum of £7,500 for colonisation purposes was received after the Civil Service Estimates were practically closed. It was therefore impossible to include this sum in the Estimates, but when the Scotch Estimates are reached, a Supplementary Estimate for this amount will be presented at the same time. It is proposed with these funds to take steps for the emigration of Scotch Crofter families to Canada. With regard to the last part of the hon. Member's question, we made what I consider to be an extremely liberal offer to the Government of British Columbia, and are now awaiting their answer. I should be very sorry to take any steps which would imply that we are anxious to press colonists upon a country which is not cordially ready to receive them.

Mr. Jackson

I therefore consider that the next step should be taken by the British Columbian Government.

INCOME TAX ASSESSMENTS, SCHEDULE D.

MR. SETON-KARR (St. Helen's) : beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is aware that in the case of certain public commercial companies in London the Inland Revenue Commissioners have assessed under Schedule D, and have sought charge Income Tax on the following items of expenditure incurred in the course of the business of the companies referred to, viz.: debenture stamps, telegrams, bank charges, travelling expenses, debenture commissions, advertising, printing, and stationery; whether he will explain on what principle all or any of such items come under Schedule D as liable for Income Tax; and in the event of his not being aware that such assessments for Income Tax as above described have been made, whether he will cause full inquiry into the subject to be made?

MR. GOSCHEN : The hon. Member made a very usual mistake in asking that the Inland Revenue Commissioners are the assessing authorities in the cases to which he refers. The assessments are made by Commissioners of Income Tax for the City of London, who are an independent body, and not under the control of the Government. With regard to the substance of his question, I have pointed out that it is incorrect to say that Income Tax is charged upon certain items of expenditure. Income Tax under Schedule D is, of course, charged upon profits, and the question which has arisen is whether certain items of expenditure may or may not be deducted from the annual gross profits for the purpose of ascertaining the profits upon which the assessment is made. The items of expenditure mentioned in the question were connected with the issue of debentures, and the Commissioners held that they were of the nature of capital expenditure, and therefore not properly to be deducted from the annual profits. If the assessment had been made in the usual way, an appeal against it was heard by the City Commissioners of Income Tax, sitting judicially. It was open to a company dissenting from their decision to have a case stated, at a very trifling cost, for the decision of the High Court of Justice, and I understand that in some cases this step has been taken. The point is one for judicial decision, and not for administrative action.

STATIONERY OFFICE WASTE PAPER DEPARTMENT.

MR. JAMES ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.) : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he is aware that a number of girls are employed in the waste paper department of the Stationery Office under unhealthy conditions and at low wages; and whether he is prepared to take steps to secure the amendment of the conditions of employment of the girls concerned?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir JOHN GORST, Chatham) : Yes; and I have visited the factory in company with Mr. Pigott, the Controller of the Stationery Office. The statements referred to seemed to me highly coloured, and the building and conditions of employment much better than represented. With reference to the statement that there was a violation of the Factory Act, I found that the Controller had already sent for an Inspector from the Home Office, whose Report, however, I have not yet received. But I understand the factory has been regularly inspected by the Factory Inspector of the district, and that all suggestions made by him from time to time have been at once carried out. The Controller will obtain a Report from experts as to the possibility of removing the dust by fans or otherwise; the question of revising the wages will be considered; and steps will be taken to improve, as far as practicable, the conditions of the employment.

MR. J. ROWLANDS : Do I understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that the question of wages will be re-considered?

SIR JOHN GORST : Yes; it will be considered at once.

THE POLICE AND THE SALVATION ARMY AT EASTBOURNE.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, in pursuance of a resolution passed by the Watch Committee of the Eastbourne Town Council, on 14th July, 1891, he received a request from the Committee for permission to withdraw police protection from the Salvation Army in the streets of that borough; and, if so, what was his reply; and whether he has any objection to laying the correspondence upon the Table?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.) : Yes ; I received a letter from the Mayor of Eastbourne on 14th July, in which he stated that, owing to the action of the Salvation Army, the claims on the police force were becoming very heavy ; that they were unfairly deprived of their Sunday rest, and that parts of the borough had to be left with inadequate police protection, and in which he inquired whether the Watch Committee would be justified in limiting the police protection in the parts of the town frequented by the Salvation Army to the usual protection afforded on ordinary occasions, notice of this being given to the Salvation Army. In answer to this letter, the Mayor was informed that the responsibility for maintaining the peace in Eastbourne rested with him, the Watch Committee, and the Magistrates, and that the Secretary of State could not sanction or recommend any measures which might have the effect of allowing disturbances to take place unchecked. I do not think any public purpose will be served by laying this correspondence on the Table, but I shall be happy to furnish the hon. Member with copies of these letters if he desire it.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.) : Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that in the borough of Eastbourne the practice of boycotting all those persons who are known to be in sympathy with the Salvation Army is in full swing ; and, under these circumstances, will the Government consider whether it is desirable to apply to that borough certain provisions of the Irish Coercion Act?

MR. MATTHEWS : No case of boycotting has been reported to me.

RAILWAY RATES PROVISIONAL ORDERS.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston) : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether it is intended to refer the Railway Rates Provisional Order Confirmation Bills, introduced into Parliament on the 10th instant, to a similar Committee to that to which similar Bills were referred last Session ; and whether, considering that some of the Bills cannot yet be procured by the public, and the difficulty which may be experienced by traders and agriculturists in complying with the ordinary rule requiring Petitions against Bills of this kind to be deposited within seven days after the Examiner's notice has been given, a relaxation of this rule will be conceded similar to that adopted in respect of the Bills of last Session, allowing all persons to be heard whose Petitions are deposited before the sitting of the Committee to which the Bills may be referred ?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir MICHAEL HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.) : Yes, Sir ; I intend, in respect of such of the Railway Rates Provisional Orders Confirmation Bills as may be opposed, to ask the House to follow the precedent of last year. As all the Bills are now in the hands of Members, I trust that, should the necessary resolutions be carried, the Committee may meet at an early date.

SENTENCE ON BEDWELL FOR ESPIONAGE.

MR. BALLANTINE (Coventry) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Foreign Office has made any attempt to obtain a remission of a sentence of imprisonment and fine passed by the Police Court of St. Etienne, on 26th December last, upon an English subject named Bedwell, as accessory to an offence against the French law of espionage, alleged to have been committed by an English subject named Cooper; and whether the British Ambassador in Paris has instructions to render any assistance to British subjects arrested under the French law of espionage, or to make representations to the French authorities upon their behalf?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. J. W. LOWTHER, Cumberland, Penrith): Unofficial representations have been made to the French Government with a view to the mitigation of the sentence passed on Bedwell. Her Majesty's Ambassador is always ready to assist British subjects, but it is impossible for him to interfere with the ordinary course of justice in France.

THE NEW ADMIRALTY BUILDINGS.

MR. JEFFREYS (Hants, Basingstoke): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works why the proposed buildings at the Admiralty have not yet been commenced?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET, Dublin University): The foundations of the new Admiralty buildings were completed last spring. The invitations for tenders for the superstructure were considerably delayed owing to the strike which prevailed in the Metropolis from May until November last. During this strike it would have been most unwise for the Government to have invited tenders, as contractors would have been compelled to send in high estimates in order to provide against possible loss arising from the uncertain issue of the strike. On its termination, advertisements for tenders for the first block were published immediately, all necessary preparations having long before been made. As a result, a contract with Messrs. Shillitoe and Sons was agreed to; and after an interval, no longer than was absolutely needed for the adjustment of the details of the contract, orders to commence work were given—that was a week ago—and operations are now in progress.

THE ROYAL NAVAL ARTILLERY VOLUNTEERS.

DR. CAMERON: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether an arrangement has been come to between the Admiralty and the War Office, under which the latter is to take over the responsibility for the coast defence of this country; and, if so, is it proposed to employ the officers and men of the Royal Naval Artillery Volunteers, in the event of them transferring their services to the War Office, in manning gunboats, torpedo, and patrol boats for the defence of the ports and the mine fields connected with them; and, if not, whether he would state how it is proposed to employ the force in the event of its agreeing to the transfer?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: No such arrangement has been made, as the War Office has always been responsible for coast defence. The employment of the Royal Naval Artillery Volunteers, or of some of them, is still under consideration; but I have indicated to them that congenial employment might be found for them in the corps of Submarine Mining Engineers at certain ports.

DR. CAMERON: As to the question of responsibility, the right hon. Gentleman will allow me to explain that in framing the question my only desire was that the men should know what sort of employment it was proposed they should be engaged in.

*MR. E. STANHOPE: Quite so. That has been clearly indicated to them.

MINES AND FACTORIES IN THE ISLE OF MAN.

DR. CAMERON: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he can explain why the Factory and Workshops Act is not administered in the Isle of Man, where large numbers of women and young persons are employed; and if there is any distinction drawn between the Coal Mines and Metalliferous Mines Acts and the Factory and Workshops Act in respect to their application to the Isle of Man; and, if so, why?

MR. MATTHEWS: Parliament has not thought fit to make the Factory and Workshops Act, 1878 and 1891, applicable to the Isle of Man. The Metalliferous Mines Act, 1872, does by express reference extend to the Isle of Man; the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, does not—for this reason, possibly, that there is no coal in the district.

RECEIVERSHIPS UNDER THE LAND JUDGES.

MR. BLANE (Armagh, S.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if he can say on what date the Land Judges received the application of Captain O'Conor, of the Palace Elphin, to be appointed to the Receivership under the Land Judges; what was the date of the appointment and that of the withdrawal, if any; and what might be the net annual value of the appointment?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): I have already stated, the gentleman mentioned in the question did not receive any appointment. He was placed on a list as being eligible for appointment, which is quite a different matter.

THE COMMITTEE ON RECRUITING.

SIR W. BARTTELOT (Sussex, N.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War when the Report of Lord Wantage's Committee on Recruiting will be laid upon the Table of the House; and when he will be able to inform the House whether he can lay the whole of the evidence also upon the Table?

MR. E. STANHOPE: I have already presented this Report, and it will be circulated on Thursday, but I hope a few advance copies will be in the House to-morrow morning. I saw there was an absurd suggestion in a morning paper yesterday that I wanted to keep back this Report. I have not kept it back a single day, and the delay was caused by the calculation, for the purpose of one of the dissenting members of the Committee, of the cost of their recommendation. I have not yet received the evidence; but when I do, I shall decide about presenting it, and in all probability I shall do so at once.

CONGESTED DISTRICTS BOARD.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can state how many of the ten gentlemen who may act as members of the Congested Districts Board, recently set up in Ireland, are Protestants, and how many are Catholics; is the secretary of the Board a Protestant or a Catholic; and will he explain on what principle Catholics have been denied a larger representation on this Board, seeing that they have constantly complained of not being sufficiently represented on Boards nominated by Government?

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): Before the Chief Secretary answers that question, I wish him to say whether it is a fact that all the members of the Congested Districts Board are Unionists, and that the holding of Nationalist opinions is a disqualification?

MR. W. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he will discourage as much as possible the attempt of hon. Members opposite to raise questions calculated to create religious animosity in Ireland?

MR. JACKSON: This question only appeared on the Paper this morning, and, therefore, my only means of communication were by telegraph. The answer I have got is that there is no official record of the religious persuasion of the members of the Board.

MR. MAC NEILL: I appeal to the right hon. Gentleman as an English gentleman, is he aware of the religion of those gentlemen? Does he know, of his own knowledge, that there are eight Protestants and only two Catholics on this Board?

MR. JACKSON: I think the hon. Gentleman will see that it is quite impossible for me to have any definite knowledge on the subject.

MR. MAC NEILL: I will repeat the question to-morrow.

THE CIVIL SERVICES OF INDIA.

MR. MAC NEILL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether he is aware that there were, on March 31st, 1886, 3,573 Europeans, including Eurasians, and only 492 Indians, drawing Rs5,000 and upwards in the Covenanted and Uncovenanted Civil Services of India; and if he can state why Europeans, including Eurasians, are in the proportion of seven to one to Indians in those Services?

Mr. Matthews

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. CURZON, Lancashire, Southport) : Yes, Sir. The figures are those which I gave the House on Friday at the hon. Member's request. The proportion of Eurasians and Europeans to Natives of India in the Covenanted and Uncovenanted Services, taken as a whole, is not seven to one. The reason why the majority of the higher appointments in those Services is held by Europeans is explained in the Report of the Public Service Commission.

MR. MAC NEILL : Is not the proportion in the two Services as eleven Europeans to one Indian ? Is that true or false ?

MR. CURZON : I think I cannot do better than to commend to the hon. Member a more careful study of the Report than he appears yet to have bestowed upon it.

MR. MAC NEILL : May I ask the hon. Gentleman whether this practice of excluding Natives from the government of their own country was not denounced by Lord Lytton when he said that we had cheated the Natives ?

THE MAYORALTY OF BELFAST.

MR. O'KEEFFE (Limerick) : May I ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if, having regard to his intention of raising the Mayoralty of Belfast to that of a Lord Mayoralty, he will, in appreciation of concurrent rights of other Irish Municipalities, restore to the Mayors of Limerick, Cork, and Waterford the privilege of which they have been lately deprived, of being nominated Commissioners for holding the Assizes in Ireland ?

MR. JACKSON : In reply to a question put by the Member for Waterford in 1888, it was stated that the custom of nominating Mayors as Commissioners for holding the Assizes in Ireland had long since become practically useless, and had been accordingly abandoned. I am not aware of any reason for restoring the privilege of the Mayors referred to.

IRISH DRAINAGE ACTS.

MR. M. HEALY (Cork) : I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether the Government propose to introduce a measure to amend the Irish Drainage Acts this Session ; and whether, if not, they intend to assent to the Bill of last year when re-introduced ?

MR. MADDEN : Yes, Sir ; such a measure is in course of preparation, and I hope I shall be able very shortly to introduce it.

THE COUNTY COUNCIL ELECTIONS.

MR. MANFIELD (Northampton) : I beg to ask the Attorney General whether salaried Clerks of Petty Sessional Divisions, in receipt of salaries from the County Council, are eligible as candidates for the County Council of the county in which their Petty Sessional Division is situate ?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight) : The question involves legal consideration of some difficulty ; but, on the whole, I am of opinion that salaried Clerks of Petty Sessional Divisions are eligible as candidates for the County Councils.

MR. MANFIELD : Is the hon and learned Gentleman aware that, under the Municipal Corporations Act, Chap. 50, Section 12, Sub-section 3 any person is disqualified if he is directly or indirectly interested in any contract that may be made on behalf of the Council ?

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER : I am perfectly aware of the provisions of that Statute, and therefore I expressed the opinion that there were legal difficulties involved in the case. I have given the hon. Member as much information as I can.

IRISH POOR LAW UNIONS.

MR. MAHONY (Meath, N.) : I beg to move for a Return showing, as regards each Poor Law Union in Ireland, the number of persons of each sex of 65 years of age and upwards, and the number under 65 years of age who have attained the age of 16 years of age, and the number of children under 16 years of age, in receipt from Boards of Guardians of indoor relief or outdoor relief respectively, during the twelve months ended at Lady Day, 1892.

MR. JACKSON : Since the hon. Member was informed that there was no objection to the granting of this Return as an unopposed Return, I have learned that a somewhat similar Return, though worded rather differently, is being prepared by the Local Government Board for England, giving the same information; and I beg to suggest to the hon. Member that he should postpone his Motion for a day or two, so that we may have two Returns framed on uniform lines for England and Ireland. The result will be more satisfactory.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): Will the right hon. Gentleman tell us what will be the business to be fixed for Thursday?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): Well, Sir, I had hoped, as the House knows, that we might have succeeded in introducing the three Bills which stood on the Paper yesterday; but we have not succeeded in getting the First Reading for more than one of them. I propose, therefore, to put the other two Bills down for Thursday. The first Order of the Day will be the Bill which stands in the name of my right hon. and learned Friend the Lord Advocate, who will introduce a Bill for the distribution of the Scotch Equivalent Grant. The second Order of the Day will be the introduction of the Bill for dealing with Private Bill Procedure; and the third Order of the Day will enable us to complete the unfinished discussion upon the Bill brought forward yesterday by my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary on Irish Education.

MR. S. BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): Will the Supplementary Estimates or the Indian Councils Bill be taken on Monday?

MR. BALFOUR: The Supplementary Estimates will be put down for Thursday, after the Bills to which I have alluded, and if they are not reached they will be taken on Monday.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): With reference to the Supplementary Estimates, I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman as to a sum of £30,000 for relief operations in Ireland last year, whether any information will be laid before the House as to those operations, before we are called upon to vote the money?

MR. BALFOUR: Yes; I will take care that full statistics of those relief operations, bringing the account down to the time of their completion, shall be in the hands of hon. Members before they are asked to discuss the Vote.

MR. MAC NEILL: Will the right hon. Gentleman tell us whether the Indian Councils Bill is definitely fixed for Monday?

MR. BALFOUR: No, Sir; I think that, under present circumstances, probably we cannot take the Supplementary Estimates on Friday, and shall probably take them on Monday.

ATTENDANCE OF MR. DE COBAIN.

Order [Thursday 11th February 1892], That Mr. Edward Samuel Wesley de Cobain do attend this House in his place upon Tuesday the 23rd of February, read; but Mr. De Cobain did not attend in his place pursuant to the said Order.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I beg, Sir, to give notice that on Friday next I will move—(Cries of "Call him, call him.")

MR. SPEAKER: The Question is, That Mr. Edward Samuel Wesley De Cobain do attend this House in his place upon Tuesday, 23rd February. As many as are of that opinion say "Aye," the contrary "No." The "Ayes" have it.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I beg to give notice that on Thursday next I shall move that Mr. Edward Samuel Wesley De Cobain having failed to obey the Order of the House—(Cries of "Perhaps he is here").

MR. DILLON: Mr. Speaker. I rise to a point of order. I beg to say we have no evidence before us that Mr. Edward Samuel Wesley De Cobain has failed to obey the Order of the House.

MR. SPEAKER: Hon. Gentlemen must be aware that if Mr. De Cobain had been here he would have been in his place, having been ordered to be in attendance this day; but I will call him—Mr. De Cobain. His not appearing shows that he has not complied with the Order of the House.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR again rose and said : I have to give notice, Sir, that I shall on Friday next move that Mr. Edward Samuel Wesley De Cobain, having failed to obey the Order of this House, that he should attend in his place on Tuesday, the 23rd February, and having fled from justice, be expelled this House.

MOTION.

THE CHURCH IN WALES.

RESOLUTION.

*(4.15.) MR. SAMUEL SMITH (Flintshire) : I rise to move the Resolution which stands in my name, and which reads as follows :—

"That, as the Church of England in Wales has failed to fulfil its professed object as a means of promoting the religious interests of the Welsh people, and ministers only to a small minority of the population, its continuance as an Established Church in the Principality is an anomaly and an injustice which ought no longer to exist."

I cast myself on the indulgence of the House, as I have just risen from a sick bed to perform my duty here. I approach the subject with a deep feeling of responsibility, for I know how difficult it is to do full justice to the intense convictions of the Welsh people on this burning question. In all the Debates we have had in this House I have always felt that we failed to give adequate expression to the deep sense of wrong that pervades the Welsh people. What Home Rule is to Ireland to-day, what Free Trade was to England 50 years ago, what "the disruption" was to Scotland 50 years ago, so is this question of religious equality to Wales to-day. It is the all-engrossing question, which agitates every household and practically divides the country into two camps, and there can be no peace or social harmony till this irritant is removed. Our difficulty is to convey to the English mind the grounds for this vehement controversy, and it imposes on us the painful duty of explaining why the English Church in Wales has wholly forfeited the respect of the mass of the people, and thrown them into the camp of Nonconformity. Deep changes in the religious convictions of a nation never occur except for adequate causes ; all history shows that there is nothing so difficult to effect as a change of religion, and Wales is no exception to that rule. The revolt of the people from the Established Church was the result of intolerable wrongs. It was caused by the corrupt, oppressive, and anti-national character of the State Church, spread over centuries. I question if any ecclesiastical establishment presented more abuses than did that of Wales from the time of the Reformation down to the beginning of this century. It was used as an engine for crushing out the national spirit of the country, just as the sister Church of Ireland was, and with the same result. Its preferments were given in the most scandalous manner to English ecclesiastics for political services, and most of the rich livings of Wales were held for centuries by absentees, who deputed miserable and half-starved curates to do their duty. In many of the Welsh churches the language of the people was never spoken, in many of them services were only held once a year, and the lives of the clergy were often notoriously irreligious. Let me quote the language of that true patriot, Henry Richard, whose name will ever be held in reverence in Wales—

"Simony, nepotism, non-residence, pluralism, every form of ecclesiastical abuse ran riot in the Welsh Church. The great body of the clergy were ignorant, irreligious, immoral, in every way utterly incompetent to fulfil the duties of their office. And, indeed, many of them did not even attempt to fulfil their primary duty as instructors of the people."

I will trouble the House with one more quotation from the Rev. H. W. Clarke's excellent History of Tithes :—

"The majority of the Bishops, cathedral dignitaries, and parochial clergy did not know one word of the language of the people. They were aliens in blood, in manners, and in language from the great bulk of the people. The rites of confirmation, marriage, prayer, and preaching, were performed in the English language and then translated immediately into Welsh by an interpreter at the Bishop's or clergyman's elbow. Many of them resided in England or on the Continent, spending the tithes or other revenues, and neglecting their spiritual duties."

It is argued by some that those abuses are matters of ancient history, and that it is needless to rake them up now, as they have long been cured. This is far from being the case ; they were shamefully prevalent in the first half of this century. One of the worst cases of nepotism that ever disgraced a Church was that of Bishop Luxmore, of St. Asaph, as lately as 1830. Mr. Johnnes, in his essay on the causes of dissent in Wales, states that Bishop Luxmore's income was £12,000 a year, and that he had bestowed livings on his sons and other relatives to the value of £15,000 a year. One of these sons was Dean of St. Asaph, Chancellor of St. David's, sinecure Rector of five livings, and the holder of several other preferments worth altogether £8,000 a year. It was computed that the Luxmore family drew more than all the working clergy of the diocese put together. And now, forsooth, we are told that these avaricious clergy possessed the true apostolical succession, and that it was a deadly sin for pious Nonconformists to leave their ministrations ! I will now ask the House, for one moment, to consider the rise of Welsh Nonconformity. About the middle of last century the state of religion in Wales was at the lowest ebb. The Rev. Rees Pritchard of Llandovery, a well-known clergyman, writes of the first half of the 18th century :—

"Licentiousness, drunkenness, dishonesty, falsehood, and infidelity are rampant through the Principality. Judges and juries sympathise with drunken murderers, and permit extortioners to rob widows and orphans. Sheriffs and their deputies plunder innocent people by virtue of their office. The Lord's Day is a day for drunkenness, dancing, idleness, games, and wanton lewdness among the Welsh."

It was the same in England before the revival of Wesley and Whitfield ; in truth, the middle of last century marked the nadir of religious life in the United Kingdom. But there rose up in Wales at that time a band of the greatest preachers that perhaps the world has known. Some of them were clergy of the Established Church ; but, as soon as they began to evangelise, they were expelled from her pale, and the whole force of the Church was used to stop their mouths and limit their holy work. The Methodists of Wales had to undergo even worse persecution than their brethren in England ; mobs were hounded on against them, often by the recreant clergy, and, to use the language of Dr. Rees—

"The inoffensive worshippers were abused, most mercilessly pelted with stones, wounded with knives, shot at ; men, and even women, stripped naked in the presence of the crowd ; able-bodied men were pressed for the Army and Navy, and driven away from their friends and families like cattle."

If ever there were true successors of the Apostles it was men like Wesley and Whitfield in England, or Howell Harris and Daniel Rowlands in Wales—men whose whole lives were one continuous martyrdom for their Divine Master, and yet these men are now described in some Church Catechisms as heretics and schismatics, and their worship as a species of idolatry. In spite of cruel persecution ; in spite of merciless evictions of multitudes of poor farmers because they became Dissenters ; in spite of pressure of every kind brought by the Tory squirearchy, as well as the clergy, the great mass of the people became Nonconformists ; the meaning of which is, that the great mass of the people became earnestly religious, and now for many years Wales has become a nation of Protestant Nonconformists ; and I assert that Wales has reason to be proud of what Nonconformity has done. It has made the Principality of Wales the most religious portion of the United Kingdom ; in no part of the Kingdom is attendance at public worship so universal ; in none is the Sunday school so developed, including, as it does, a great part of the adult population as well as the children. In no part of the country is there so little crime ; in none are the Judges so often presented with white gloves for maiden assizes ; in none is the population so orderly, peaceable, and well-conducted. If I were asked to point to any spot in the world where Christianity had shown its most signal influence to civilise and elevate a people, I should point to Wales. The Nonconformists have covered Wales with 4,000 chapels out of their poverty, and they voluntarily raise £400,000 a year for religious purposes. Need you wonder, Mr. Speaker, that with such an experience the Welsh Nonconformists repudiate the theory that religion needs the support of State patronage and control ? Their experience proves the contrary ; it proves that religion in its purest and most spiritual form is far more active and efficacious when freed from the benumbing effect of State patronage and State control, and left to the voluntary efforts of believers. The mass of the Welsh people have reached that stage of conviction which all English-speaking people, outside this island, have already attained, that all which religion requires from the State is a free hand and no favour. They are convinced that the whole machinery of the Established Church of this country is Erastian, and contrary to the principles of the New Testament. They can find no warrant there for Bishops appointed by the Prime Minister of the day, who may be a man of any religion or no religion, who may, for all we know, be a future Mr. Bradlaugh; they find no warrant for the Royal supremacy over the Church, for control of worship and doctrine by Act of Parliament; they find no warrant there for compulsory tithe, for the sale of advowsons, or for lay patronage. They believe that all these practices are grievous corruptions of primitive Christianity; and I think they are right, and the time is not far distant when the English people will think so. But it is urged by our opponents that a great improvement has taken place in the Welsh Church in recent years. The scandalous abuses have disappeared, and many of the clergy are now earnest and devoted men. I readily grant this is the case. Nothing can exceed the zeal and devotion of some of the clergy, but there are many exceptions yet to this rule. I do not contest, however, the improvement that has set in; but I must be allowed to call the attention of the House to the fact that the new life that is now flowing in the Church of England is actually widening the gulf between them and the Nonconformists; the dominant party is now the High Church party; its doctrines and ritual are in diametrical opposition to the views of all Protestant Nonconformists. The fact is the gulf between the Church of England and all Nonconformists was never so deep as it is now. Let me illustrate this by stating what recently happened at Llandudno. Two well known lady teachers were expelled from the Church Sunday school by the Rector because they declined to teach a Catechism containing the following questions:—

"Why is it necessary to believe in one Holy Catholic Church?" Answer. "Because it is God's one appointed way of salvation." Question. "Does it then make any difference what church or sect we belong to?" Answer. "Yes, it makes a great difference whether we obey Christ or disobey Him."

I may add that this manual of doctrine may be judged from the fact that the junior grade section recommended prayer for the dead, and the advanced grade, the Confessional. Now, if there is anything the Welsh Nonconformists may fairly claim, it is that their doctrines and Church policy are drawn pure and undefiled from the New Testament. They reject mediæval tradition, and refuse to admit any practices that are not authorised by express warrant of Holy Writ. The House will therefore understand how acute the difference has now become, and how intolerable they feel that it is that the revenues of their country should be applied to teaching doctrines so hateful to the great majority of the people. I have not so far dealt with the question of statistics as to the relative strength of Church and Dissent in Wales. The House has been wearied with piles of figures on previous occasions, and I can add nothing to what has been so well said from these Benches in the two recent Debates. I allow that all statistics that can be collected in Wales and quoted by one side are always disputed by the other. I am content to rest the case on the undoubted fact that the great majority of the Welsh people do not belong to the Church of England. What the majority is I do not explicitly assert, but I think few Church people will find fault with me if I state that the Church cannot claim more than one-fourth of the people of Wales. Some of my friends will think that I concede too much in saying this, and will only agree to one-fifth. But when you remember that this includes a large portion of English people resident in the large towns, you will see that it allows but a small fraction of the Welsh people to belong to the English Church. My own strong impression is, if we limit our survey to the indigenous Welsh-speaking population, the proportion belonging to the Church would not be more than one-eighth. There are many rural churches in Wales, as everyone knows, where the congregation is hardly more than the minister's family and servants, and I have heard of cases where the usual attendance was six, eight, or ten persons. But I am going to ask the House to look at some other figures collected outside Wales, where there can be no partisan character about the census, and which bring out the real tendencies of the Welsh people. It is well known that a large Welsh population resides in Liverpool. It is a common saying that Liverpool is the capital of Wales, because containing a larger body of Welsh citizens than any other city in the country. It so happens, fortunately for this Debate, that a very painstaking census of attendance at all places of worship was taken towards the end of last year in Liverpool by one of our leading journals. It had no motive to serve but to get at all the actual facts. Now, I am going to give the House the result of the attendance at the Welsh-speaking services. There are but two churches where the Welsh language is used, but there are 28 Nonconformist chapels. The attendance at church in the morning was 165 persons, at the various chapels 4,832; in the evening the figures were, Church 330, Nonconformists 6,271. Reduce this to a percentage, the proportion is 3·3 per cent. for church in the morning, and 96·7 per cent. for chapels; in the evening it is 5 per cent church, and 95 per cent. chapels. That is, on the best, showing 20 times as many Welsh-speaking people worship in chapels as in churches. A pretty good proof what an exotic the Church of England is. But I have an even more startling statement to make. It is well known that there is a large Welsh emigration to the United States. Wherever they go the Welsh people carry with them their intense religious feelings, and I am informed by a friend who has visited the United States and made careful inquiry that no less than 456 chapels exist where the Welsh language is preached, but not one Episcopal church. There was an attempt to establish one but it failed, and the building was sold to the Congregationalists. If this statement does not convince the House as to the real drift of the Welsh people in matters of religion I despair of enlightening it. All churches are free and equal in America; none are bolstered up by State support, and I hold that America presents a far better test than Wales, where a State-endowed Church, having all the social influence on its side and bringing pressure to bear on the neediest and more helpless part of the community, can collect, it may be, a quarter of the population as nominal adherents. I think more need not be said to prove how overwhelming is the case we lay before the House. Every argument that justified the Disestablishment and Disendowment of the Church in Ireland holds equally good in Wales. The cases run almost on all fours. In each case you have a wealthy minority holding all the Church endowments, while the mass of the labouring class have to supply their own spiritual needs out of their poverty. In each case the Church endeavoured to proselytise and Anglicise the nation. In each case it utterly failed. In each case its history was marked by intolerable abuses persisted in till Parliament forced reform on a reluctant clergy. In each case the effect has been to deepen and intensify the persecuted faith, and strengthen the nationality it was intended to destroy. Every argument that justifies free government justifies the disestablishment of these two Churches; and the case of Ireland ought to reassure the most timid churchman. No one will deny that Disestablishment has improved the Church of Ireland. The springs of voluntary effort have been opened; and the laity have got their rightful position in the management of the Church. The same thing will happen in Wales. The strife that poisons Welsh life will be removed; the church will cease to lean upon carnal weapons; it will regain liberty and independence, and may have a career in the future far more creditable than it has had in the past.

(4.50.) MR. DILLWYN (Swansea, Town): I have much pleasure in seconding the Resolution so ably moved by my Friend the Member for Flintshire. I do not desire to say much, as we have had the question discussed many times. Formerly the Established Church had the vantage ground in Wales, but they lost the chance they had, of proselytising the Welsh people, and by degrees they forfeited their position. The Church was established by law, and it practically disestablished itself. By venality, corruption, and idleness it forfeited that position. When I first had the honour of bringing the question forward we received very little support for our project; we were a small minority without support, even from our own friends. Now, however, the question has been discussed again and again, and a change has come over the spirit of our dream. Instead of its being swayed with indifference, the Welsh people have taken it up with the greatest zeal; and even our own Leader has now conceded the position that if the Welsh people are really in favour of the Disestablishment, which we plead for, he is bound to support that demand. The Established Church endeavours to take up a position which I must comment on. The Welsh, who are an eminently religious people, finding themselves deserted and betrayed by the Church, were not content to remain in it; they provided themselves with religious houses and ministers. They have established a church for themselves, and they intend to remain in it; that is a point to which I wish especially to call attention. The Welsh clergy were immoral and dissolute, but now, I am willing to agree, many are very moral, excellent, and hard-working men; but the Welsh people have established a religion for themselves in place of one which betrayed their interests. It is however, a common argument used by the Welsh clergy that the people really are not keen on this question; at they are desirous of going back to the Establishment. I am astonished at any ecclesiastic with any honesty his nature should make such a statement. We know Wales pretty well, and we know that if she were left to herself she would be purely Nonconformist. Though great territorial influence has been brought to bear on any of the people, they have decided to become churchmen. It is always difficult to find what the religion of a people is, and I have always opposed a religious census, on the ground that it would lead to the bringing to bear of a great territorial pressure on those who did not belong to the Established Church. Very soon we shall have a dissolution, and then you may be quite sure the Welsh people will declare themselves in favour of this Motion. But whether they declare themselves in favour of it or not, let a poll be taken, and I have no doubt that the result will be in favour of freedom of religion and the support of that Church which they have so well established for themselves in Wales.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, as the Church of England in Wales has failed to fulfil its professed object as a means of promoting the religious interests of the Welsh people, and ministers only to a small minority of the population, its continuance as an Established Church in the Principality is an anomaly and an injustice which ought no longer to exist."—(Mr. Samuel Smith.)

*(5.0.) THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir E. CLARKE, Plymouth): Mr. Speaker, I rise to offer, on the part of Her Majesty's Government, and on the part of those who sit upon this side of the House, a most definite and uncompromising opposition to the Resolution which has been moved and the policy which prompts that Resolution. Sir, I draw a distinction, and I think it is a natural one, between the Resolution and the policy which it is supposed to represent; for I am sure it will have been observed by those who have listened to the speeches of the Mover and Seconder of the Resolution that they have paid no attention to the terms of the Resolution at all; that they have made no attempt to establish any one of the propositions which it contains, and that they have contented themselves by referring to other matters—matters which I own might form matter for consideration in Debate, but are not relevant to the propositions put before the House. I am not surprised at the course they have taken. I was, in truth, somewhat amused to find that having long delayed in choosing the terms of the Resolution, the hon. Member for Flintshire on Friday last put upon the Paper of the House this old Resolution, which has been proposed and debated several times, and which I thought had been absolutely destroyed last year by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian. I saw in the paper to-day an inspired communication to a newspaper in which the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire writes that—

"Mr. Gladstone desired to support the Motion for Welsh Disestablishment this Session as he had done last Session."

Sir, I wish he were here to-day to do it. I can conceive nothing more satisfactory than that a Resolution aimed at the Church in Wales should be supported as the Resolution of last year was supported by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian. We have taken care to circulate largely the speech of the right hon. Gentleman upon that occasion, and it will long be remembered as a lasting demonstration of the futility—I was going to use a stronger word—of the propositions in the Resolution before the House. Does anyone who heard him forget the paternal way in which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian corrected the innocent indifference of the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil to all the history of the Welsh Church? Does anyone forget the way in which he, taking the terms of this Resolution, declared that he could not agree with them, and stated with regard to the first phrase which strikes one's attention, that "the Church of England in Wales" was an entire misrepresentation, and that it would be as reasonable to speak of "the Church of Wales in England" as of "the Church of England in Wales?" Last year the speech of the right hon. Gentleman was a very interesting speech. He came down to the House in order to appear to make a recantation of his statement of 21 years ago, that it was impossible to dissever the Welsh Church from the Church of England, and the principal sentence in which that apparent recantation was expressed deserves to be always remembered as the choicest possible example of the Parliamentary dexterity of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian. I think no such gem was ever contributed to the records of this House as the sentence in which he dealt with his statement of 21 years ago, that it is impossible to dissever the case of the Welsh Church and the Church of England. I beg the House to mark the sentence. He said—

"It is quite possible that I may have used that expression which may, when strictly regarded, be found to involve the element of exaggeration."

The most the right hon. Gentleman could do when he came down to recant the declaration of 21 years ago, was, not to say that it was an exaggeration, but to say that he "might have used an expression" which "might, when strictly regarded, be found" not to carry with it, but "to involve," not exaggeration, but "the element of exaggeration." And, Sir, when the right hon. Gentleman had done his part in that apparent recantation, the House will remember how the right hon. Gentleman turned with obvious satisfaction to that which was more congenial by far; to speak out his mind, and particularly to declare that—

"The Established Church in Wales is an advancing Church, an active Church, a living Church, and I hope very distinctly a living Church rising from elevation to elevation."

It is not we who are slow to recall that speech of last year of the right hon. Gentleman. That speech contained another remarkable sentence, another remarkable piece of information as clearly conveyed as words can convey—at all events, as clearly as the words of the right hon. Gentleman could convey. He admitted that there might be an element of exaggeration in his former speech; but it is very significant to note the terms in which he refers to the character of the task which would have to be undertaken by anyone who proposed to disestablish the Church of Wales. He said—

"And I say now what I believed then, and what I believe now, that the operation of disestablishing the Church of Wales from the Church of England will not be found very easy. I suspect that it will be found that it is tied and knotted and tangled, I might almost say in such a multitude of legal bonds and meshes with the general body of the Church of England, that it would be a very formidable matter indeed to accomplish this purpose."

Anyone who heard the right hon. Gentleman was conscious of three things:

irst, that he was anxious to remove the effect which, during 21 years, his earlier speech had been exercising upon the minds of the people of this country, by the defence which he then made for the Church of Wales; secondly, that he bore emphatic testimony to the good which the Church was doing in Wales; and, thirdly, that he gave notice that whatever might be done by those who should come after him, it would not be for him to do the work of Disestablishment. He did support, in a fashion, that Resolution. He did, I believe, pair in favour of that Resolution; but he rested his case with regard to it not upon any attack on the character or work of the Church in Wales, nor upon the smallness of the minority of the people forming the membership of the Church, but on the ground that the majority of the people of Wales, he believed, desired Disestablishment. Therefore, not upon the ground of Church policy, or high policy, but on the ground of separatism, he accepted that majority for the Disestablishment of the Church in Wales. He was yielding to that passing craze of separatism, which has attacked the minority in this House, and which would set up again barriers and fences between the families of our people that have almost been erased and trodden down by the friendly footsteps of many generations. His speech did not greatly help the assailants of the Welsh Church. But what have they themselves to say in regard to the Resolution? I watched the hon. Members the Mover and Seconder of the Resolution, and they have taken warning by what the right hon. Gentleman said last year. They did not this year talk about the Church of England in Wales; nor, indeed, did they make any attempt whatever to prove either of the two propositions contained in the Resolution. The first proposition in this Resolution is—

will examine that proposition presently; but if I had only to deal with the speeches of the Mover and

Seconder of this Resolution, they would require no answer upon that point at all, for they have not attempted to prove that proposition by any particle of evidence that can reasonably be submitted to the judgment of the House. Let us take the second proposition, without passing altogether away from the first, to which I will return. Take the second proposition, that "the Church ministers only to a small minority of the population." If that proposition is true, it ought to be, in some way or other, capable of proof, and the hon. Members who ask the House of Commons to accept a very serious proposition like this, and who lay it down as one of the premises upon which the House is to move to this decision, ought to give us, at all events, some sort of argument or evidence in its favour. But what have these gentlemen done? It is surely very grotesque. The hon. Member for Flintshire, who moved the Resolution, spoke, as he had very good reason for speaking, very doubtfully with regard to statistics. He says that statistics have been freely handled in this House. I am glad to know that they always will be freely handled. I shall say something later on about the statistics prepared by those who have been professionally engaged to support the case which the hon. Gentleman puts before the House, and I shall venture to handle them somewhat freely. The hon. Member has his doubts about statistics; but instead of getting as near as he could to the statistics with regard to the Church in Wales, instead of giving any sort of excuse—good, bad, or indifferent—for having put the proposition down upon the Paper, he gives us statistics as to the attendance at Welsh churches in Liverpool and Welsh churches in America. What nonsense this is the speaker himself must upon reflection see. He could see in a moment that Welshmen who live in Liverpool are for the most part familiar with the English language, and that when he chose churches in Liverpool at which only Welsh is used he is choosing churches which would not in the least represent the attendances in the churches in Wales. As to these indefinite statistics from America, they seem to be the information of some anonymous person as to that country ; they cannot have any relation whatever to the condition of affairs in Wales. And yet the hon. Member, after giving us these fragmentary and irrelevant anecdotes, proceeds to say that he has now overwhelmingly proved his proposition that the people of Wales are Non-conformists. Let me pass on to another matter with which the hon. Member dealt. He says that in past times the Church of Wales was a corrupt and an incompetent Church. He could hardly use expressions of reproach in describing the condition of Church work either in Wales or in England during, say, the reigns of the Georges, with which I should not be inclined, most sorrowfully, to agree. It was not in Wales alone, but in England also, that there was in those days a decadence of the Church work and a degradation in the character of the ministers of the Church which is now a subject of sorrowful reflection. Yet there were always good and holy and religious-minded men in the Church of Wales as well as in the Church of England, who, to the best of their ability, discharged their duty to both God and man in the ministry of the Church ; but there were, doubtless, many others of a different character ; men who lived—in England as well as in Wales—weak and degraded lives. I am glad to say, however, that in Wales, as well as in England, the Established Church has escaped from the discredit which has been brought upon it by this latter class. Our extrication from these difficulties was probably earlier than in Wales. We in England were a less scattered people ; public opinion was more effective and more active, and perhaps it would be right to say that owing to circumstances a higher standard of character had been maintained, so we escaped earlier than in Wales. But thank God the troubles and degradation to which I refer have now almost gone ! We have got rid in England, and I believe in Wales, of the drinking parson, the sporting parson, the gambling parson, of the pluralist and the absentee ; we have almost got rid of the magistrate parson, and, for my own part, I am very anxious that we should get rid of the political parson. These reforms have already been secured to a great extent in both countries, and those who are most active and vigorous in carrying on Church work in England and in Wales are men who devote themselves to discharging their high duties to the State and to the Church in the most self-denying exercise of their great calling. But when this is the case, both in England and in Wales, to what purpose is it that we are to be reminded of those scandals of a century and a half ago, or even of things which may in scattered instances be found a little later ? The hon. Member who moved this Resolution gave us as his most recent instance of misconduct in Wales an instance of a Bishop who, in 1830, was enjoying an enormous income and appointing his sons and his nephews to sinecure livings. Sixty-one years is a substantial time in the history of a Religious Body, and during those 61 years the progress of the Church both in England and Wales has been a course of continuous and undisturbed improvement ; and now no one, I am sure, can allege or point to any scandal with regard to England or to Wales comparable to that which the hon. Gentleman has spoken of as having existed 61 years ago. Let me suggest to the hon. Member that he was not logical in bringing this sort of evidence before the House in support of his Resolution. If the hon. Member could have said that 150 years ago the Church in Wales was an active, and a vigorous Church, preaching the pure faith, ministering diligently and faithfully to the people, discharging its duties with zeal and with earnestness, whereas now it had lost that pure faith, and the energetic and true life had become corrupt and disorderly and inefficient, then he would have given us some ground for his bringing forward his Motion to disestablish the Church in that part of the United Kingdom. But when he points to the fact that the Church in Wales 150 years ago was feeble and unfit for its Divine work, and that now it has risen to such a pitch of efficiency and of purity that no one will challenge it, and no one will bring an accusation against it, is he not giving us the very best reason in the world for not estroying a Church whose energy has hys been revived and purified, and for llowing the country in which it exists o profit by its teaching and its work? I venture to say that in the ine he has taken, and the suggestions e has made as to those scandals of a ong-gone past being sufficient to in-lue us to disestablish the Church of Wales, he is directly contradicting the olopes and teachings of those great men whose memory he calls upon us to rever-nce. Never was a more fitting emorial placed in Westminster Abbey, or one more thoroughly deserved there, than the medallions of the brothers Wesley which are upon its walls. Does not the hon. Member see that in asking us to disestablish the Church in Wales he is acting in direct contradiction to their hopes and principles, and to the Society which they have founded.

MR. SAMUEL SMITH: No.

SIR EDWARD CLARKE: I will prove it. The hon. Member has said that the great men he has mentioned—Weasley, Rowland, and Whitfield—had been turned out of the Church. He is mistaken. Wesley and Rowland remained faithful members of the Church, and they lived and died declared members of the Church. I believe there was a time in the early part of his life when Wesley was not admitted to the pulpits of this country; but he was admitted to those pulpits before he died. John Wesley was re-admitted to those pulpits; and, his last words, practically the words of testament by Weasley to those who were to follow him in the body which he had founded, constituted a declaration that he lived and died in the Church of England, and he left his dying injunctions to the members of that body that they should never depart from the doctrines and principles of that Church. I must mention another matter. We are sometimes told that the Church ought to be Disestablished in order that she may be freed from control. We have had a scene in this House, upon the 29th July of last year, a scene which was very painful to all Churchmen who were trying to pass a Bill o enable the Church to expel from ts benefices clergymen who had been guilty of gross immorality or other grave offences. That Bill was opposed, and the Churchmen were told in so many words that we should not be allowed to purify the Church; and that if we wanted a measure to give power to the Church to purify itself, we must consent to Disestablishment. I remember on that occasion three hon. Members on the opposite side of this House—the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton, the hon. Member for the Eccles Division of Lancashire, and the hon. Member for the Exchange Division of Liverpool—all protesting against this opposition, and the hon. Member for the Exchange Division of Liverpool said that to postpone dealing with grave scandals until they could deal with the question of Establishment would be a crying injustice. But it is a mistake to say that a disestablished Church would be a free Church, free from control. At the present moment the great Nonconformist Bodies of this country are limited not only as to their discipline, but as to their doctrine, by bonds which Parliament alone can break. The papers yesterday had a quotation from the Methodist Recorder with regard to a proposed change in the regulations of the body which follows John Wesley; and the section of the deed poll which the Wesleyan Methodists are now coming to Parliament to ask to be relieved from by Act of Parliament, is a very remarkable one. They cannot now allow a minister to remain more than three years upon a circuit, and the Wesleyan Methodists are now coming to Parliament asking to be relieved from that regulation which prevents them appointing any person for more than three years successively to the use and enjoyment of any of their chapels, and I think the hon. Member, when he speaks of a free Church, will find in the last line of this section a very interesting refutation. It was enacted by the eleventh section of Mr. Wesley's deed poll, of the 28th of February, 1784, that—

"The Conference shall not, nor may, nominate or appoint any person to the use and enjoyment of, or to preach and expound God's Holy Word in any of the chapels and premises so given or conveyed, or which may be given or conveyed upon the trusts aforesaid, who was not either a member of the Conference or admitted into connection with the same, or upon trial as aforesaid, nor appoint any person for more than three years successively to the use and enjoyment of any chapel and premises already given, or to be given or conveyed upon the trusts aforesaid, except ordained ministers of the Church of England."

At this moment the only persons the Wesleyan Methodist Conference can by law continue more than three years in one place are the ordained ministers of the Church of England. But, Sir, I go further even than this. In the year 1818 there was constituted by Conference a Primitive Wesleyan Methodist Society, and in the year 1871 an Act was passed, the 34th & 35th Vic., Chapter 40, which gave legislative sanction to the Constitution arrived at in 1818. It was enacted by Section 4 that—

"Nothing in this Act contained shall authorise any alteration in the doctrine of the Society as set forth in Part II. of the General Principle of the Methodist Constitution."

Another section allowed them to vary parts of the Constitution which referred only to discipline. The Schedule of that Act contains different parts of that Methodist Constitution, from which I will read an extract—

"Does not the Methodist Society profess to belong to the Church of England? Yes, as a body, for they originally emanated from the Church of England. They originally emanated from the Church of England, and the Rev. John Wesley, the venerable founder of the Connexion, made a declaration of a similar import within less than a year preceding his decease, 'I declare once more that I live and die a member of the Church of England, and that none who regard my judgment or advice will ever separate from it.' (See Arminian Magazine for April, 1790.) "This regulation is not intended to be understood as interfering with the right of private judgment in places where education or prejudices attach members to other Established Churches."

That, Sir, is in the Designs, Part 1, which they are at liberty to alter; but in Part 2, which that body cannot alter except by coming to Parliament, we find this, "What is the foundation of the Methodist doctrine? The Canonical Scriptures of the Old and New Testament. Wherein consists the unity of the Methodist doctrine?" The hon. Member who moved this Resolution said that the doctrine was drawn pure and direct from Holy Writ. I will read to him the doctrine which is obligatory by Act of Parliament upon this body; it cannot be altered without the consent of Parliament. The Primitive Methodist Society of Ireland—

An hon. MEMBER: Is it a public Act or a private Act?

SIR E. CLARKE: A public Act. The hon. Member will find it on the Table from which I have taken it, and the answer given to the question of what the unity of the Methodist doctrines consisted was as follows:—

"Answer.—In teaching and enforcing their doctrines only which are contained in the Scriptures, as taught and explained in the writings of the Rev. John Wesley and the Rev. John Fletcher, particularly Mr. Wesley's notes on the Old and New Testament, his eight volumes of sermons, his appeals, and the doctrinal parts of the Arminian Magazine as maintained by him and published to the period of his decease; also Mr. Fletcher's checks and letters, published by Mr. Wesley."

And when the hon. Member speaks of the freedom of the Church which is not established as the Church of England, has he forgotten for the moment if any body such as a Church comes to be possessed of property or endowment of any sort or kind, there is a condition of things established which prevents it from altering its doctrines or the terms of its membership except by appeal to the House of Commons? With regard to the matter of the number of people in Wales, the hon. Member for Swansea made an observation as to his wish for a census. Well, we have always wished for a census, we are anxious to have a census. It is not the fault of Churchmen that there has not been a census made in Wales as there is in Ireland, to ascertain the religious opinions of the people. Hon. Members on the other side may be well justified in the opposition that they make to that proposal. I do not complain; they form their own judgment in the matter, and they object to our proposal being carried out; but, at all events, if they object to any record being taken by an independent and authoritative body, it is not for them to ask that we shall accept the amateur and somewhat suspicious attempts that they make to get these returns. With regard to this question, which I consider an important one, the hon. Member who moved the Resolution gave the go-by altogether to that part of the use, and says fairly, "I do not choose to deal with Welsh statistics." I do not think that is quite satisfactory; I think we ought to be able to find out in some way what is the proportion between Churchmen and Nonconformists in Wales. The Nonconformists say they desire to obtain returns of the attendances at our churches. Well, they have made several attempts to do this. In the year 1887, it was announced that a religious census was about to be taken by a very active and vigorous Nonconformist in Wales. He was believed to have taken it. He did not publish it. About two years later he published fragments of it, and explained that in the cases in which he had taken returns he had a private census taken for the re-consideration of the figures. I do not say the figures given were not true. One cannot say that; there was no comparative statement on the other side by which to test, but I do say they cannot call upon us to pay any very great respect to an amateur experiment of this kind, founded upon a principle unfair to the churches and unfairly applied. I say a principle unfair to the churches." When the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian had occasion in this House to discuss some years ago—I think 40 years ago—the Motion of Mr. Miall with regard to the disestablishment of the Church of England, he protested against the idea that you could test the efficiency of an established Church by counting the number of persons present at a single service upon a particular Sunday. If you took the number of persons present at special worship you would not establish a fair comparison between the Established Church and other bodies which thought much more of the preaching of the Word, and of attending at particular times in their churches and chapels. It would not be a fair comparison. But I will take for examination a very recent example—the most recent return I think—taken by one of those who have been professionally engaged in support of the Liberationist movement in Wales. There has been a Wales Campaign Fund started, and some of these needy Nonconformists of Wales have given sums of £500 each to establish that fund. I will not inquire too curiously how it has been spent, but I believe it has been partly spent in obtaining the Returns published in the Times newspaper in December of last year. Mr. Owen Owens published in the Times of the 18th December, 1891, a Return which he had obtained from an inquiry set on foot by him into the attendance at churches in the diocese of St. Asaph; and he said that the Return he gave showed that "the proportion of attendants at church on a Sunday did not reach 10 per cent. of the population." It was a curious conclusion, and I should like to tell the House how it was arrived at. There were 73 churches taken in the diocese of St. Asaph's. He got out a total of 113,000 persons in the population and of 11,009 persons in attendance in the churches; and he said that taking these figures they represented a proportion of something less than 10 per cent. I do not think that 10 per cent. is an insignificant number when you take the attendance at one service only, at a church in a rural and somewhat wild district in many parts, upon an extremely inclement day in the month of November. But let me take it. This census can be examined, and has been examined, and the figures which I am going to refer to have been published, and have never been answered. At Wrexham, the amateur who was present on that day omitted five places of Church worship altogether, and he estimated the population at Wrexham at not less than 2,000 persons below its real number. In one place the two enumerators were aged respectively eleven and thirteen years, and as might have been expected from such juvenile officials, there was a difference of 45 per cent. between them. But in nine places—9 churches out of 73—the numbers given as at the congregation service were smaller than the number of communicants who had communicated at these churches upon the Easter Sunday. I need not draw the inference from that fact. But there was one place of all these 73 which was correct, and only one. It was the parish of Hawarden, and the parish of Hawarden, a large parish, with over 6,000 inhabitants, has I am very glad to say a diligent Church ministry and a large attendance at the services. The parish of Hawarden came out in these returns in a way which corresponds with the returns made by the Rector of Hawarden, to the Bishop of the diocese. The explanation is an interesting one. The Rector of Hawarden, is the Rev. Stephen Gladstone, who knew this inquiry was to be made, and offered to give the persons who were conducting the inquiry the figures himself. They accepted the figures, and thus the parish of Hawarden had the singular distinction of being the only correct return, so far as we can see, in the whole of the '73. Now, Sir, this is an example of the statistics which have been given by our opponents. With regard to them, I do not impute bad faith. The controversy we are engaged in to-day is a controversy which may last for many years and involve much—(Cries of "No, no!" from the Opposition Benches)—may last for many years, and, for my own part, I will take care, from the beginning to the end of this controversy, that no word shall be spoken by me which will embitter the antagonism among those who, to my thinking, ought to be working for and in one common cause. I have given an example now of the statistics with regard to ourselves. Let me give something which I confess I am inclined to consider more trustworthy. There are reasons, as I have shown you, to distrust these statistics about us. I think we are entitled to accept the statistics of our antagonists in this matter about themselves. With regard to them, I think they ought not to complain if we examine their own statistics and apply them to the consideration of the question, and I want to ask the attention of the House to the result of some interesting statistics. The four large bodies of Nonconformists in Wales are—the Calvinistic Methodists, who I believe outnumber by about one-half any other Nonconformist body. I think the four largest bodies are the Calvinistic Methodists, the Independents, the Wesleyans, and the Baptists, and they comprise the large majority, almost the whole, of the Nonconformist population of Wales. Now, these four bodies issue every year an account of their Church membership. Two of them issue the account in this form. The Calvinistic Methodists and the Independents give a table of the number of members of their Church, and they also give the number of the adherents of the Churches. It is an important matter to remember what an adherent means, and I shall read the definition of adherent, which is an authoritative definition of the Nonconformist Body—

"Adherent includes all who attend regularly or irregularly at Nonconformist places of worship, all who avail themselves of the religious services of ministers or members of the Nonconformist Body on the occasion of sickness or death in their family, and children of all ages."

In other words, all who can be directly or indirectly described as a Nonconformist. The adherents of the Calvinistic Methodists and Independents, are just over twice as many as the members. Applying these figures to the other two bodies, who give only the number of members but not of adherents, and doubling their figures, or rather more than doubling their figures, in order to produce a fair result, the result of this is: The total adherents in Wales, including Monmouthshire, of the four largest Nonconformist Bodies is, according to the last Return—that of 1890—814,277, from their own books. That is 46 per cent. of the population of the country. I think the hon. Member for Swansea, some years ago, gave an estimate in this House of the number of persons who were Nonconformists, including under that total the Roman Catholics, who were not included in these four Bodies, and he estimated them at 55,000. I believe 56,000 is about right. That would add another 3 per cent. to the Nonconformist Body; and so, according to their own statistics, including adherents, including every child and everybody casually brought into contact with the body, the largest number they can claim of members and of adherents attached as loosely as possible to their body, when added to the number outside this body, comes to 49 per cent. only of the population.

MR. T. E. ELLIS (Merionethshire): Supposing the rest conform?

Sir E. Clarke

SIR E. CLARKE: I shall finish my statement, but I assure the hon. Member I shall not omit to notice the question. But there is another very interesting fact with regard to this. Nonconformity is not evenly distributed over Wales. The eastern part of Wales—~~is~~ seven counties which may truly be called the eastern part of Wales—are places of large population and of increasing population. The six counties in the west

Wales are places more sparsely occupied, of decreasing population. The seven eastern counties, which contain 72 per cent. of the population, ~~are~~ adherents of the Nonconformist bodies, including Roman Catholics, ~~are~~ are more numerous in that than any other part of Wales, amount only 35 per cent. of the population. ~~that~~, according to their own statistics, that part of Wales which is increasing in population, and full of prosperity and promise for the future, is not much more than one-third of the population that, by any method of calculation, can be brought within the Nonconformist Body. It was said, "Do the others conform?" I do not understand the question. There is no such thing as conformity to an Established Church in the sense which it necessarily has when dealing with the Nonconformist Body. The claim of the Church is that all belong to her body, and are entitled to her ministrations; that the doors of her churches are open to all, the ministration of the Sacraments given to all, that the isolations of religion will be given to her clergy to all people amongst whom they live. The strength and power of the Established Church that she directs her unceasing effort that large body which may not come into direct relation with any religious community at all, but which is ~~is~~ to the influence of Christianity and the influence of the teaching of a worthy church; and, again, I say no one will deny—I am sure the hon. Member for St. Asaph himself, who is going to speak this Debate, will not deny—the value of the ministrations of the ministers of the Welsh Church, although they may give to those who have not absolutely declared themselves to be members of a religious body. It was not in a hasty or debating speech that the hon. Member expressed, not long ago, the very highest opinion of the work of the Welsh clergy. In an article, I think in 1885, in the Nineteenth Century, or about that time, he paid his testimony to the character of the clergy in Wales, and a better or more hearty eulogium could not be expected from the most devoted defender of Church Establishment. As the question has been asked, I should just like to point out this. It has been said how about those who lie outside of the membership of the Nonconformist Body. But when one is talking about the membership of the Nonconformist Body, and the number of Nonconformist chapels, and the number of Nonconformist ministers in Wales, one is necessarily exaggerating to a great degree the influence that Nonconformity has in Wales. I will give an instance. In the Diocese of St. Asaph's there are 208 churches of the Established Church. These 208 churches are served by 312 clergymen, and in each parish there is a resident clergyman, who has in some cases assistant curates, attending to the people among whom they live. What is the case with the Nonconformist Body? The Calvinistic Methodists are a very strong body in the Diocese of St. Asaph's. They have 330 chapels in that Diocese. But they have only 70 pastors. Of these 70 pastors 35 have more than one chapel to attend to; and there are forty-three other persons who make up the ministry of the Calvinistic Methodists in that diocese to the number of 113. Altogether, there are 43 persons besides these pastors—men, no doubt, of exemplary life and great capacity to lead others to a religious life—but persons obliged to occupy their daily time in other and secular employment.

MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): Like St. Paul.

SIR E. CLARKE: I heard the interruption. If St. Paul had not had to work for his living he would have had more time to work for his Master. ("Oh, oh!") And I say, while these men may be men of good qualities to guide and lead and encourage others in religion, at all events they cannot, by the nature of things, give such constant pastoral care to the people amongst whom they live, as could be given by those whose whole lives are spent in the discharge of those duties. There exist, then, 330 chapels in the diocese of St. Asaph's; there are 70 pastors. Of these 70 pastors 35 have more than one chapel to attend to. I do not care to dwell upon this subject. I do not care—for my part, I absolutely refuse—to make any attack upon the organisation or work of the Nonconformist Bodies; but I propose to read to the House an extract, not from a writer upon our side, but from a writer who was speaking from the Nonconformist side with regard to this matter. On the 14th May, 1891, there appeared a leading article in the Goleuad, which is the official organ of the Calvinistic Methodists in Wales. This is an extract from the leading article:—

"As is seen in the figures used by Mr. Roberts, our chapels (eglwysi) throughout North and South Wales number 1,258; of these, 724 are in North Wales, including three in Liverpool and Manchester. According to our diary there are only 236 pastors to take care of all these churches.... Let us take an example. We know a district within a presbytery in North Wales where there are 19 churches, and there is only one pastor in the whole district. In cases of illness amongst our members, and when special circumstances call for the presence of a minister, to marry, to baptise, to promote beneficent movements, such as temperance, &c., to hold classes for the young people, to defend the rights of Nonconformists against civil and religious violence and oppression, the Calvinistic Methodists have only one pastor for this tract of country. In the same district there are at least ten clergymen, the great majority of them evincing great zeal for the "Mother Church," and untiring in their efforts to win Nonconformists to their fold. Read the reports of the Sunday Schools in this district, and you find a very great decline in the work of the schools."

I think we are entitled to point out to hon. Members who are seeking to disturb and destroy the work of that Church which maintains in every parish throughout the diocese a clergyman diligent in the performance of his duty, and ministering to the people in whose midst he is placed; it is right for us to remind them that those on their own side, who are most deeply and ardently interested in the work of Calvinistic Methodism, lament the fact, that by the paucity of their pastors as compared with the numbers of their churches, their people are practically left without guardianship, and practically without guidance in spiritual matters. Sir, the time may come when the timid inveracities of this Resolution shall give place to a formal scheme proposed to Parliament by a Minister of the Crown for the humiliation and the despoiling of the Church. If that day should come how will the opposing ranks be filled, and in what principles will the defenders of the Church find their inspiration. We are sometimes told that we are defending vested interests and a Government Department. Sir, to some of us it is no question of the defence of a political institution. The Church is of Divine foundation, its system is Divinely ordered, its faith Divinely guarded from corruption or decay. In the Establishment we find the privilege and obligation of a universal duty; in the endowments which the piety of her sons has, in past ages, consecrated to the Divine service we see the guarantee for the independence of her ministers, and for that unfailing service of charity by which far more than this her heritage is given directly to the poor in the relief of ignorance and sorrow, of sickness and of want. In our belief the inheritance of the Church is the most precious possession of the poor. This is not your belief, but it is that which I share with millions of my fellow-countrymen. Many of those are to be found in the ranks of the Liberal Party: many who, in presence of such considerations as these, will refuse to join in a policy of destruction. But these will not be all. There will, I believe, be with us many who do not share in this belief, do not approve the system of the Church, and do not profess her creed, but who accept as their rule of political conduct something better than the party expediency of the moment. What, Sir, is the characteristic of the higher statesmanship of the day? It is that the principle that the welfare of the people is the supreme law is becoming more and more the rule of our legislation, and of all the activities of our public life. And this other truth we ought to have learned, that the welfare of the people does not mainly depend upon forms of Government, or the arrangement of political privileges, even on the distribution of the national wealth. It depends on the character of the people. Who will deny that the teaching of the National Church is one of the most potent of all the influences which form and elevate the national character. Fixed in a pure and manly faith, secured by the very conditions of its establishment from the peccadistic extravagances of religious favour, and the more permanent anger of priestly domination, it is the strongest of all existing forces to strengthen and refine the spirit of our people, and to teach them that in the fulfilment of Christian duty lies the only hope of protecting our social life from the extremes of a cynical selfishness on the one hand, and on the other from the vagaries of a fantastic and predatory socialism. Sir, we in the Tory Party gladly and gratefully accept the honourable duty of standing foremost in this cause, but we believe that as the years go by there will come to our side more and more of those who place the national welfare above the ties of a political combination, and will claim to share with us the patriotic work of guarding the inseparable interests of the Church and the people.

(6.8.) MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I have listened, and I am sure the House as listened, with interest and admiration to the ingenious and eloquent address of the hon. and learned Gentleman. I admired his speech in many respects and not least in this, that it was so very skilful and successful in diverting attention from the points of the case which are most vital, and dwelling at length on propositions which none of us dispute, and introducing matter entirely irrelevant to the case. The Solicitor General began by the artifice familiar to hon. Gentlemen opposite—that is quoting and dilating upon dicta, which have fallen in the course of his long life from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian. But the hon. and learned Gentleman improved upon former examples by quoting from the right hon. Gentleman when he was not resent to correct the twistings and dislocations from their context of the extracts which he used. Now, Sir, it seems to me that the census statistics which always form a large feature in these Debates may well be left to be dealt with by the Welsh Members. The figures however of the Solicitor General deserve a little notice. He claimed that all who were not proved to be Nonconformists must be assumed to be members of the Church of England. It seems to me that those in Wales in whom the spirit, life and convictions of religion is doing work, attach themselves to the Nonconformists, and only in small proportions to the Church of England. The Solicitor General went on to a more questionable view. He made it apparently ground of accusation against the Nonconformist body that they were so poor as not to be able to have separate and settled ministers for each of their churches. I have thought that was rather a testimony to the fervent attachment of the Nonconformists in Wales to their clergy and churches, when they come to those churches in spite of the comparatively scant ministrations which are offered to them, and when with all their poverty the Nonconformist Churches are able to take a firmer hold on the attachment and attendance of the people than the Church of England, with all her appliances, can do. The Solicitor General went a step further, and in reply to a reference to St. Paul he observed that St. Paul would probably have done much better if he had had nothing but preaching to do. Well, that is a moral to most of us. I think the Nonconformist ministers will be satisfied if nothing worse than that can be said of them, that they followed in the steps of St. Paul—only that the Solicitor General thinks St. Paul was only a moderate success, and that much more would have been accomplished if St. Paul had been a preacher and nothing else. Sir, I must say I was struck by a certain amount of unreality in the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman. He has dealt with this matter as if he were pleading a cause in those Courts which his eloquence adorns. He has attempted to divert the minds of hon. Members from the real issue, as he did in the case of those other clients whose claims he advocated with so much zeal, when the question of licensing compensation was before the House. He gives us forensic arguments based upon the alleged inaccuracy of certain statistics alleged to be inaccurate. He assumes that Members of this House are not to know anything more about Wales than can be learned from evidence that can be called and cross-examined upon in Court, or from statements made by witnesses upon affidavit. Anyone who approaches this question in the spirit of a practical statesman would have given the House the credit of knowing that the majority of the people of Wales are Nonconformist. Be the figures three-fourths to one-fourth, four-fifths to one-fifth, or five-sixths to one-sixth—all these estimates are made—the plain and broad fact stands out, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian has said, that the Church of England in Wales is the Church not only of the rich but of the small minority. We have here a comparatively simple case to deal with. It is not a question of Establishment generally, but a very special and peculiar case that ought to be tried on its own merits. It is the case of an Established Church with every advantage, with undisputed possession, with a great line of ancient tradition behind it—because the Church in Wales is the legitimate historical succession to the Church of St. David—it is the case of an Established Church with all these advantages that has completely failed to make herself a National Church. It is, moreover, a conspicuous instance of failure, because in Wales those conditions for which Established Churches are supposed to be specially needed and to have a special chance of success, have been abundantly prevalent. It is constantly claimed for a National Church that it ought to draw in, and embody and give visible shape to the natural feelings of the people, that it ought to be in accord with their traditions, supported by their sentiment and affection, and be able to give shape to their natural life. It was also claimed by the Solicitor General with great eloquence that the Established Church ought to be the church of the poor; that it is her special mission and function to take the poor under her protection, and do for them what they are unable to do for themselves. In Wales the Church has had a great and effectual door to her in these respects. The Welsh are a religious people. Their religion is more constant and devout than that of any other people in these realms. They are a patriotic people and devoted to their national language, their ancient songs, their national traditions. Wales is a poor country. It is less poor in proportion to its number than England; and yet in both of these respects—as regards her national character and her hold upon the people—the Church of England in Wales has been a most conspicuous failure. The national life of the Established Church, all the religious fervour, gone out into the Nonconformist bodies. I do not say all the people have left the Established Church, but I say that the passion, the fervour, the ardour of religion, the attachment to the Welsh language, to Welsh history, and to Welsh nationality, has gone to the Nonconformists; and masses have drifted away from the Established Church, leaving it the Church of the rich and not of the poor, the Church of the few and not of the many. Why? Because the Church is established; because it is the organisation of an Established Church. That happens because the Church being endowed and having benefices, the people saw her wealth and her benefices despoiled for the benefit of England. That process began early in the history of Wales when the tithes of the South Wales Churches were taken away and given to the Abbeys of Gloucester and Tewkesbury. It is because the Church has been an Endowed Church that those misfortunes mentioned in the history have befallen her. The fact is it is the Church of the rich, a Church which does not look for, and does not depend upon, the contributions of the poor, which does not possess an obvious motive of going to the poor and associating itself with the poor—it is that which made the Church sink into the lethargy of the last century and caused the people to drift into the hands of the Nonconformists. I do not think the fact is put too strongly by John Bright when he used these striking words:—

"It is the Establishment that has killed the Church in Wales."

That is the case we present to the House, and it is a case which the Solicitor General has not answered. It cannot be said that religion would languish without the Established Church because with the Established Church it has languished. It cannot be said that the Established Church if disestablished and disendowed will not be able to support its religious ministrations, because it has a very strong claim upon the superabundant wealth of the people of England. It cannot be said in defence of the continued existence of the Church that it is justified because of the necessity of maintaining an educated clergy in every parish; because, Sir—thanks to the opening of the Universities of Oxford and of Cambridge—there are now in the Nonconformist Churches, and particularly among the younger men, those who can hold their own in education and intelligence with the parsons of the Church. It was said by a former dignitary of the Church:—

"There were educated men, but they could not speak Welsh; there were men who could speak Welsh, but they were not educated. The educated men could not speak to the people; those who could speak to them had nothing to tell them."

The reason the Solicitor General gave us why the Church of England in Wales should be allowed to hold its own against the wishes of the great majority of the people was that it is improving. I admit that gladly and heartily. I do not think it is denied by any on this side of the House. I have the pleasure of knowing many clergymen of the Established Church in Wales, and I know that many of them are men of the highest character and attainments, and of the strongest devotion to their duties. But I have always felt that they are in a very painful and even in a very false position. They are put out of touch with the sentiments of the people; they are forced into an attitude of proselytism, obliged to make themselves the agents, whether they liked it or not, of the proselytising spirit that is now so active in Wales, and forced into that very position to which the Solicitor General made reference, that against their will they are made political partisans. Their idea of their loyalty to their Church requires them to take part in political agitation on their own behalf, and forces them into opposition, not only to their nonconforming brethren, but to a great many of those among whom they live. It is from that we desire to relieve them, and if hon. Members opposite knew as much about Wales and her clergymen as I do, having travelled all over the country in the course of my duties connected with a public mission, they would know that these difficulties were very pressing and very painful to some of the best and wisest men of the Church in Wales. There is another observation which must rise in every man's mind when he hears the improvement of the Church in Wales referred to. Institutions have gone on improving just as the hand of the reformer was upon them. No institution ever was at its worst when it was reformed. That is only natural, and it arose not because the institution began to improve when threatened, not alone because of the spirit which works outside for a drastic and speedy reform, but also because there is a spirit work which works inside for a softer and milder reform in the essence of the institution itself. Let me mention a couple of cases. When the Bastille was taken there were found very few prisoners in it. It was not taken at the time when the real grievances existed, but at a time when the improving influences had been at work. I need not remind the House that the Established Church in Ireland at the time of its disestablishment had been improving in every respect—in the character of its ministers, in the attachment of those who belong to it, in its relations with the people. I do not think, therefore, that the House need be surprised that the Church is improving in view of the prospect that lies before it of a drastic reform. Sir, I protest against the language used by the Solicitor General when he asked us not to destroy this edifice. We propose to relieve the Church from an indefensible position, to set it free from the trammels in which it is now bound. We propose to give it a far stronger claim upon the liberality and attachment of its people than what it can have as an established and endowed Church. We believe that the success it has attained of late years, and the increase of attachment to it on the part of the people, have been gained not so much by it as a State Church, but by it in the very measureable proportion in which it becomes a voluntary Church. It is because it has had not to rely upon its endowments, but because it has had to appeal to the liberality and attachment of its non-adherents, that it is more prosperous than it was before. We think a little more of this kind of influence will do it still more good. We believe that when it is thrown entirely upon its own resources it will rise to the strength that it has not yet attained, and will fulfil better than ever those purposes for which it exists. It raises very large sums already. It can raise still larger ones. The sums it has raised are small in proportion to the wealth of its adherents, to those which are raised by the nonconforming bodies. Now, there is one other argument which I know is always dwelt on in this case. The Solicitor General did not, except in passing, advert to it. It is the argument that the Church in Wales is one with the Church in England. He did advert in one point to that argument, because near the beginning of his speech he referred to what he called "the craze of separatism which seems to have seized upon a Political Party in this country." He attributed the desire for disestablishment in Wales to what he called this "craze of separatism," by which I suppose he intended to describe the desire of any people or race, or nation within these realms to have such legislation as they desire, and suited to their own needs. Now I am not going to argue the question whether Wales is a nation, but I will say there are present in Wales—and no man with open eyes can deny it—conditions and circumstances which make it so unlike England that it ought to be dealt with differently from England. Before I part from that word "separation," I should like to remind the Solicitor General as to who it was who first broached this doctrine of separation, as he called it, with reference to Established Churches. We do not claim, Mr. Speaker, what may be called the patent of that view—that the question of an Established Church in one part of these islands should be dealt with according to the wishes of the people inhabiting that part of the country. That doctrine was first laid down by a noble Lord who used to lead one section in this House, and who was at that time the Leader of the Liberal Party—the noble Lord who is now the Duke of Devonshire. Speaking in Scotland, he laid down the proposition that the wishes of the people of Scotland ought to be conclusive as to the establishment or non-establishment of the Church of Scotland. He declared that it was for the Scottish people to say whether they wished that Church to be established or not. It is upon the basis of that doctrine that my hon. Friends proceed when they say that the wishes of the Welsh people ought similarly to be accepted as conclusive with regard to the existence of the Establishment in Wales. I know it will be said that the Church in Wales is one with the Church in England, and that it must be defended for the sake of the Church in England. What does this mean? If the Established Church in Wales were a church distinct from the Church in England; if it were another religious body altogether, and if three-fourths of the people of these islands were opposed to it, and did not belong to it, would he still contend that it ought to remain as an Establishment? Clearly not. Suppose that the Church being one with the Church of England, should nevertheless exist in a separate island, would it be contended, with the precedent set in the case of Ireland, that it should remain established only because it is part of the Church of England? We arrive, therefore, at this conclusion, that the church establishment in Wales is to be maintained because it is one with the Church of England, and because Wales is contiguous by land with England, adjoining England, and on the land frontier, instead of lying by itself in the sea. Therefore the argument which the Tory Party and the Solicitor General are obliged to put to the Welsh people is this. You are to continue to acquiesce in an Establishment which three-fourths of your people reject and which nine-tenths of your Members reject—because I believe that the division of Welsh Members at present is 27 to 3. You are to continue to maintain this Church, which you hold to be a grievance, for the sake of England, because it is one with the Church of England and because some injury will be inflicted upon England and the Church of England on cutting away this Welsh Church. I think that is an argument which the people of Wales will be very slow to accept. They will say, why should we be sacrificed for England? I do not claim that for every purpose Wales should be considered as a distinct country, but I do claim that for many purposes Wales is so distinct a country that it ought to receive special treatment. You, yourselves, have admitted it in your Acts, which are intended for Wales alone, because you felt that the condition of Wales and the wishes of the people were special elements in the question. I say no man can go into Wales without feeling, not only in the language, but also in the character of the people, and in their social and economical conditions, that there are many facts which suggest independent legislation for them. The Welsh people at any rate feel as a nation. No one who knows the Welsh can doubt that the pulse of national life beats very strong in the veins of the people. I think the only effect of the continued denial of the claims of the people of Wales for legislation, which they desire to have, will be to intensify what you call the separatist and distinct feeling, and to strengthen the cry for Home Rule. If now, you adopt the prudent policy of making timely concessions to Wales, you would appease those demands and reduce the claims which they make to a compass in which you would find nothing to object to. But if you insist upon flouting and disregarding their wishes you will increase the demand for separatist government, and you will heap faggots upon the fire of Home Rule. I have only one word more to say on the effect of this policy on the Church of England. You say the Church must be defended because she is one with the Church of England. That was said in 1868 and 1869, in regard to the Church in Ireland, which was united by a Statute, and a very solemn Statute to the Church of England. Such arguments were used with far more force then, because it was alleged that the process must go on at once in England. Nobody I suppose on the opposite Benches would now propose to re-establish on a Protestant basis the Church in Ireland. Nobody will deny that the Church is not weaker than it was in 1869. I believe myself she is far more defensible than when linked to an altogether indefensible sister church. So will it be now if Disestablishment is carried out for Wales. There is a metaphor which I notice is generally used by those who support the Church in such a Debate as this. It was used last year :—

This metaphor, I know, has had considerable influence on people's minds. I would like to observe there is such a thing in war as an indefensible outwork, there is such a thing as an outwork from which a prudent general retires, because he knows that he cannot permanently hold it, because he knows that it weakens his forces and his position as a whole. If that be the case of the Established Church in Wales, I believe that the sooner the Church of England retires from it the stronger will she be within her own walls. This question of Established Churches is not a new matter. An attempt has twice been made to force Established Churches upon nations which did not wish to have them—once in Scotland, and once in Ireland. Do you suppose that now in times which are more peaceful, but in times which are much more democratic, and when the wishes of the Representatives of the people are admitted to be conclusive, you can permanently deny this demand of the Welsh people. I do not know what hon. Members opposite will think, but I would remind them of the proverb, which says that even an opponent may say that which is true. And I would venture to say that the state of matters in Wales is such, that for the sake of the peace and good feeling of the Church, not less than respect for the wishes of the people of Wales, the Tory Party ought to retire from their position as to the Church in Wales as soon as they possibly can.

*(6.46.) SIR JOHN PULESTON (Devonport) : I do not wish to intervene for any lengthened time in this Debate. The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has dwelt very forcibly upon the idea that we are here to disestablish the Welsh Church in order to strengthen the Church in England. Now, I want to know—we all want to know—how far that is the opinion of hon. Members sitting on that side of the House—how far does it accord with the view of the Liberation Society and all its agents who were working for the disestablishment of the Church in Wales? I am sure the hon. Gentleman and those who sit with him, and behind him, will not desire to put forth arguments in favour of the Resolution upon any false pretences, but certainly, if we may assume that he is speaking for the Party upon his side of the House, who are in favour of this Motion, a new development has taken place in the discussion this evening, and we shall now be able to quote the hon. Gentleman, believing that he represents his Party, and the statement that the Disestablishment of the Church in Wales is only asked for by them in order that it may strengthen the establishment in England.

MR. BRYCE : The hon. Member will perhaps permit me to state that I did not say anything of the kind. I said nothing about the motive we had in asking for it, or rather I said the motive we had in asking for it was a totally different thing, but I pointed out to hon. Members opposite, who are legitimately interested in the Church of England that it would not weaken her.

SIR J. PULESTON : I am glad the hon. Gentleman has got up, because it is important to have the matter clear. At the same time, the effect of the statement made by the hon. Gentleman in his speech indubitably and clearly was that Disestablishment of the Church in Wales would greatly strengthen—that is the hon. Gentleman's word—the Establishment in England, and it is certainly a legitimate conclusion to draw from his words. This Resolution was put down on the Paper to apply only to Wales, but was there no sinister motive for inserting the wedge of a larger measure of Disestablishment in England? It is important, I think, to understand that. Now, Sir, it is a little singular, after the very eloquent speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian (Mr. Gladstone), whose absence I am sure we all regret to-night—after his strong statements, some of which were quoted by my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General in his eloquent speech to-night, condemning the terms of the Resolution, that that Resolution should appear again in the same terms this year. The Resolution proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for Flintshire states—

The hon. Gentleman opposite objects to having his Leader, in his absence, inconveniently quoted; but, on the other hand, I may say, in passing, he did not object to quote the Duke of Devonshire on a point to which there may have been, I think, some reply, because it was distinctly taken out of its context; but there can be no mistaking the language of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian. It is emphatic; and every sentence can be taken collectively or separately. One quotation was made by my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General on the subject. I can give another, in which the right hon. Gentleman said—

"The efforts and exertions of the Church in Wales now and for a good many years, and the growing and increasing efforts, are such as do in my opinion great credit, both to the clergy and the laity of that Church. I render them ungrudging recognition, and I do not think it my duty on this occasion to withhold any portion of the praise which is justly due."

The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian said a great deal in the same direction, and certainly setting completely at naught the arguments which have been made by my hon. Friend who moved the Resolution, and by the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down as to the present condition of the Church in Wales. Then, as to the statistics, both hon. Gentlemen who have spoken wisely avoided going into all the details. I do not propose to go into them either, but I believe there is one thing which has been made perfectly clear, namely, that less than one-half, or at least not more than one-half of the people of Wales are avowed Nonconformists. That, I think, there is no question about. That, I believe, is an admission which was made when my hon. and learned Friend was speaking. It was desired in this House to have a Religious census, but hon. Gentlemen opposite made that impossible, and particularly the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Denbighshire (Mr. G. Osborne Morgan). But immediately after we separated for the Session, amateur censuses were taken all over Wales, and encouraged by the same right hon. Gentleman who refused to have an official census made by the Government.

MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN : I did not.

SIR J. PULESTON : The right hon. Gentleman publicly, by letters and speeches, made it impossible.

MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN : I in no way encouraged the taking of these informal censuses.

SIR J. PULESTON : No; but the right hon. Gentleman has been very prompt in quoting them and using them in his speeches. Therefore, if that is not an equivalent to encouragement, I do not know what is. I will refer to my hon. Friend the Member for the Carnarvon Boroughs (Mr. Lloyd-George), and I do so because he has been, as is well known, put forward as a prominent advocate of the Disestablishment question. His views of the principle upon which the claim for Disestablishment is based happen to differ very much from those put forward to-night, and he is supposed to represent, at all events, a considerable section of the Disestablishment party in Wales. When speaking the other day, he threw overboard altogether the issue of religious equality and Church freedom, upon which alone the claim for Disestablishment has been made here to-night, and based the claim for Disestablishment in Wales wholly upon Welsh national grounds. It is quite open to the hon. Gentleman to base it upon that ground or any other, but it is right to show to the House that the claim made by hon. Gentlemen who have spoken to-night, namely, that it is based upon the cause of religious freedom, is not accepted by others who are advocating Disestablishment. The hon. Member went on to say, and in the same speech—

"We have to consider the English Constituencies, and that, unfortunately, there are still a few Liberal politicians who regard religious equality as good enough for Irishmen and Welshmen, but utterly inapplicable to their own countrymen; and the significance of Welsh disestablishment would lie in the fact that it was the first great political measure recognising the separate national existence of Wales."

I quote from the hon. Member's speech, which is one of several utterances making for the same line of thought and argument, to show that behind this effort at Disestablishment there is a great deal more than this question of religious equality and Church freedom. In Wales, the advocates of Disestablishment—and I do not think anyone will say that I do not have some knowledge of the Principality—may be divided into two sections, one honestly against Disestablishment as a principle, and whose views we must all respect, and another section who use the question as a political stalking horse of agitation. I have more respect for the former than I have for the latter. Then again, one of the conspicuous arguments in favour of the Disestablishment of the Welsh Church was that it was an alien church, but this also has been effectively answered by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian, who said—"We may really speak with as much justice of the Church of Wales in England as of the Church of England in Wales." Yet these strong assertions of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian continue to be absolutely ignored in the speeches we have just heard from the other side to-night, and on every occasion absolutely and unequivocally by the hon. Member for the Carnarvon Boroughs and other in their speeches out of doors. This alien question has become a standing word in the Radical vocabulary as applicable to other interests, but they are not the best friends of Wales, who, in advocating the Disestablishment of the Church, ignored the English population, who were more and more attracted to the Principality, and contributed to our prosperity and our interest. No part of this country is more loyal, I venture to say, than the Principality of Wales, yet this alien question is carried beyond the limits of anything like Welsh nationality. I will give an illustration of the way in which the alien policy is used. When the touching letter of Her Majesty thanking her people for the sympathy given to her on the death of the Duke of Clarence, the newspaper with which the hon. Member for the Carnarvon Boroughs is closely connected—which indeed is known practically as his newspaper—had no better commentary to offer on that letter of the Queen than to say—

"that Wales does not waste any love on Royalty;" and speaking of the Royal Family added :—

"If they were swept back again to their own German Fatherland they never would be missed. Wales is intensely Republican."

Happily such words have no echo in the heart of the large majority of the Welsh people, but are confined to a small section, and that section those who put forward this alien policy as against the Church. The founders of Methodism in Wales, to whom reference has been made, always spoke well of the Church, and deprecated any schism. As to proselytism, a member of any denomination is only performing his duty in endeavouring, by proper means, to attach others to his Church; and if that be so, I hope the Church in Wales will continue to be a proselytising Church. But when the hon. Member for Carnarvon Boroughs spoke of it as proselytising by means of the pewter pot, I think that is an insult to the whole Nonconformist body which they must resent. Out of doors hon. Members use language which is anything but temperate, and on occasions extravagant and violent. By so doing, they provoke a temporary cheer, but revolt the good feeling of both Churchmen and Nonconformists. I have extracts here from Welsh newspapers which indicate that the sense of the country is strongly against these violent declarations of the organs of the opposite Party. There is no reason why we should not import some spirit of Christian unity and charity into the discussion of a measure so important as this. I must notice the absence of any reference to Disendowment in the Resolution before the House. Disendowment is the fascinating allurement dangled before the people of Wales by hon. Members responsible for this Resolution, yet it is not uttered in this House when, from time to time, Resolutions of this character are brought forward. In Wales that was felt to be the most important consideration, and the principle of Disestablishment was to a great extent thrown aside for it. I am of opinion that we should arrive at a better understanding of this question if it came before the House in the shape of a Bill which, by its details, would show us what was really meant. Not a few Members opposite are opposed to Disestablishment for England. They at least should give their votes against Disestablishment in Wales, for Welsh Disestablishment is avowedly used outside the House with a view to promoting the Disestablishment of the Church in England. However much we may differ upon this subject, there surely should be a way of discussing it in a serious and Christian-like spirit, and trust that the question will be discussed on its merits, and that the real significance of this Resolution will not be misunderstood by hon. Gentlemen who say they are opposed to Disestablishment.

(7.15.) MR. A. J. WILLIAMS (Glamorgan, S.): I wish to point out that the Church of England in Wales has failed, in the terms of the Resolution, to fulfil its professed object as a means of promoting the religious interests of the Welsh people. The Solicitor General and most of the speakers on the other side seem to have relied for most of their argument against the Resolution upon a recently published article upon what was called the "Phenomenal Advance" which the Church had made in Wales during the last 20 years. It appears that between the years 1841 and 1886, in the Diocese of St. David's alone, non-resident incumbents were reduced from 74 to 7; in the Diocese of Llandaff from 137 to 5; and it is adduced as an argument to show that the Church of England has made an attempt to do its duty in recent years, that in 1841 there were 174 incumbents in one diocese in Wales who were not Welsh-speaking. It is quite true that great changes have been made, for since 1864 the Ecclesiastical Commissioners and Queen Anne's Bounty have contributed £200,000 towards this work of propagandism in Wales, and all this effort has been directed, with unfailing energy and persistency, to the desperate attempt of propping up the Church in Wales. I do not dispute that the Church by a voluntary effort has done a great deal, and we take it as an axiom that, in proportion to the extent to which a religious body is supported by voluntary effort, it flourishes in its spiritual life. To that extent, I admit there has been a remarkable growth in the Church of England in Wales, but where has it been displayed? The Solicitor General produced statistics with reference to East Wales, and we know that there has been since 1871 an immense increase of population in Glamorganshire, but those people come from England, Scotland, and Ireland, and have brought their religion with them. They are not Welshmen, and naturally the "phenomenal advance" of the Church in Wales has been its growth in our large towns. But if you go to Cardiff, and spend a week there, or go 16 or 17 miles into the Rhondda District, you will find that the overwhelming majority of the Welsh colliers are not only Welsh-speaking but Nonconformist. As to the new churches which have been built, the Dean of Bangor at the Church Congress at Swansea said he did not rely upon figures, but upon the experience of Welsh clergymen, when he said that many of the churches were empty, and five-sixths of the Welsh-speaking nation were outside the Church. It is conclusively shown that all the efforts of the wealthy and all the influence of social position have been brought to bear to increase the number of churches for the benefit of Englishmen, and that they have not benefited the Welsh people at all. To my mind, Mr. Speaker, the saddest part of this long struggle is the bitterness, the class jealousy and hostility, and the feeling of social inequality and injustice, which have been brought about by the continued existence of an Established Church which is the Church of a small ascendant minority. Those small shopkeepers, peasants, and farmers who have built their chapels, and raised £400,000 a year to keep up, very inadequately, the worship after their heart and conscience, see all the wealth, all the social influence used in in favour of this small Church, which is alien in the sense that it is the Church of those who are foreign to the nationality to which we belong. A constant sense of injustice is stamped in the hearts of the Welsh people by seeing this endowed Church supported out of what we maintain is the property of the people. The social disadvantages I will show by an illustration. A farmer's son, who might be a dull and stupid peasant, with just enough in his head to be ordained, directly he becomes a curate, is immediately recognised by the county squire and all the county gentry, and is taken on to a social footing with them all. On the other hand, you may have one of the ablest young men in Wales, who may proceed from an elementary school to the University College and be ordained as a Congregationalist or Baptist, and though he be the brother or cousin of the farmer's son, he would not receive the same social recognition. We want to get rid of this injustice, and to put every religious body in our country on one common footing, without privilege. But I deprecate the suggestion from that side, that in carrying on this great crusade we are actuated by any feelings of bitterness or hostility or dislike to the Established Church. Nothing would be a greater blessing to that Church in Wales than that this great measure of justice should be carried out. If the advice of my hon. Friend is acted on at once, something may be done; but whatever is done by the other side, in a few short months this great question will come to a final issue. We know what the expressed wish of the great majority of the Welsh people, as expressed by their representatives in this House, is, and that cannot and will not be much longer disregarded by the people of England, when once more we have an opportunity of appealing to them, and this great injustice will be done away. In the meantime it is a great trial, but it has done great things for the Welsh people. It has made us feel first of all that we are a people; it has drawn out all our best qualities; it has made us men; it has created in us a sense of justice, and it has brought home to us the conviction that a great people with great religious instincts have a right to choose their own form of worship.

(i. 35.) MR. ADDISON (Ashton-under-Lyne): The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down says that the great mass of the Welsh people are outside the Established Church. But even if the statistics be true, has he shown that their happiness or prosperity will be in the least degree promoted by the passing of this Resolution? He has given us an illustration of the different social treatment of the curate of the Established Church and the minister of a Nonconformist body. How would Disestablishment cure that? If you were to carry it to-morrow you would still have the titles, bishops, archdeacons, and so on, as you have to-day, and in the same way the English people would form their congregations, and there would still be that sense of social inequality of which you complain, and all that bitterness of feeling which is excited by the fact that the Church of England curate is on good terms with the squire. I think that feeling is fomented by Motions of this kind, which are not directed to any practical good. We know that the property of the Church and charities have been dealt with for a long time by Queen Ann's Bounty, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and the Charities Commissioners, and, therefore, I ask what good will be done to any human being by the Disestablishment and Disendowment of the Church in Wales? I do not mean merely material good, but what spiritual, or social, or moral good do you expect from such a Motion as this? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Macclesfield apparently not inclined to answer this question. In a letter to-day we learn that he was never in better health and spirits; but we do not find in that letter, what we usually find in such letters, any reasoning as to the utility of this Motion. In what he said at Newcastle we find not one word as to the policy or justice of this measure. He did not venture to say that any good would accrue from Disestablishment; all he has ever said is that a majority, he finds, of the Welsh people ask this, and what a majority asks it is prudent for politicians to give. That is all we can find from the Newcastle programme to the letter of this morning; that is all the encouragement hon. Members opposite get from their leader. We have heard to-day that the Established Church in Wales is forced on the majority of Nonconformists. In what sense is it forced upon them? In what sense is it an impediment to their worship or injurious to them? They are not compelled to contribute to it, nor to go within its walls. They are never attacked by it. I assert that no clergyman of the Church of England ever uses language about the Nonconformists of the same nature as they use about the Church of England. Disendowment is, I suppose, included in Disestablishment, the latter being a greater kind of word and less likely to alarm the people of England; and no doubt the principal object is Disendowment. The revenues of the Established Church in Wales are not sufficient for its purposes. It is an active and energetic Church, and is undoubtedly doing much good work there. The hon. Gentleman made a mistake when he said that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners had devoted large sums to church building; they have no power to appropriate a single shilling to such an object. The church building has been brought about solely by the zeal and contributions of the members of the Church themselves. On what grounds, then, do you desire to abolish the ministers and deprive them of that property which is insufficient for their purposes? Is it "the tithe"? It might have been argued at one time that tithe was of the nature of a tax, but the position of hon. Members opposite has been that tithe is operty, and nothing else. They desire have that devoted to some secular national purpose. When the hon. member for Midlothian Disestablished the Irish Church the foundation of his scheme was that tithe as property, and it was so stated. If he had treated it in any her way he would have had to mit it, and it would have benefited very much that landed class who were little in favour of it then as they are now. Is it the buildings you want? It seems to me that the ancient Welsh churches have been restored at great cost, and new ones built by the voluntary efforts of the Churchmen in Wales. Do you propose to take them? If they are not proposed to be taken, what does disendowment mean except taking away the tithe, which is property used by a large body in Wales, and insufficient for its purposes. Then we get to disestablishment. There is a disadvantage in a motion of this kind, that it does not state exactly what it means. Arguments have been used as if Establishment meant what it did 100 years ago in this country, and what it means to-day in Spain, Russia, and other continental countries. But surely not. Members must not forget that establishment in that sense no longer exists? For two or three generations has been, in a sense, going; we have had the opening of cemeteries, the abolition of Church rates, and other steps have been taken to remove the use of inequality and injustice which everybody felt. There is a tendency in Members opposite, and those who speak on behalf of Nonconformists, to forget the enormous advantages they enjoy. They are apt to forget their own property. The Nonconformist bodies themselves have received the benefit of semi-Establishment. Their chapels are freed from rates and taxes, their charities are also free to be settled or ever. They have other privileges than the exemptions of ministers, and so on. If hon. Members want to know how important these privileges are, let them look at France and other countries on the Continent, and see whether the Churches there would not be lessened and proud to have the rights which are granted to Nonconformists in England and Wales. You have exactly the same rights with regard to your schools as the Church of England has in respect of the education and fee grant. It is put as a great injustice that the Church of England has built more schools than the Nonconformists. That was done by the voluntary contributions of the Church people. There is no fund and no tithe available for the building of schools, and if it be true that education in Wales is monopolised by the Church of England, what does it mean but that the Church people, by their voluntary exertions, have spread a network of schools over Wales; and, if so, that is a great argument in favour of the work and power of that Church in Wales? I really fail to see any good that would be done if the Motion were carried. The Nonconformists would not advance one step towards that social equality—of the want of which you complain, but which laws and statesmen are powerless to give you. The Episcopal Church of Scotland, which has no connection with the State, has all these social advantages, and that sort of respectability and concert with the nobility which so many Nonconformists seem to envy. If a Nonconformist by his ability and good conduct can win a position anywhere he will secure as much respect as any Vicar of the Church of England. We do not want to take away your Church; we do not want to take away your property and apply it to the purposes of our own Church. You say that you want this Disestablishment in order to satisfy the national sentiments of the Welsh race. This is the sort of fictitious idea, the sort of fantastic idea, that seems to have been encouraged in recent years. We have all heard and know of the different influences which operate upon the history of races. We find in Mr. Buckle's History of Civilization, the differences which time and habit produce in the temper and character of a race. What I call a real difference of race is such a difference as that which exists between people like the Chinese or the Negro and the people of Italy and Sweden; but I think that the difference of race which is spoken of as to Welshmen is absurdly fictitious. I can find in London no difference whatever, either in sentiments or in talents, between the Englishman and the Welshmen, and "Mr. Smith" and "Mr. Brown" are equal in all respects, and in all respects equally treated. The Welshman in London speaks English with equal purity to the Englishman; he speaks it with a purity that we in London might even imitate. We do not sit here as representatives of nationalities. I would remind hon. Members who talk about the opinion of Welsh Members; we sit here by constituencies, and I refuse to recognise any such body as the Welsh nation, or Welsh Members at all. I know what you mean by such terms as "the Member for Glamorganshire" or "the Member for Lancashire"; but I do not understand what you mean, except in a social sense, by "the Welsh Members," or "the Cornish Members."

An hon. MEMBER: What about Irish Members?

MR. ADDISON: There comes in a difference. The Welsh Members sit together with the view of giving rise to the belief that there is a sort of Welsh Party. When the Irish Members, who sit behind them, begin to speak, we feel there is a sort of change coming over the House—a sort of sense of relief. There is something about the gentlemen from Ireland that excites interest, and gives rise to cheers, though we do not agree with them; but I confess I am unable to establish or to recognise any difference between the Welsh Members even who sit opposite and the other Members of the House, and I must certainly demur to the notion that there is any difference whatever either in their ideas, or appearance, or manner, or language. I recognise no difference between the Welsh people and the English nation, to which they belong. It is, after all, a very serious and unfortunate movement, and the reason I dislike it is this: that it is an attempt to sow bitterness and bad feeling where it ought not to exist. Why should any minister or Nonconformist have any feeling whatever in regard to the Church of England except a feeling of friendliness, especially when it is not doing him any harm, and does not interfere with him in the work which he is doing in connection with his own Church? The Nonconformist would seem to have this sort of feeling in regard to the Church of England made evident when he gets upon a platform; then the bad spirit comes at once to be realised. I hope that hon. Members from Wales will be able to come to the conclusion that neither Disendowment nor Disestablishment would do any good to them nor to anybody else. I do hope they will not give way to these notions of a separate nationality, which, I am glad to say, no one in England adopts. The Welshman with us is able to assert his rights just as is a native of Lancashire, and he is treated by Englishmen as an Englishman is treated. I hope hon. Members will not dwell upon this separate national sentiment, which is more calculated than anything else to disturb that peace which ensures the prosperity of the nation.

*(8.40.) COLONEL W. CORNWALLIS-WEST (Denbigh, W.): I noticed that my hon. Friend the Member for Devonport, who has just spoken, remarked that the question of Disendowment had not been brought before the House on former occasions. There were murmurs of dissent on this side of the House, but I confess that the remarks that have been made have very real force. I am one of those members of the Church of England in Wales who long—for the last few years, at any rate—have supported the Disestablishment of the Welsh Church; and I, and those I have associated with, have supported the Disestablishment of the Church, in the hope that some means might be found to put a stop to the state of social warfare which has been going on in Wales for a considerable time. At the same time, we acknowledged there were immense difficulties in the way; but it was hoped that by moderation these difficulties might have been overcome. In 1885 I certainly, in common with a great many others, pledged myself to vote for the Disestablishment of the Church; but I entirely agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Devonport and others who have addressed the House this evening that, at that time, and in the past few years, especially in the Resolutions brought be-

this House, the question of the Disownment of the Church has been kept very much in the background. I am going to show, if the House will bear with me for a short while, why it is that I see with the hon. Members on this subject. Before I do so, I wish to say that in all the speeches which have been heard there has been simply a call for equal justice as between Nonconformists and Churchmen. The hon. Member for Mérthyr said last year, "that the Welsh Dissenting Body for us is that those who differ from us in externals should have no privilege." Well, I entirely agree with any protest of that sort. I confess I cannot follow the hon. Member for Glamorganshire with regard to the social distinction made between young clergymen of Lampeter and young Dissenting ministers from Welsh College; because I have associated and, I am happy to say, I have friends amongst those who are not clergymen of the Church of England, but ministers of other denominations; they come to my house, and I always glad to see them. I do not minimise any of these social distinctions; and I do not believe in making reflections upon gentlemen educated in one college and gentlemen educated in another. But my Friend the Member for Montgomeryshire, who was at one time and, as I know, still is the Leader, as is called, of the Welsh Party, last year—

We are not covetous of the goods of the Church. All that we ask for is honourable equality before the law for all denominations."

I, that equality before the law I have always striven for, and shall always do so; and if Disestablishment—is to say, the severance of the Church in Wales from the State—can bring about that equality before the law all I can say is that there are numerous gentlemen like myself who would be very ready to see it carried

But I am sorry to say that that is not in the least what is asked for. At one time the Members of the Welsh Assembly and my hon. Friend the Member for Montgomeryshire refused to associate their cause with the Liberal Society. But we are told distinctly now that the Disestablishment and the Disendowment of the Church in Wales is in sympathy with the Liberation Society in England, and is the first object of the attack on the total Disestablishment of the English Church. Well, I say, as a member of the Church of England, when I am told that fact I draw back and say—this is not what I intended at all; everybody must concede that in Wales the Dissenting community are in a large majority; but, at the same time, I will say that the minority have in all these Debates been treated as if they were merely a minority hardly worth consideration. It is a very remarkable fact—and this has not been stated this evening—that at the Election of 1885 the number of those who voted for Disestablishment was 98,593; and those who voted against it were 67,560, which is showing a ratio of 3 to 2. Well, that is a fact which I confess I consider ought to have some weight when you come to deal with the interest and the property of the minority. We know from the very highest source that the English Church in Wales or the Welsh Church in Wales is in a very flourishing condition. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian tells us that—

"Undoubtedly the Established Church in Wales is an advancing Church, an active Church, a living Church, and I hope very distinctly a rising Church from elevation to elevation."

This is also a remarkable fact. In the Welsh National Quarterly of last July I find this:—

"The Rev. T. Lewis Jones, a Methodist minister and Cambridge Prizeman on the staff of the North Wales University College, referring to this subject set down for the Church Congress, observed 'every honest Nonconformist will acknowledge that a great reformation has taken place within the Established Church in Wales during recent years, and that the Church, especially in the towns, is gaining ground. The best class of Nonconformist were quite prepared to agree with all that Churchmen say touching the revival that exists among them. I say again it would be dishonest on our part, as Nonconformists, to attempt to deny the progress that goes on within the Church these days. A new generation of clergy are able to enter into the life of the nation better than their predecessors. They sympathise with the aspirations of Wales in many directions, and strive their best to drink of the spirit of young Wales.'"

I allude to this opinion of a Nonconformist minister in the hope that, at any rate, it may lead people to suppose that the Church of England in Wales is deserving of some consideration. It is impossible to ignore the fact that the minority of Churchmen in Wales is not only a powerful one, a numerous one, an increasing one, but also at the present moment that the Church is thriving, and, whether disestablished or not, will in all probability in 25 years become much more powerful. There are abuses in the Church which we acknowledge; but on the other hand, unfortunately, when these matters are brought before this House for reform, instead of lending us a helping hand, we are obstructed and opposed, and we are told not to come here for reform. I want to point out to the House what is actually the idea brought before the population of Wales at the present moment with regard to the disendowment of the Church. In November, 1890, in the Carnarvon Herald, which is a very well-known newspaper and a newspaper which carries a great deal of weight, and I must say, generally speaking, extremely well conducted, this newspaper published a draft Bill. Who drafted the Bill I cannot say. Possibly it may have been drafted by the hon. Member for Carnarvon. I want to point out what were the provisions of this Bill, which was lauded to the skies afterwards, which was criticised by distinguished Nonconformists, and which was called extremely moderate. First of all there was to be a Commission—one Commissioner appointed by the President of the Local Government Board, and one by each of the County and Borough Councils in Wales, making a body of 14. The County Councils, I wish to point out, are very largely composed of Nonconformists, so that the whole of these Commissioners would be Nonconformists; with the exception, possibly, of the one who would be appointed by the President of the Local Government Board. This body was to be called the Commissioners of Church Temporalities in Wales. Each of these Commissioners was to be paid £50 a year. They should have full powers to call witnesses and enforce attendance, and to punish anybody who refused. All the property of the Church, and all in the hands of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, besides all in any way belonging or appertaining to any Bishop or Cathedral, was to be vested in that body. All Clerical and Cathedral Corporations in Wales were to be dissolved; all ecclesiastical laws were to cease; the Bishops and clergy were to be paid annuities for life; £25 was to be paid to curates not permanently appointed; compensation was to be made for private patronage. The Church was to be called upon to form itself into a body, to be called the Representative Body, and was to consist of Bishops, clergy, and laity. Well, I now come to the use that this Commission was to be put to. The principal clause is this—

"If any church or chapel be in actual use at the time of the passing of this Act, and if such church or chapel shall have been erected at least 50 years before the passing of the Act; and if the Representative Body shall within six months of the passing of this Act apply to the Commissioners for the use of such church or chapel, the Commissioners may let such church or chapel to the Representative Body on such terms as the Commissioners may fix, provided always that if the Representative Body shall omit to apply to the Commissioners for the use of any such church or chapel as above provided, or shall refuse or neglect to accept the terms fixed by the Commissioners, it shall be lawful for the Commissioners to let any such church or chapel for the purpose of Divine worship, and for no other purpose whatsoever, to any person or persons who shall accept the terms offered by the Commissioners. The Commissioners shall, on the application of the Representative Body, if made within twelve months of the passing of this Act, vest in that body all ecclesiastical residences with garden and curtilage thereto, also all glebe lands, subject to any existing life interests, upon payment to the Commissioners twenty times the amount of the annual value of such ecclesiastical residences and glebe lands."

Now, Sir, it is quite time to hear from these gentlemen some statement as to what they are going to ask Parliament to do. I certainly hope they will repudiate this Draft Bill, and that they will most distinctly point out how far the confiscation of the property of the Church is to go. I have seen announced in a newspaper that the Church is to be stripped of the last rag on her back. As regards the disposal of the money, first, it is proposed that the money should be dedicated to education; but education is already provided for in every possible way—higher, middle-class, and elementary. Then it is proposed that professorial chairs should be endowed; that a national Academy of Art and Science should be established, and seums erected; that the Eisteddfod should be assisted, and that one or more astronomical observatories should be erected in the Principality. These, we are told, will be the uses to which the money realised from the property of the Church will be put. I can only say that I hope my colleague the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Lancashire will repudiate the scheme he Carnarvon Herald, and which gave great shock to those people in Wales who were in favour of a moderate scheme of Disestablishment. So far as I am personally concerned, I regret to be obliged to say this much. I agree that there is a desire on the part of the Welsh people for what they call religious equality; and if that equality can be attained by Disestablishment, without predatory means and measures as those which are suggested, I, for one, will continue to support it. But unless we get an assurance that the Church property is not to be confiscated, and the churches which we have built and stored at enormous cost are held sacred, we will have nothing whatever to do with demands so unjust and iniquitous.

(9.5.) MR. G. T. KENYON (Denbigh): I hope that the modified statement of the opinions of my hon. Friend opposite have so permeated those with whom it is his good fortune to act that he shall have the benefit of his vote on this occasion. The hon. Gentleman opposite, the Member for Flintshire, says, and it is practically the preamble of his Resolution, that the Welsh Church has failed in the objects for which it was established, and it is for that reason he advocates Disestablishment. Well, Sir, we have heard that a great many Members are wedged, more especially Members on the other side—Members of the Principality—to the Disestablishment of the Welsh Church. But, Sir, I do think that on an occasion of this sort we were entitled to hear the united voice of Radical Wales on the subject. At any rate, we might have had the so-called Leader of the Welsh Radical Party present on this occasion. I know that he has written from Valescure to say that he trusts the Welsh people will be satisfied with the fact that he is taking care of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian. Nobody wishes better to the Member for Midlothian than I do. I wish him long life. Being a citizen and a denizen of the same county, I am a great admirer of the right hon. Gentleman; but I do not see why the Welsh Radical Leader should be his caretaker. I should have thought the Member for Midlothian was quite capable of taking care of himself. Now, it is said in this Resolution that the Welsh Church has failed in its mission, and ought, therefore, to be disestablished. The Resolution seems to me to convey two alternatives, one of which the hon. Member for Flintshire must accept. One alternative is that the hon. Gentleman who proposed this Motion is in a great hurry to pledge the House to this Resolution, presumably because he is afraid that if the House does not now sanction it that some other and more pressing question, dealing, perhaps, with affairs in Ireland may take precedence in the coming election. My hon. Friend the Member for Flintshire says we must have Disestablishment first and Home Rule afterwards, but if he appeals to some of his friends on the Irish Benches, they will no doubt say we must have Home Rule first and Disestablishment afterwards. That is one alternative. The other alternative is that my hon. Friend is greatly afraid of the progress the Church of England is making in the Principality; and he thinks that if he cannot get this Resolution passed in this House now, he may find it does not occupy the same favourable position hereafter as it does today. Which alternative does the hon. Member accept? Now, what I want to know is whether this is an election cry or a bona fide declaration that the Church is not at the present moment fulfilling its duties as I believe it is. There has been a great deal of talk about statistics. I am not very fond of statistics, and I do not believe that this question is going to be settled by statistics. You say the Church does not meet the wants of the people. I venture to say this: the Church of England in Wales cannot be measured by mere statistics; it must be measured by the comfort it has brought to numberless homes in trouble and necessities; in all those things, and on all those occasions in which we look up to religion to guide us. I cannot consent to defend the Church on the ground mentioned by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Joseph Chamberlain) in a recent letter. That was said to be a very good electioneering letter; from my own knowledge it was an extremely bad one. I would not go to a Nonconformist meeting and say to the people there that they ought to vote for me on the ground that Home Rule would be brought nearer; though the Member for West Birmingham said in the letter which was read at a Conservative meeting that by voting for a Conservative Government Disestablishment would be brought nearer than it would be brought by voting for a Liberal Member. That is not my view. How that letter ever came to be read out at a Conservative meeting is beyond my ken and my comprehension. While I cannot surrender the position of our Church, I grant to all Nonconformist Bodies, in the freest and fullest and the humblest spirit, that they, too, are working along one straight high road which I trust will lead us all to the triumph of religion against infidelity.

(9.38.) MR. LLOYD - GEORGE (Carnarvon Boroughs): I do not propose to characterise the genial speech of the hon. Member for the Denbigh Boroughs, who has just sat down, with that epithet which he seemed to apprehend so much from these Benches. We all appreciate his position, and the straightforwardness with which he has expressed his views, which are certainly not popular in his constituency. But it is with a totally different spirit that we must approach the speech of the hon. Member for West Denbighshire (Colonel Cornwallis-West.) He has told us that though he has voted time after time in favour of the Motion for Disestablishment in Wales, he all along was opposed to any measure for Disendowment. The House can draw its own inference with regard to that admission, when I say it comes contemporaneously with the announcement that the hon. Gentleman does not propose to go for re-election in that constituency. Of this I am quite positive, that the hon. Gentleman was certainly understood by every supporter in that constituency to say he was prepared to vote for Disendowment as well as Disestablishment, and if the hon. Gentleman does not understand that, he displays a woful amount of ignorance of the views of his chief supporters in that constituency. There is one thing that I have observed in the speeches of hon. and right hon. Members who have supported Establishment in Wales and that is: that though they challenge our statistics, and tell us the Church is making progress, not once have they given us a single figure upon which we could base an estimate of the progress of the Church. Our own figures have been challenged. The Solicitor General, in his exceedingly able and eloquent speech, told us that the Nonconformist denominations publish annual reports, showing the state of their membership, and it is remarkable that though the Nonconformists publish annual statements showing the number of their adherents for public inspection and correction, the Church has not yet thought proper to publish statistics in regard to her condition in Wales. But the Solicitor General challenged us with regard to the census taken by Mr. Gee, a very distinguished journalist and a Liberal leader in Wales. He undertook a census of the attendance at all places of worship in Wales, both Church and Nonconformist. We have been challenged by hon. Members opposite about that census, and I assume therefore, that it is not a census that they consider to be unfavourable to their position. I propose to produce the figures which were obtained by that census, and this is the result. Throughout the whole of North Wales, the aggregate attendance at all the services of the Church of England amounted to ring like one-fifth of the aggregate attendance at all places of worship does. In South Wales, the attendance at Church services amounted to one-sixth of what it was at all of worship. The aggregate attendance at Church Sunday schools throughout Wales amounted to one-sixth of all Sunday schools throughout the Principality, and the proportion was one-eighth. I should like to lay it out to the House the method by which the Church went about getting up an attendance for thisicular Sunday. Mr. Gee announced he proposed on a certain Sunday that the attendance at the whole churches and chapels throughout the Principality. The Church of England used every subterfuge and—I am sorry to use the phrase, it is the fact—in order to fill its pews. This sort of thing was done. who attended the Welsh service and who attended the English service, and who attended the English came to the Welsh services. Another what was done was this. Where happened to be three or four pews in any particular town, those attended the service in one church been first counted, ran off to the other church, and so on. (Laughter from the Ministerial Benches.) If I am asked, I can give the very town in that occurred, and I shall do so. congregation of a certain church in a Cathedral city, having first been counted in the church ran to the Cathedral and were counted over. These are really dodges. It this was really done in order to fill the attendance and to create a sort of artificial attendance at the pews on that Sunday. Notwithstanding that fact, the Church simply asserted that she possessed at the very one-tenth of the whole population of the Principality. A reference has been made to the second census by Owen Owen, but though the author General has been good enough to send me the first letter in the Times, not alluded to the second, and so this difference. The first letter is a census of all the towns as well as of the rural districts. That is an important distinction. In the districts where the Church is prosperous

—but that is simply an argument in favour of the voluntary system—the churches are built by voluntary contributions, and are maintained by the contributions of their members and not by tithes. There could not possibly be a stronger argument in favour of our contention. But the point is this. What is the attendance in these rural districts where the Church is most in evidence, where the Church has to rely mainly on the endowments that belong to the nation? The second census throws a considerable light upon that question. A census was taken of the attendance in something like 78 parishes, rural districts in North Wales, and it was discovered that the attendance at any one service throughout the whole of these parishes came to something like 5 to 5½ per cent. of the whole population. I noticed that some of these results were challenged after they were published, and I took the trouble, in these cases, to discover what was the effect of those corrections. In most instances the clergymen who challenged the census contented themselves with saying it was incorrect, but in some of the instances in which the clergymen gave their own figures, we could verify the results, with the outcome that even deducting the figures given by the clergymen themselves, the attendance in the particular towns where the figures were given came to 15 per cent. of the population, and in the rural districts to 6 per cent. of the population. I can give to the House one or two examples of the way in which the Church of England operates in the rural districts of Wales. Not very long ago some Hussars were sent down to collect tithe in a small mountain parish in Flintshire called Llanelly. On the Sunday morning after the visit a census was taken of the attendance at the church in that parish, and though there were 900 people in the parish, the attendance at that church was only seven, yet the people of Llanelly were to be dragooned in order to maintain the religion of something under 1 per cent. of the population of that parish. I could show an instance of a parish better off, where, however, there was a still smaller minority of the population belonging to the Church. Lately the Bishop of St. Asaph, on a Sunday, visited one of the parishes in his diocese. The service was timed in such a way as to allow the members of the Nonconformist chapels to attend if they desired. A good many availed themselves of the opportunity, but the whole congregation, the majority of which was constituted of the members of the contiguous Nonconformist chapels, only amounted to 32; and, in the afternoon, so disastrous was the Bishop's oratory on the congregation, that only 12 attended, and there was no service in the evening. Another instance. Some time during last winter, I think in the Cathedral Church of St. Asaph itself, there was a service, there was a choir, there were two or three other officials—I do not know what they are called—and there was a sermon by the Dean, but the whole congregation only numbered three, and those three had the satisfaction of going home knowing that £30 had been spent for each of them in the service of religion. The condition of things is better in the towns, but that is, after all, simply a proof that the Establishment as such is ruinous to the prospects of the Church in Wales, and that where the Church simply depends on voluntary effort and contributions, there the Church succeeds. We have been told by hon. Members on the other side of the House that the Church is making considerable progress. But it has not been suggested that she is likely to make sufficient progress to convert her minority into a majority.

An hon. MEMBER: Yes.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I believe an hon. Member says "Yes." Here we have a Nonconformist population. Is it likely that a Nonconformist country is going to abandon her creed for the sake of another? Is there a case on record of a country abandoning its creed until that creed became utterly decayed and worthless? Are there any signs of the decay of Dissent? On the contrary never did Nonconformity show such signs of prosperity in Wales. During the last 20 years the adherents of Nonconformist denominations have increased by something like 50 per cent.; contributions have increased by 75 per cent.; and yet we are told that Wales is on the point of abandoning Nonconformity for the sake of the Church of England. There is another point I wish to call attention to, and it is this. Not only is Nonconformity increasing in numbers, but it is increasing in influence. At the present moment all the most powerful preachers of Wales are ministers of the Nonconformist churches, and really, with the exception of one notable instance, the Church does not possess a single great preacher in the Principality. Nonconformity is interwoven with every fibre of the national existence, and it cannot be eradicated without hopelessly disfiguring the national character. Then what are the means used by the Church in Wales in order to bring about this proselytism? The poor have been plied with alms and the greedy with bribes; the land hunger has been utilised by the preference shown for churchmen as tenants of farms; and society has been open to anybody who could produce a certificate of apostacy; but that sort of thing can never succeed in the country. Eliminate all those whose poverty exceeds their fidelity to the traditions of the Established Church, all those in whom the love of greed exceeds their attachment to their Creed, and still the nation remains; and I say it is absolutely impossible, it is contrary to all precedent and probability that the Church movement can ever succeed in Wales. What are the facts with regard to this Church? Here is a Church that came into Wales with mailed warriors, whose missionaries were the warriors; and it was imposed upon us by the force of arms, and it is at the present moment buttressed up by police truncheons. In the rural districts the Church cannot command more than 5 per cent. of the population, and in the towns it cannot command more than 15 per cent. of the population; and yet this is called the National Church of Wales. It is high time, in the interests of the Church itself, that it should be rescued from such a false position. An hon. Member on the other side of the House told us that this is an agitation which has cropped up within the last three years, and that it would soon pass by. On the contrary, in Wales it is an old struggle. Cen-ries ago Welshmen claimed religious independence and freedom. Their petition was treated as treason, and they were executed as rebels. This is a great fact in Welsh history, and when I am told this is simply an agitation of to-day, I answer by saying "No; it is a agitation which has been going on for generation after generation in Wales." Several attempts have been made to force us into acceptance of this Church. The last resort was the passing of the tithes Act; but if Welshmen are not to be terrified by the sword of excommunication, are they going to be subdued by County Court summonses? appeal to Englishmen for the sake of the dignity of their Church, for the sake of the honour of their country, to concede to us this small measure of right which we have so long demanded of Wales.

(9.50.) MR. BYRON REED (Bradford, E.): I think the House will give the hon. Member who has just sat down credit for the boldness he has manifested this evening in reviewing the long since defunct religious census of Mr. Gee. A word or two of explanation as to who and what is Mr. Gee may perhaps be of interest to the House. Mr. Gee is a very estimable gentleman, who combines in his own person multifarious occupations amongst them, I believe, that of teacher, County Councillor, newspaper proprietor, and editor, and generally the chief priest of the Liberation Society in North Wales. Some years ago, Mr. Gee, being not only an enthusiastic Liberationist, but also a very ardent practical journalist, undertook to gather for publication in the columns of his paper, an unofficial amateur census of the attendances at certain churches and chapels on a certain day; and he undertook by the results of that enumeration to prove the Church to be in a pitiable minority in Wales, and Nonconformity in a superior position. He chose his own lay and his own enumerators; and the mode of enumeration adopted was entirely his own; and whereas very full and sufficient notice was given to those religious bodies who are supposed to be friendly to Mr. Gee's views, in a great many cases no notice whatever was given to the clergy or church-going people. By such a census as that no reasonable body of people would expect to be bound. Yet it is only in the most casual and fragmentary fashion that we have been able to secure Mr. Gee's returns, which, for the most part, remain in the pigeon-holes of Mr. Gee's office at Denbigh. We church people, while very properly declining to be bound by an unofficial amateur census of this kind, are quite prepared to submit the immediate matter before us to the arbitrament of a fair and impartial census taken, not by partisans for political purposes, but by cool, impartial officials whose business it is to arrive at conclusions without reference to this party or that. But it is notorious that any proposals of that kind are always strenuously opposed by hon. Gentlemen opposite. The year before last, when the Census Bill was passing through Committee of this House, an hon. Member made an attempt to secure the insertion of a clause which would provide for a religious census in England and Wales. A number of Gentlemen on this side went into the Lobby with the hon. Member, but hon. Members opposite repudiated any such proposal and thus furnished one more illustration of the unwillingness of their Party to submit these matters to the arbitrament of an official census. The hon. Member for Carnarvon asked whether it was likely that the Nonconformists of Wales would abandon their own Creed and come over to what, I suppose, he would describe as an "alien Church?" My answer to that is, in the first place, whether the hon. Member and his friends like it or not, admit it they must, that of late years there has been a steadily increasing leakage from Nonconformity to the National Church. (Opposition cries of "No, no.") Hon. Members may murmur, but those murmurs do not alter the steady flow towards the Church in Wales. That flow is attested by the Confirmation returns, and by the various other records and statistics which the Bishops and other officials in Wales have at hand; and I confess I could wish for nothing better than that this steady flow, which has been very much larger in Wales than in England in proportion to the population, should be continued at the same ratio for another generation, by which time we would be perfectly secure, so far as the Church in Wales is concerned; by which time the representation of Wales would be changed in this House; and the predominance of the Church would be unquestioned. Then it is asked if the Nonconformists in Wales are likely to abandon their own Creed? But what is the Creed of Welsh Nonconformity? The Creed of the Church of England, I know. The Creed of any Nonconformist body is an unknown quantity, except in so far as Nonconformist bodies have adopted the Creed of the Church of England, and this has been done by the principal Nonconformist body in Wales—the Calvinistic Methodists. If hon. Gentlemen will examine the poll deed of the Calvinistic Methodists, dated 10th August 1826, they will find it is provided that this body was formed by the clergy and laity of the Church; that it is bound to teach and hold all the articles of the Church of England in the Calvinistic sense, and the Apostles' Creed. I now pass on to complain of the constant persistent, unswerving, and unscrupulous misrepresentation to which the Church in Wales is subjected by hon. Members opposite, and by their friends. The hon. Member for Carnarvon made a charge in connection with the recent Church Congress at Rhyl. He made a deliberate charge against the Church Congress Committee that they had made a profit by the sale of intoxicating liquor in the Congress grounds. That charge was entirely unfounded and was made to discredit the Church in Wales. Even when the report was contradicted the hon. Member stuck to his guns and repeated the charge, knowing that if a lie is given 48 hours' start it is a matter of impossibility to overtake it. It was not until the hon. Member was shown that no license was held by the Congress Committee, and that neither directly nor indirectly were the Congress Authorities responsible for the sale of liquors, that he expressed his regret that he had made a mistake.

Mr. Byron Reed

Church Congress Committee was held to be an agent.

MR. BYRON REED: Does that imply that the hon. Member still makes the charge?

MR. LLOYD GEORGE: Hear, hear.

MR. BYRON REED: I can only meet the charge with a most uncompromising denial. The hon. Member for Merioneth, speaking at Bangor, inaccurately stated the amount received by the clergy from tithes in Wales. The hon. Member has stated the total rent charge was £304,000, but it was only £231,500. Taking the depreciation of the value of tithe property, the whole amount received was only £118,000 a year.

MR. J. ELLIS: My figures were taken from the Tithe Commutation Returns of 1888, and I should like to know where the hon. Member's figures are from?

MR. BYRON REED: I can assure the hon. Gentleman that the figures I have quoted are correct as to the value of tithes in Wales.

MR. ARTHUR WILLIAMS: Where are the figures from?

MR. BYRON REED: The sources of information from which I have taken my figures are open to hon. Gentlemen opposite. There is great misrepresentation on this matter, and the grossest and most atrocious mis-statements are made by the Welsh vernacular Press. The head and front of this agitation against the Church in Wales is to be found in the Welsh vernacular Press, which is edited, written, and officered by some Nonconformist preachers of the baser sort. I hold in my hand a translation of some verses which appeared in a Welsh newspaper only last week, and they will show the misrepresentation to which the Church in Wales is subjected by Welsh vernacular journalists.

DR. TANNER: Read the vernacular.

MR. BYRON REED: I am sorry that I cannot oblige the hon. Member. Here lies one of our greatest difficulties in running down these journalistic atrocities, because I am informed by those who have a knowledge of the Welsh language that it is possible or words in Welsh to convey meanings are more extravagant, extreme, and bitter, than those contained in the English language. To show the extreme bitterness of the Welsh vernacular Press towards the Church in Wales, I may state that the following verse is said to be recited in Yorkshire National Schools :—

"I'm not a little Protestant,
As some would have me say ;
I'm not a little Romanist,
So call me what you may.
First to confession I must go,
To tell out all my shame,
My list of sins all one by one,
In penitence must name."

MR. S. EVANS: Would the hon. Member kindly inform the House who the talented translator may be ?

MR. BYRON REED: I am not in a position to do that, but I shall be happy if the hon. Member doubts the translation to give him a copy of the original. I can only say that I hold in my hand letters from the Archbishop of York, the Bishop of Ripon, and the Bishop of Wakefield, and other representatives of the Episcopal Bench in Yorkshire, together with the Diocesan Inspector, entirely repudiating in the most positive terms that any such verse was ever in use in any of the National Schools of Yorkshire. The whole thing is a mere fabrication, and manufactured for political purposes by the vernacular press of Wales. A population which is led by such leaders and instructed by such teachers is one which needs the pity of every intelligent and right-minded person. In another paper there is the story of how, in a rural parish in Wales, there was a school controlled by the rector and the squire, nine out of every ten of the children attending which were Nonconformists. On one occasion the rector told all the children that all those above a certain age who would learn a certain rhyme would be taken for an outing on a certain date. On that date they were taken out, met a lot more children, and then were taken into a church and Confirmed. The writer, of course, takes the most perfect pains to conceal the identity of this impossible rector, and I have no hesitation in calling it a fabrication from beginning to end; and it is by such fabrications and downright lying that the cause of Disestablishment is supported. At a certain meeting at the Memorial Hall, London, called the "smock frock farce," where managers, lawyers, schoolmasters, and preachers, masqueraded as agricultural labourers, a certain Mr. Bowen Rowlands, not the hon. Member of this House, said that in a certain case there were five churches close together, and a man went down to take a census of the communicants. There were a number at the first church, and when the man had left they were marched to the next, and so on, so that each of them were, for the purpose of the census, magnified into five communicants. Mr. Rowlands has been asked, again and again, for chapter and verse, but has taken care to maintain an impassive silence, which, under the circumstances, is the best possible thing for the credibility of that gentleman. I need not give more illustrations to show that this agitation against the Church in Wales is a manufactured agitation, born largely of political spite and class animosity, and that the agitation is carried on by the most unworthy weapons of slander, misrepresentation, and downright falsehoods, and I would strongly urge the House not to accept the stories which appear in the newspapers as indicative of the state of things in Wales, for in 95 cases out of 100 they are fabrications, and in the other five they are distortions of actual facts. What good do hon. Gentlemen opposite propose to do the Principality by prolonging the agitation? During this Debate of five hours I have failed to observe the least attempt on the part of hon. Gentlemen opposite to give any definition of what they mean by Disestablishment and Disendowment. What kind of Disestablishment do you mean? Such as you had in Ireland? The hon. Member for Carnarvon makes a negative sign at that; he is consistent. At the great meeting at Pontypridd, at which the great Liberal Federation was inaugurated, he said, speaking of the Irish Disestablishment :—

"He would prefer waiting for ten years rather than have such a Bill for Wales. The more agitation they kept up in Wales the better would be the terms of the Disestablishment Bill Parliament would give them."

Many people are deluded into the belief that Disestablishment in England and Wales would mean a repetition of that in Ireland, but those who hold that view will scarcely be prepared for the admission of hon. Gentlemen opposite, that it is a much more drastic measure than they mean. In Ireland the vested interests of the clergy and dignitaries of the Church were respected, and they were permitted to retain possession of their cathedrals and parish churches. Do you propose to go further than that in Wales? Do you propose to disendow or secularise the cathedrals and parish churches? Hon. Gentlemen opposite are very chary about announcing their exact intentions on that point. We know very well that the Radical programme before the General Election of 1885 adopted the scheme of the Liberation Society, which stated that all cathedrals and ancient parish churches in England and Wales should be handed over to Local Boards for absolutely secular purposes or sale. Will you go to the constituencies and tell them that you propose to give to the clergy far harder terms of settlement than in Ireland; that you propose to secularise every stone and timber in their cathedrals and churches? Will right hon. Gentlemen on the Front Bench opposite thank you for it, and adopt it? Are they, on the eve of a General Election, prepared to repeat the experience of 1885? If you are honest, you will lay frankly before the House what you mean by Disestablishment and Disendowment, and no longer conceal your opinion by soft phrases, and wrap up your desires in smooth generalities. Let us know what proposals we have to fight, then we will fight you—not only on the floor of this House, but in the constituencies; and we wish for no better cry with which to go to the country. I think this must not be separated from the concurrent case of the Church in England. There are not two Churches, but one Church, and that which aims a blow at one aims disaster and danger at the other. As the Church is one in Wales and England, so shall its cause be one in this House, or out of it, and for that reason we on this side, with many allies, I hope, on the other side, go into the Division Lobby to vote against the proposal of the hon. Member for Flintshire.

(10.35.) MR. G. O. MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.): I will not follow the hon. Member who has just spoken into the newspaper extracts which he has read to the House, for I cannot possibly believe, admitting that the extracts are strictly accurate, that the claims of a nation to justice ought to be refused because two or three journalists have been guilty of want of taste. I was a little startled at the beginning of the Debate by the uncompromising tone of hostility which the Solicitor General took up, for I could not help thinking of a letter written by the right hon. Member for West Birmingham to my constituents, advising them, if they wanted Disestablishment not to vote for me, but to vote for the Party opposite. I thought some sort of concordat had been arranged between the right hon. Gentleman and the Government to look at this question on somewhat broader lines. Now we have had several remarkable occurrences during this Debate, and perhaps the most remarkable has been the fact that, for the first time for 22 years, a Welsh Conservative Member—there are not many of them—raised his voice in defence of the Church in Wales.

MR. KENYON (Denbigh): I spoke in defence of it in 1885.

MR. G. O. MORGAN: But the most remarkable speech in the Debate was that of the hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne, who denied that there was such a thing as a Welsh nationality. I should have thought the Welsh nationality was by far the most pronounced of the four nationalities into which this kingdom is popularly divided, as we are not only divided geographically, but also by the barrier of language. It is too late now to say there is no such thing as a Welsh nationality. I think we have made good our right to be considered a separate nationality; we have again and again passed Bills dealing with Wales as distinct from England, Scotland, and Ireland. Under these circumstances, it seems to me that the question is narrowed to this: Is the Church of England in Wales the national Church of Wales? A deal of interesting historical light has been thrown on this question. The hon. Member for Carnarvon said it was imposed by conquest on Wales; but on the other side it is said that the Church of St. David is older than that of St. Augustine, and that the Church of England is a descendant of the Church of Wales. But the question is not what the Church was 600 or 800 years ago; but what it is in 1892. Looking simply at the present time, I say without fear of contradiction that it is in more than one sense an alien Church. It ministers chiefly to settlers in the country. It is alien to the tone, temperament and genius of the Welsh people, who are democratic in their religion as in their politics. The despotism of the parson, mild and benevolent as it may be, is intolerable to him. The Welsh are too essentially an emotional people, and the Church of England with its "Popish liturgy and Arminian clergy," to quote the famous words of Lord Chatham, does not appeal to them. No Church is entitled to be called national, in other words, entitled to the support of the State, unless it can fulfil two conditions. Unless it numbers a clear majority of the people amongst its members, and unless it is so bound up with the religious life of the nation that you cannot touch the one without inflicting a serious blow on the other. I will assume that it fulfils these two conditions in England; but will any hon. Gentleman dare to get up and tell me that it fulfils these two conditions in Wales? It is not contended by anybody that it holds the majority of the people in Wales; not even by its staunchest advocate. Lord Selborne himself only put the Church at half the number of the Nonconformists, and the late Dean of Bangor, one of the most devoted of Churchmen, estimated the number of Churchmen among the Welsh-speaking population at one-sixth. The Solicitor General said that the Nonconformists were 49 per cent. of the population; does he mean that the remaining 51 per cent. are Churchmen? The numbers taken by the hon. Gentleman only included those actually on the roll of adherents; but by far the larger number of Welshmen are Nonconformists, although not formally enrolled. I do not place much confidence in censuses of the kind which have been proposed, for I am inclined to agree with the old saying that "there is nothing so fallacious as figures, except facts." The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down asks why we do not agree to a religious census? Because I cannot conceive a more childish way of ascertaining the religion of a nation than that. The census which has been proposed by the friends of the Church would, in my opinion, have been valueless and unreliable and in the highest degree misleading; but there is another kind of census upon which reliance can be placed, and that is the Ballot Box. Just observe how remarkable is the progress that this question has made since Mr. Watkin Williams brought it under notice 22 years ago. Then it was only supported by 7 members from Wales, including the Mover and Seconder: 13 voted against it, and the others stopped away. But, ever since, the Welsh supporters of this Motion have gone on steadily increasing in number, and now 27 Welsh Members out of 30 are pledged to Disestablishment, and only 3 oppose it. Not only that, but the six bye-elections have shown how this question has developed, and how it has met with the support of the people. Taking the County Councils, at the last election in every county but one the Nonconformists literally swept the boards. Again, out of 17 Welsh papers printed in the vernacular, 15 are devoted to Disestablishment; only 2 belong to the Church defence party, and of these two one, I believe, is on its last legs. Three or four years ago the Bishop of St. Asaph charged a Calvinistic Methodist Deacon with having sanctioned by his presence a gross and foul outrage upon the Church of England—no less than a parody of the rites of the Holy Sacrament. I challenged the Bishop to name the man whom he alluded to, and when his lordship did not do so, I repeated that challenge in this House. The Bishop then wrote to the Times a letter in which he said he had in his possession "seven sworn affidavits" which proved the truth of his assertions. He did not say by whom those affidavits were made, nor did he say where they came from, or where the occurrence took place; he did not name the Magistrate before whom they were sworn, nor did he show how it came to pass that any affidavits chanced to be sworn in a matter in which there was no litigation pending. But he said he had sent them to Lord Selborne who had written him a letter, in which he said, if the affidavits were true, the Bishop was quite justified in making the charge. Now, everybody knows the value of such affidavits made under such circumstances; every man who has spent six weeks in a lawyer's office knows that such affidavits as these are not worth the paper upon which they are written. It has been pointed out that the Church has been making progress exactly in proportion as she leans least upon State aid. At Cardiff, where the whole of the tithes do not amount to much more than £200 a year, the Church is making progress, but everywhere that she leans most upon State aid, the Churches are found to be empty. This matter was put very well by the late Dean of Bangor, when he said that—

"The Church has made material progress of late. Churches, schools, and parsonages have been built, but how many of the churches are empty!"

When we say that the Church is in a minority in Wales, we are only stating half our case, because the Church comprises not only the minority, but by far the richest part of the community and with them also the poorest. It is not the Church of the poor; it is the Church of the pauper, consisting of those who are most able to give, and those who are most anxious to get, and that accounts for some of those conversions of which we have heard. You must remember that the Church offers bishoprics, palaces, deaneries, and many other prizes, whilst the Nonconformist offers nothing but a clear conscience and the privilege of paying for it. In this regard I am reminded of what an author, dear to every Unionist heart, says. Mr. Lecky says—

Mr. G. O. Morgan

With regard to the second point—the bearing of the Church on the religious and moral life of the people—the Home Secretary knows that Wales has not at the present moment, in proportion to its population, half as many criminals as England, and that scarcely a Judge of assize goes there but comments again and again upon the extraordinary absence of crime. There are, it is well recognised, certain crimes of a grave nature which are altogether unknown in Wales. Since I have acted as a Magistrate, I may say that I have never issued a warrant or a summons against a man for assaulting a woman. Now, I say that this marked absence of crime is mainly due to the influence of the Nonconformists. This was over and over again borne out by Lord Aberdare by the testimony of the Welsh clergy themselves. In my own experience, when acting as Chairman of a large Industrial Society, I was told by the manager of that Association that he always preferred, if he could, to employ Nonconformists, because they were more sober, more steady, and more trustworthy. I have always spoken in the highest terms of the Welsh clergy. I believe them to be exceedingly zealous and exceedingly energetic; but I do say this: that they are more occupied in fighting Dissent than in preaching Christianity, and that explains why so many Churchmen believe that the result of Disestablishment would be eminently beneficial to the Church of Wales. If that be so, what are you afraid of in this Motion before this House? You have on your side all the wealth and social influence of the country. I remember seeing in the Times the other day a letter signed by 20 of the richest noblemen and gentlemen in England, in which they appealed to their English brethren not to leave the poor Welsh Church to starve by robbing it of the endowments. If these 20 noblemen and gentlemen had put their hands into their own pockets and given it one-twentieth part of their incomes, they would have easily set the Church of Wales upon its legs again for the next 10 years to come. Look at what is aking place in the Colonies, in Canada, n Australia, and in Ireland. In all those countries the Church of Eng- and has learned to stand alone. Even in Wales, of which you are now fearing, the power and influence of the Church are in exactly inverse proportion to the assistance which she derives from the State, and to say that the richest community of Christian men in the whole world would not be able to hold its own amongst the most God-fearing people in the Kingdom unless it comes carrying a bribe in one hand and a sword of State in the other is a slur upon the Church, an insult to my countrymen, and an unworthy asper- sion upon an all-wise and all-powerful Providence.

(10.50.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): Anybody who heard the concluding part of the right hon. Gentleman's speech would have supposed that the Established Church in Wales depended entirely for its funds upon the ancient endowments with which the pious in past generations had endowed it. But the right hon. Gentleman might be aware, had he consulted statistics open to every man upon this subject, that during last year the Church in Wales received from voluntary contributions twice as much as it received from endowments secured to it by law; and if that is not a conclusive proof that the members of the Church in Wales have the keenest sense of the duties imposed upon them, and are determined to carry out to the best of their ability the great trust which is imposed upon them, I fail to understand by what reasoning the right hon. Gentleman has arrived at the conclusion that the deprivation of the endowments which already exist could increase the zeal or the resources which the Church has at its disposal. Now the House, or those Members who have listened as I have to the greater part of this Debate, will probably share with me in the gratification I feel in finding that a good many of the old fallacies with which this discussion used to be encumbered have either disappeared altogether from the discussion, or have at all events shown themselves in a very much less virulent form. We used to be told that the Welsh Church was an alien Church. I have heard only one gentleman sufficiently courageous to maintain that position this evening. This is an historical fallacy, one of the many which collected round this subject, which I certainly had supposed had been finally disposed of, had been killed off by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian last year. The right hon. Gentleman said nothing but what is familiar to students of British Ecclesiastical History, but he did say a good many things which were not familiar even to hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway; and I am glad to observe by the majority of the speeches, and by the general tenour of the Debate, that very few indeed are the defenders still left in this House of the historical absurdity of supposing that the Church in Wales was imposed upon the Welsh people by an armed and an alien population. Another fallacy which I observe looms much less largely than it used to do in our eyes is the statistical fallacy. Many gentlemen have touched upon statistics, but I notice that they have touched upon them lightly. It appears to be ground which they thought it necessary to survey, but which they surveyed as rapidly as they could, and from which they discreetly fled at the earliest opportunity. The Member for Flintshire, who opened in a very exhaustive speech the discussion this evening told us that he would not enter upon the subject of Welsh statistics at all. He confined his attention to the statistics of the Welsh Church in Liverpool and in America; and from the facts which he collected, or thought he had collected, from Liverpool and from America—neither of which is as yet claimed as part of the Principality—he deduced the statistical conclusion that the Welsh Church ought to be disestablished. The hon. and learned Gentleman took what he called a broad view of statistics and the broad view he took consisted of making very broad assertions and bringing forward no proof whatever in support of them. My hon. and learned Friend near me went in detail into the figures that had been supplied by the Nonconformists to the Church of England, and by Nonconformists to their own body; and both from the figures which they had collected in respect of the Established Church in Wales and in respect of the figures—which I presume we may regard as more or less authentic—with regard to the Nonconformist body in Wales, my hon. and learned Friend deduced the conclusion that it was impossible that the majority of the Welsh population—including men, women and children—could be supposed to belong to any of the larger bodies of the Nonconformist body in that country. Has any answer been made to that? No answer except the broad conclusion of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Aberdeen, in which he carefully abstained from quoting a single figure or dealing with a single specific fact brought forward by my hon. and learned Friend near me. But in truth the Nonconformist Party in this House are out of court when we are considering the question of statistics, for they have refused—flatly refused—the only machinery in this matter by which authentic statistics could possibly be obtained. They were offered last year, as they have been offered decennially before, to have a religious census taken in Wales as a religious census is taken in Ireland. Nobody doubts that the census in Ireland gives, on the whole, a substantially accurate view of the relative strength of the various denominations in that country. Why is the same machinery, applied to the same purpose, to be set aside by the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down as worthless when applied to Wales? The fact, which lies broad and patent upon the surface of this controversy, is that the Gentlemen who refuse the census are afraid of statistics; and though in this Resolution they practically base their contention upon the relative strength, which they are good enough to assume, of the adherents of the Established Church and the Nonconformists, they have always, as a matter of fact, refused what we have always offered to them;

an authentic, a reliable, and a perfectly conclusive method of arriving at a conclusion on that point. For my part, I should be ready enough to take the case of the Established Church in Wales upon arithmetical proportion, although I hold that the argument from arithmetical proportion is wholly absurd and unreliable. This House were to take the view, which are invited to take, that because the Established Church in Wales is the Church of the minority, that, the it should be disestablished, should not be driven to the further conclusion that in every diocese, perhaps in every parish of England, the same arithmetical test should be applied, and that province, diocese, or parish the members of the Established Church happened to be in a majority and only, should the Church be allowed to retain its endowments, and be the Established Church of the country. I do not believe that any logic consistent adherent of Disestablishment will accept that view. I do not think that those who really, upon grounds of historical, and rational, desire for severance between Church and State and the Disendowment of the Established Church—I do not think that these Gentlemen would at any moment accept the logic which before them by Members from Wales rest their case, or almost rest them upon statistics which they have verified, and which according to view prove a majority on the part of the Nonconformist bodies taken over the Established Church alone. But certainly it appears that when we are dealing with a nation, almost the oldest in the country, older far I may fairly say than the House, older certainly than all the institutions on which we most ourselves—when dealing with a nation which it is not to be supposed at any moment is obsolete or dead, any way lifeless or extinct, the proof lies with those who would destroy, and not with those who would sustain it. Now, what is the proof these Gentlemen can bring forward, who have brought forward, who would destroy—who desire to disestablish to disendow the Church in Wales? The hon. Member for Carnarvon rested his case almost entirely upon the fact that the Welsh Church was not the National Church, and he appeared to think that Nonconformity in Wales was national in the sense in which the Church of Wales is not national. The hon. Gentleman showed a total and extraordinary ignorance of the history of this case. Nonconformity in Wales is the growth of a century or two. The Church in Wales has existed for centuries. Not only was it not imposed upon the Welsh people by a large and alien population, but it is a Church which has grown with the growth of the Welsh people, which is identified with their history in every stage, and to which I believe they largely owe the maintenance of their language as the vernacular. (Cries of "Oh, oh.") I believe that, and I believe it on the authority of gentlemen quite as anxious to destroy the Welsh Church as the hon. Gentlemen opposite—Gentlemen who have devoted more time to the study of the Welsh language than the hon. Gentlemen opposite have been able to do, and who believe that the Established Church in Wales is a Church of Welsh growth, identified with it through every stage of Welsh history, and closely bound up with the maintenance and the survival of the Welsh language. Nonconformity—I do not deny the value of the work which has been done by the great Nonconformist leaders in Wales; but I say that Nonconformity is a growth as of yesterday, and that the Welsh Church is not a growth of yesterday. And I say further that the great men who led the Nonconformist party in Wales, the men who have done so much for the revival of religion in Wales, were themselves devoted adherents to the Established Church to their dying day. Therefore I am justified, I think, on grounds of the history both of the Church and of Nonconformity, in saying that whatever other reasons may be given for the Disestablishment of the Welsh Church, at all events you cannot say that it is to be Disestablished because it is an anti-national Church. Then I ask myself whether those who desire Disestablishment desire it because they think that it is a decaying branch of the Christian Church, corrupt and effete, no longer capable of efficient service to the cause of true religion. I gather from the speech of every one who spoke in favour of the Motion to-night, that whatever else may be said of the Welsh Church, that, at all events cannot be said. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Aberdeen admitted the rapid growth which had been made by the Welsh Church during the last two generations at least; but he said:—

" You will always find that an institution which has to be revolutionised is, before being revolutionised, undergoing a great process of reform, and the fact that the Welsh Church is improving, the fact that it is showing renewed activity and vigour in every branch, is only an indication that it belongs to that large number of institutions which require revolutionary reform, and the fact that it shows this improvement is only another proof of the fact."

And he quoted the French Revolution, and he might have quoted—and I think he might have quoted accurately—a very large number of historical facts, of which he if any Member in this House, is a complete and acknowledged master. The hon. and learned Gentleman drew the inference from this fact, the conclusion that the Welsh Church ought to be at once destroyed and disestablished. I draw a very different conclusion. I admit with him that history shows many examples of institutions which were in a fair way of reforming themselves, which showed every sign of growth and of progress, and whose existence was brought to an untimely end by the hands of so-called reformers. But the deductions I make from these historical facts is that the gentlemen who dub themselves reformers, and are sometimes so described by subsequent historians, have really much less to do with the progress and improvement of human affairs than either they or the historians are apt to suppose. I cannot help thinking that if this process of spontaneous improvement and growth from within were sometimes allowed to continue a little longer by reformers of the complexion of the hon. and learned Gentleman, the world would not progress slower, but would progress more rapidly, and certainly much more smoothly, and with much less embittered controversy. I assume then that it is not on natural grounds that the Church is to be Disestablished, nor on the ground that it is not showing the powers of reforming itself. Is it then on the ground that the doctrine it teaches is a doctrine which this country cannot sanction — a doctrine which should be stamped out and suppressed by every means at the disposal of the British Parliament? Of course we on this side of the House do not take this view. Nor do I understand hon. Gentlemen opposite to take it, because they are good enough to assure us that if only we were to Disestablish the Welsh Church it would be stronger than ever, and the doctrine it preaches it will preach with renewed efficacy and increase of life. That being so—and whether it is so or not I will say a word directly—at all events it shows this, that hon. Gentleman do not object to the Established Church because they object to the doctrine taught by the Established Church. But, if they do object to it, then according to their own principle it ought to be maintained, because nothing could so much weaken its strength as to allow it to remain in connection with the State. I quite admit—and I fully and freely admit—that there are a very large number of Gentlemen who are in favour of Disestablishment upon abstract, general, and historical grounds; but I cannot admit, with the facts before me, that those who desire the Disestablishment of the Welsh Church, desire it upon abstract, or historical grounds. They want Disestablishment, because they want Disendowment. Disestablishment is on their lips, Disestablishment is in their Resolution, but what they want is Disendowment. It is not reform they desire, but plunder. Envy, envy, not piety is the motive of their action. Some hon. Gentleman has stood up this evening, and has told us that the Church would be more efficient in a condition of Apostolic poverty. I apply that principle to the Nonconformist Body to which they belong. Do they think that this Nonconformist Body, if deprived of their endowments, if deprived of those gifts made to them time to time by pious and spirited members of their congregations, do they think that the conformist Bodies would do their more efficiently than they are doing now? I understand that they are energetic in obtaining gifts and endowments for their Body, and that show as much zeal and public spirit as any member of the Established Church; and I fail altogether to understand why, if poverty is to be a great benefit to the Established Church, it is not to be applied with equal hand to all other denominations within the limits of the four seas. The truth is, that behind this cry for religious equality lurks a great fallacy. For my own part, I should desire to see every teaching religious body, spurious, well endowed, and able to carry on to the best advantage the work entrusted to it. That is the equality which I desire, and in religion and in other matters, I also wish to see equality with regard to sections of the community and individuals, providing that equal means giving to those who have what they lack, and not taking from those that have, that which can put to a useful purpose. Equality in the one sense is a great political ideal; in the other sense the desire for equality is the meanest of political passions. I cannot help thinking sometimes those who desire to deprive the Established Church of property which was from time immemorial given to her by pious members who were of her faith down to the present generation and the year in which she lives—I cannot help thinking that those who desire to deprive her of those means of public utility, are, perhaps unconsciously, more animated by a wish to take away from the Church that which she has, than to give to the Nonconformists that which they do not. Now, is it not true that those who desire what is erroneously called Disestablishment, but is really Disendowment, are much more interested in taking away the money which the Church has, than in applying it to new purposes? They never tell what they are going to do with it, never pretend that they have objects of higher and more sacred value than the ends and objects which are now subserved by those endowments. They do not contend that their notions of equality would be satisfied if the money taken away from the Established Church were thereupon tossed into the sea. I do not say that they would not like to use it for some other purpose, but that rather than leave it to the Established Church they would like to see its whole wealth destroyed from off the face of the earth, and the clergy reduced to that position which they have indicated. We must all of us have seen in countries which have been long inhabited, ancient buildings which have been destroyed and wrecked in order that out of their fragments might be constructed some new jerry building, some new ephemeral structure, intended to meet the passing wants of the moment, and we must all have felt how tragic was the fate of those ancient palaces and churches so misused for baser purposes. Does not experience show that it is the same with the pillage of national Churches? I do not suppose that in these days the plunder would be devoted to increasing the fortunes of a Court favourite. Those days are passed. But I have no evidence that the plunder would be disposed of in a better way. It would be handed over, I presume, as a prey to wire-pullers and electioneers to be squandered on the object which, for the moment, happened to tickle the fancy of the electorate of the day. A few years would pass, and the endowment made by the pious donors of 15 generations would be dissipated on this or that scheme, and would leave not a trace or wreck behind it, leaving the Church permanently poorer for all the great objects for which she was called into existence. The hon. and learned Member for Aberdeen asked us whether we could permanently defend the position we have taken up. He told us that by giving up the Church in Wales we should strengthen the Church in England. We are familiar with that argument. I notice that it is not usually employed by the friends of the Church. I notice that those who are most anxious for the Disestablishment of the Church in Wales, and who spend money to get it Disestablished, are not those who desire to see the Establishment maintained in England. I suppose they know their business to the full as well as the hon. and learned Member for Aberdeen; but, Sir, I believe, and I think, that in this respect I speak for every single Member who sits on this side of the House, and for many who sit on the other side, that the fate of the Church in Wales is indissolubly bound up with the fate of the Church in England, and I believe that both in England and in Wales the Church can be, and will be defended by this House. I admit that hon. Gentlemen have had—and doubtless will have in the future—large minorities in the Lobbies of this House. But they belong to a Party which is irrevocably committed to a policy by which so vast a measure as Disestablishment must be placed further and further into the far future; they belong to a Party which is committed to a series of measures which must postpone indefinitely, so far as I can see, even if the country agree to it, the serious consideration of anything so formidable as a Disestablishment Bill. But I have the conviction that the Church of England and the Church of Wales are destined in the indefinite future to maintain the position they have maintained throughout an almost indefinite past, and if I can interpret in any way the currents of public opinion, if I am right in seeing below the surface of Parliamentary Debates and Parliamentary Divisions the true direction in which the thought of this country runs, I do not think that it runs in the direction of Disestablishment. I believe that perhaps after a long re-action men are more and more coming to the conclusion that religion is the essence of society, and that society cannot be held together if religion perishes or is atrophied. While I recognise that tendency, and that current of public opinion, I think I also see that more and more people are disposed to think that if religion be one of the great interests of society, if it be in truth one of the things which we should foster to the best of our ability, it is to an Established Church—not alone, but

(11.30.) SIR WILLIAM HAR-COURT (Derby): I do not think, Sir, that the right hon. Gentleman could have more accurately defined the distinction which divides that side of the House from this than in stating that, in his belief, religion principally depends upon Establishment. We are ready, as soon as he chooses to take the opinion of the country on that point. Sir, the whole course of the right hon. Gentleman's speech, if he will allow me to say so, depends upon the fallacy of identifying the Church with an Establishment. In my opinion, an Establishment is not a source of strength to the Church, but a source of weakness, and the attempt to represent that men who are hostile to Establishment are therefore enemies of the Church is to represent a state of things, which, at all events, in my opinion, is contrary to the fact. We have had, in many respects, an interesting Debate, and I thought it a promising Debate when I heard the speech of the Solicitor General. He declared uncompromising opposition to the principles of this Motion. Well, Sir, we have had many uncompromising statements from the Solicitor General, but I have always observed that those statements seriously compromised the situation. It is only a few years ago that, upon another subject, we had an emphatic "No" from the hon. and learned Gentleman, and yet last night we had an emphatic "Yes" from him upon the same subject. Therefore, when I hear of his uncompromising opposition I confess I am not alarmed. We had another speech—a speech which, I suppose, is intended to represent the animus and spirit of the clergy for whom the hon. Member for Bradford is supposed to speak. If you want to know why the Establishment and why the clergy are not beloved of the Welsh people you have only to listen to that speech. The hon. Member complained with acrimony of a language which he did not understand. We are able ourselves to appreciate the acrimony of language which we do not understand. I desire no better illustration of why

the Church in Wales is alien to the affections of the people than in that speech, which is understood to be a representation of the spirit and traditions of the Church. I confess that I heard with some satisfaction the speech of the Solicitor General, because I observe that the speeches of the Solicitor General resemble that darkest hour which is always supposed to precede the dawn; though the hon. and learned Member's speeches are always ingenious, always eloquent, and always frank—so much I must do him the justice to admit. Now the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury expressed his readiness to rest upon statistics. He thought the arithmetical argument was conclusive in his favour. He complained that there had been no census in Wales upon this subject. Yes, Sir, there is a census which must be taken every seven years, and which will be taken again before long. What is the census of the polling booths in Wales? That census represents every registered householder in Wales; and is it not a singular thing if you maintain that the majority of the Welsh people are in favour of the Established Church, that you should have an almost unanimous voice from the Welsh people against the Established Church? For any man of common sense, that will dispose of the statistical argument. I should like to hear the answer to that. If you have a majority of the Welsh people—if you have the Welsh people almost unanimous—against the Established Church, how can you deny that the majority of the Welsh people are adverse to the Established Church? Then, why do not a majority of the people elect Members in favour of the Established Church? Then the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury has another argument—the argument from antiquity. We know the view of the right hon. Gentleman on the subject of antiquity. He gave it to us the other night. He says he has a preference for stupid things that have been done before, which he thinks are better than wise things which are new. There again the right hon. Gentleman has accurately defined the differences between that side of the House and this. The Party opposite are the historical and traditional representatives of stupid things which have been done before, and we are the advocates of the wise things which are new. I am extremely glad to find that I am so entirely at one with the right hon. Gentleman in his definition of the political situation. He says we are proposing to stamp out the doctrine of the Church in Wales because we object to Establishment and Endowment. Is the doctrine of the Church to be stamped out?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (interrupting): I did not say so.

SIR W. HARcourt: I have no intention of misrepresenting the right hon. Gentleman, but I gathered that from his observations. Well, then, we agree with the right hon. Gentleman that Disestablishment and Disendowment do not affect the doctrine of the Church at all.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Will not stamp it out.

SIR W. HARcourt: Will not stamp it out. But will it injure the doctrine? If the right hon. Gentleman asserts that the doctrine of the Church will be injured, I cannot agree with him there. Now, upon the question of numerical majority, I cannot set that aside in so philosophical a manner as the right hon. Gentleman does. It has been called to-night by the Solicitor General a separatist argument, and the hon. and learned Gentleman has referred to the speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Midlothian. But where did my right hon. Friend take that from? He took it from the speech of a gentleman whom we are sorry to miss in this House—from a speech made by the present Duke of Devonshire in reference to the Church of Scotland. Lord Hartington declared he was ready to support the Disestablishment of the Church in Scotland as soon as he was satisfied that a majority of the people of Scotland were in favour of that. Well, is that a separatist argument? I do not know whether the representative of the Duke of Devonshire here (Mr. Chamberlain) holds that opinion? I hardly think he will confirm the Solicitor General in the opinion that this is a separatist argument. Why, it is obvious you cannot found a National Church upon a minority of the people—nobody ever dreamed of such a foundation for a National Church supported by the State. What business has the State to support as a National Church a Church which is only the Church of a minority? The old theory of the foundation of a National Church was, that it was the universal religion in the State, and, indeed, it was the compulsory religion of the State in former days. But there is no question about that now. Now, I heard the most dangerous doctrine from the right hon. Gentleman. He wished, he said, to see all religious sects endowed. Has the Unionist party then adopted the principle of concurrent endowment? He wished, he said, to see all sections of religion prosperous. Yes, and so do we; but prosperous through the congregations upon whom they depend, not from the sources the right hon. Gentleman alluded to. We are perfectly in favour of religious denominations, having the support of members of the denominations. I am not going to enter into particulars of the Welsh question, which have been dealt with by gentlemen more familiar with them than I am; but, in the short time I intend to occupy the time of the House, I desire to say a few words upon the question whether or not Establishment and Endowment strengthen a Church. That seems to be assumed by hon. Gentlemen opposite, but I think we have good reasons for believing exactly the opposite. Nobody acquainted with the present social condition of England can have failed to perceive the enormous difference in the position occupied by the Church of England in the great towns and in country districts. In the great towns of England the Anglican Church is strong, is rich, powerful and influential. It has in my opinion grown in power and influence among the town populations. And why? You know perfectly well that in the large and prosperous towns Establishment and Endowment play a very small part in the history of the Church. The wealth of the Church there does not come from the State or from Endowment, it comes from the principally—that that great duty should be assigned.

(11.30.) SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby): I do not think, Sir, that the right hon. Gentleman could have more accurately defined the distinction which divides that side of the House from this than in stating that, in his belief, religion principally depends upon Establishment. We are ready, as soon as he chooses to take the opinion of the country on that point. Sir, the whole course of the right hon. Gentleman's speech, if he will allow me to say so, depends upon the fallacy of identifying the Church with an Establishment. In my opinion, an Establishment is not a source of strength to the Church, but a source of weakness, and the attempt to represent that men who are hostile to Establishment are therefore enemies of the Church is to represent a state of things, which, at all events, in my opinion, is contrary to the fact. We have had, in many respects, an interesting Debate, and I thought it a promising Debate when I heard the speech of the Solicitor General. He declared uncompromising opposition to the principles of this Motion. Well, Sir, we have had many uncompromising statements from the Solicitor General, but I have always observed that those statements seriously compromised the situation. It is only a few years ago that, upon another subject, we had an emphatic "No" from the hon. and learned Gentleman, and yet last night we had an emphatic "Yes" from him upon the same subject. Therefore, when I hear of his uncompromising opposition I confess I am notalarmed. In the great towns of England the Anglican Church is strong, is rich, powerful and influential. It has in my opinion grown in power and influence among the town populations. And why? You know perfectly well that in the large and prosperous towns Establishment and Endowment play a very small part in the history of the Church. The wealth of the Church there does not come from the State or from Endowment, it comes from the munificence of its congregations. There the Church relies upon its own efforts, and there it is powerful and rich. Take this great metropolis outside the City of London. The endowments are insignificant, but the support given to the Church by subscriptions is immense. It is only within the City of London that you find churches with endowments, but without congregations. Turn to the rural districts; is it the same thing there? Why, I might ask the Gentlemen opposite as much as those who sit behind me, is the parson a popular character in rural districts? ("Yes.") Is he? I ask the candidates for the Eastern Counties what they think? I know it is not the fact. I know that the gentlemen who rely on the support of the clergy in rural elections rely on a broken reed. What is the meaning of this unpopularity of the parson in rural districts? It is not the fault of the men, for they are men of elevated character, high education, and they bear blameless lives, and discharge their duties to the best of their ability. (Interruptions.) I should have thought hon. Members opposite would have joined in that view; I am sorry to find they do not. But the position of the Clergy is altogether different in the rural districts from the position in populous towns; for there (in the country) the Church is ostentatiously Established and Endowed, and becomes a Militant Church. It is a Militant Establishment. The Solicitor-General said he thought we had very much improved; that we had got rid of the drinking parson and the gambling parson, and he hoped we should get rid of the magisterial parson. So do I, for I know something of the sentences of magisterial parsons. The Solicitor-General went on to say he thought we were getting rid of the political parson. Now, I have a high opinion of the power of the Solicitor-General; but if he is going to get rid of the political parson, he is going to accomplish a labour equal to the greatest of Hercules'. Are there any signs of our getting rid of political parsons? No; the Clergy are more political now than ever they were in former times. What has inspired the bitter spirit of Party polities in the Church and among Nonconformists? Yes, among Nonconformists too! It is the question of Disestablishment and Disendowment—the defense on one side, the attack on the other. What is it that has made the Clergymen from generation to generation the opponents of all reform? When the question of slavery arose, who were the anti-slavery party? The Church party. No; everybody knows that the anti-slavery party was the Nonconformist party. Why was that? Because at that time slavery was an established institution. Why is it that the Church has always found it necessary to put itself upon the side of vested interests? Because it is a vested interest itself. Why is it that on every reform, whether the reform is upon a matter of religion which you might understand, or on such questions as the suffrage, you have always found the Established Church opposed to these reforms? (Cries of "Divide.") One has a right to expect from hon. Members opposite that they will listen, though they may dispute on principle. I say it is a proposition no man can deny that the Church has been, as a body, opposed from generation to generation to all measures of reform. In my opinion that has done the Church great injury among the people. Often do we hear the phrase "divorcing the people from the soil," and in my opinion Establishment and Endowment have led to this feeling, and have done much to divorce the Church from the hearts of the people. That is the history of the unpleasantness, the bitterness, which exists against the Church in Wales. Look at the Universities. The Universities have rejected every man who has been a supporter of reform. Lord Lansdowne, Lord Palmerston, Sir Robert Peel, my right hon. Friend the Member for Midlothian, great and distinguished men, could not represent the Universities. We have now in the House two of the most distinguished men who ever represented Universities—first in science, first in scholarship in England, and, I might say, in Europe; but what chance would these gentlemen have had to represent the Universities here if they had not belonged to the Anti-Reforming Party. All their science, all their learning, would not have availed if they had not been "sound" on the Irish question. I say, then, that Establishment and Endowment have done immense evil, and not good, to the Church. The Church of England being established as a monopoly, has necessarily placed the Church on the side of all monopolies. The Church being itself established and privileged, has ranged the Church on the side of privileges and in favour of many abuses. In my opinion, so far from adding strength to the Church in respect to religious doctrines and influence among the people, Establishment and Endowment have been the greatest hindrances to the Church in influence among the people, and it is mainly upon that ground that I support the Resolution which is now before us.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS.

Ordered, That the Committee of Public Accounts do consist of Twelve Members:—Mr. Barran, Mr. Bartley, Mr. Sydney Buxton, Mr. Crawford, Sir John Lubbock, Mr. Mahony, Mr. Arthur O'Connor, Mr. Salt, Sir Ughtred Kay-Shuttleworth, Sir Richard Temple, Mr. Wodehouse, and Sir John Gorst.

PARLIAMENTARY PAPERS DISTRIBUTION.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a Select Committee be appointed to assist Mr. Speaker in superintending the form and regulating the Distribution of Parliamentary Papers."—(Sir Herbert Maxwell.)

(12.15.) MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): May I ask the hon. Baronet, who has charge of this Committee to turn the attention of the Committee to the mode in which Irish papers are dealt with? These are always included in the Papers upon "pink" form, so that to get them Members have to specially order them. Now, as the majority in this House are entirely ignorant upon most Irish matters, I think that if there are any papers which should be distributed as a matter of course, they are those relating to Ireland. There are matters nearer home upon which it is more desirable that Members should inform themselves—that upon those relating to distant parts of the world—Japan, Jerusalem, or Madagascar.

(12.16.) SIR HERBERT MAXWELL (Wigton): The rule hitherto adopted in respect to Irish papers is exactly the same as that which applies to papers upon other matters. Every paper, as a matter of fact, is put on the "pink" list, and is not circulated among Members unless they require it; and the only papers, as far as my recollection serves me, which are distributed without request are Reports of Royal Commissions, Reports of Select Committees, and such papers as have been promised by Heads of Departments on special occasions and in anticipation of particular debates. Should the House agree to the re-appointment of the Committee I will take care that the view the hon. Member has just expressed is put before the Committee, with a view to such regulations as may be required.

The Committee was accordingly nominated of:—Mr. Arthur Acland, Mr. Bartley, Mr. Causton, Mr. Arthur Elliot, Mr. Gill, Mr. Howell, Mr. James Maclean, and Sir Herbert Maxwell.

Ordered, That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records.

Ordered, That Three be the quorum.

PUBLIC PETITIONS.

Ordered, That a Select Committee be appointed, to whom shall be referred all Petitions presented to the House, with the exception of such as relate to Private Bills; and that such Committee do classify and prepare abstracts of the same, in such form and manner as shall appear to them best suited to convey to the House all requisite information respecting their contents, and do report the same from time to time to the House; and that the reports of the Committee do set forth the number of signatures to each Petition only in respect to those signatures to which addresses are affixed:—And that such Committee have power to direct the printing in extenso of such Petitions, or of such parts of Petitions, as shall appear to require it:—And that such Committee have power to report their opinion and observations therupon to the House:

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SHOP HOURS BILL. (No. 26.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

\(12.41.) MR. PROVAND (Glasgow, Blackfriars, &c.): I rise to move the second Reading of this Bill, the object of which is to amend the law relating to the employment of women and young persons in shops. The only Act which applies to the employees in shops is the Shop Hours Regulation Act, passed in 1886, for three years, and which consequently expired in 1889, though it has been annually renewed since. That Act, however, only applies to young persons, and the difference between it and the Bill now before the House is that we, in this Bill, desire to bring women within the provisions of that Act, in fact we desire to re-enact the whole of it, adding the application of it to women. That is the only change we propose to make in the law. The effect of the Shop Hours Regulation Act has been much less than it was expected it would be at the time it was passed, and this chiefly arises from the limitations in the Act itself. There was no machinery provided for putting the Act in force, there was no Inspection Clause included, although the Select Committee, to whom the Bill was referred before it was passed, spoke favourably of a clause covering Government inspection, saying it would be of very great service. But no such clause was inserted in the Act, and consequently it is no man's business to see that the law is carried out. The law then became inoperative, and I doubt if one shopkeeper in three knows of the law he* should observe. But there has been some benefit from that Act, even with the limited operation it has had, and for what has been done under the Act we are chiefly indebted to the Early Closing Association in London, and other Associations of a similar kind throughout the country. These Associations have sometimes notified offending shopkeepers and sometimes have instituted prosecutions. In asking that women should be included in the Act, we are not, as every hon. Member knows, endeavouring to enact any fresh principle in law. Nearly 50 years ago there was an Act passed limiting the working hours of women to 60 in the week, and since then there has been a steady succession of Factory and Workshops Acts, in all of which some provision has been inserted ameliorating the conditions, and in many cases shortening the hours women are expected to work in factories and workshops. There can be no doubt whatever about the benefit resulting from such legislation. I might quote from many speeches delivered from the Government Bench and from Home Secretaries commenting upon the effect of these Acts. I might quote from the evidence of witnesses who have given testimony before Select Committees of this House; and from many other sources I might provide abundant evidence to show that the results of the Factory and Workshops Acts, so far as they have applied to adult women or had anything to do with adult female labour, have been beneficial. Perhaps the shortest way in which I can place a little of this proof before the House will be by referring to the Report of the Select Committee on the Shop Hours Regulation Bill of 1886. That Committee took a great deal of evidence, and recommended the Bill to the House, and it passed into law. In speaking generally on this part of the question, the Committee said—

"The great majority of witnesses expressed their opinion that though voluntary action had effected much improvement, little could be expected from it in the poorer neighbourhoods, and that nothing short of legislation would be effective."

As regards medical testimony, I will quote only one opinion—that of Dr. Abbot. He, examined as to his opinion respecting the effect of the labour of shop assistants, said :—

"The labour in shops is as exhausting and trying as attending to machinery in factories and workshops for a corresponding time."

Factory Inspectors have also been examined on this point, and much evidence will be found in the Report of the proceedings of the Commission which sat in 1878, before the Workshops Act was passed. Mr. Taylor, the Inspector for the North-West District of Lancashire, before the Committee of 1886, said :—

"It appears that a large majority of Inspectors of Factories are in favour of some legislative regulation of the hours of labour in shops."

In addition, I need only quote the last paragraph of the Committee's Report, in which they say :—

"In conclusion, your Committee are satisfied that the hours of shop assistants, ranging from 84 to 85 hours a week, must be generally injurious, and often ruinous to health."

I do not think it is necessary that I should place any further evidence before the House, or read more quotations from the opinions expressed by different witnesses. The Committee I have referred to was the last which sat on this question. This particular question did not come immediately before the Committee which sat last year. But think what 84 or 85 hours a week mean! Fourteen hours, for each of the six days, standing in shops—from 8 o'clock in the morning until 10 o'clock at night. That, I think, will be quite sufficient to show the necessity for some protection to adult women under the law, in the same way that protection is at the present time given to young persons. But in legislating for any class it is important to consider whether the legislation proposed will operate to any extent, and in what way, against the interests of those we desire to protect. It is important to be quite certain, assuming that this Bill becomes law, that women will not thereby lose any opportunity for obtaining employment which is open to them now. On that point I have some experience to lay before the House. Four years ago evidence was collected on this point, and it all went to show that women would not be affected in this respect if their hours of employment were restricted to 7½ hours a week, including meal time, which is the proposition in this Bill. I candidly admit that the opinion of the Early Closing Association was to some extent hostile to my view at that time. I, therefore, proceeded to collect further evidence, and I saw many representatives of institutions interested in the employment of women and the opinion at which I arrived was confirmed by further testimony collected by the Early Closing Association. The Association sent a circular to the officials of every working women's club or society whose address could be obtained, and the replies received afforded substantial testimony in favour of this Bill. This circular set forth that the Association was very anxious to have full and authentic information from the several bodies representing the interests of female labour as to the merits of the Shop Hours Bill, and invited expressions of opinion as to how far, if at all, such a Bill, if passed into law, would be likely to prejudice or interfere with female labour; to what extent such legislation was received with favour or otherwise by those parties interested in the question; and to what extent, if at all, the labour of women would be likely to be brought into competition with that of men. I do not think the circular letter could have been better framed for collecting evidence from working women as to the limit of 7½ hours a week in shops and similar places. I wrote to the Association to see what replies had been obtained, the circular being, as I have said, sent to every Association of the kind whose existence and address could be discovered, and I was informed that the inquiries had not brought forth any hostile criticism of the Bill whatever. This was evidence that public opinion on the subject had been ripening from the first idea, only a few years previous, that such legislation would injuriously affect the opportunities of women to obtain employment. Let me just briefly allude to Clause 9 of the Bill, which defines the word "shop." This is taken as including licensed public houses and refreshment houses of all kinds, which, with drapers, are the chief offenders in reference to the over-working of women. I might put forth hundreds of cases where the health of women has been permanently injured on account of the long hours of employment in such shops. They have been published; there are two volumes of such cases. There is confirmatory evidence from medical authorities; all the hospitals have examples of such cases. The Early Closing Association has got together many records of them, but I do not desire to work on the feelings of the House or occupy time unnecessarily, for it is sufficient to refer to the paragraph of the Report on the evidence taken in 1886, in which the Committee have recorded their opinion that such long hours must be generally injurious and often ruinous to health. It is impossible to get over the evidence on this point given only five years ago in reference to an Act of which this is an amending Bill. Clause 10 in the present Bill exempts all members of the same family who may carry on a business together—that is to say, this Bill will only apply to assistants engaged by an employer, and not to the members of a family who keep a shop for and by themselves; these may carry on their employment for any number of hours they may think proper. There is one clause in the Bill—Clause 8—which has not a place in the original Act, a clause providing for the appointment of Inspectors. I have taken this clause, as it stands, from the Factory and Workshops Act, 1878, and I have done so because the Committee of 1886 drew attention to the absence of a clause from the Bill before them dealing with Government inspection, and expressed an opinion that a clause of that kind would have very considerable effect. We know now that it was the absence of such a clause that rendered the Act of 1886 to a large extent inoperative. These clauses will be dealt with in Committee, and for the present I have only to ask the House to accept the principle of the Bill that adult women shall be brought under the law, which at the present time applies only to young persons. I intend to accept the proposal of the right hon. Baronet (Sir John Lubbock), that the Bill shall be referred to a Select Committee, and if the Government agree to accept the Second Reading upon this understanding, I need not occupy the time of the House much longer. I believe that even with this brief statement of the reasons for the Bill I have made out a strong case; but if I were to add anything further it would be to point out how little it is we are asking by this Bill. I have mentioned already that the work of women was legislated for nearly 50 years ago; and if I were to take the last Act passed in this direction 13 years ago and compare it with this Bill, how meagre will the regulations appear which we ask for on their behalf. The Act of 1878, besides limiting the working hours to 60 in the week, has many other regulating and limiting clauses, of which there are none in this Bill. That Act regulates the number of hours during which women are to be continuously employed in factories and workshops: it regulates the holidays and half-holidays; it requires certificates as to the fitness of young persons before they undertake the work required from them; it requires surgical certificates; it makes precise stipulations as to meals, as to the time set apart for them, and as to where and when they shall be taken; and the Act also deals elaborately with the sanitary conditions of the places of employment, ventilation, and so on. There are many other controlling clauses for the regulation of the conditions under which women are employed in factories and workshops. Nothing of the kind is proposed in the present Bill. We are content with the inclusion of adult women in the law now applied to young persons. I do not say that 74 hours a-week are not too long for employment. I do think they are too long. Nevertheless, I think it is better that the Act should pass in the simple form presented by the Bill, and then, having seen the effect produced, experience will guide us to decide what further requirements may be necessary. One reason strongly in favour of bringing adult women under the law now applied to young persons is to be found in the difficulty women have in combining to provide for their own general benefit. Even when men find both money and management to assist them to combine it is difficult to keep them together on the Trade Union principle. They will fall away, and, therefore, are entitled to a protection from the law which may be withheld from adult men. Simple as the Bill is, it may have an effect in shortening the hours for men. In many establishments assistants of both sexes are engaged. If half the staff can only be employed for 74 hours in the week, doubtless the effect will be to shorten the hours for the whole of the staff. It will have the effect of shortening the hours of employment for men just as the Factory Acts, though adult men were not included, have shortened the hours of employment all round. I need not occupy the time of the House any longer. With these brief reasons I commend the Bill to the House for a Second Reading, with the understanding that it shall then be referred to a Select Committee, in accordance with the Motion standing in the name of the right hon. Baronet (Sir John Lubbock).

*(1.2.) MR. BAUMANN (Camberwell, Peckham) : I rise to second the Motion for Second Reading, and, in doing so, I shall deal briefly, but, at the same time, broadly, with the general principles of the measure, without entering into details ; both because the Second Reading is not the occasion for dealing with clauses, and because the Motion standing in the name of the right hon. Baronet opposite (Sir John Lubbock) is to refer the Bill to a Select Committee, where will be offered a far better opportunity for dealing with details than a Second Reading Debate in this House presents. The principle of protecting the labour of women has been affirmed and extended by the Legislature during the past 40 years, and the proposal of the measure now before us is to extend that protection a little further, from women employed in factories and workshops to women employed in retail shops, as defined in the 9th clause. Now, as a matter of principle, I ask, why should that protection not be extended from factories to shops ? Is the labour of women in shops less exhausting, less trying to the female frame, than their labour in factories ? There is medical evidence to prove that continuously standing for more than twelve hours a day in shops is not less, but more exhausting, and more trying for women, than work in the mills. It is perfectly notorious that there is a certain class of disorders and diseases which are induced by the continuous standing of shop assistants. The variety of muscular action brought into play by the more varied occupations of the factory and workshop is less trying to a woman than the cruel standing in a shop for twelve or more hours. What does the Bill ask you to do ? To limit these hours to 74 in the week. That is more than twelve hours a day, because in the shops to which the Act would probably apply there is, unfortunately, no Saturday half-holiday. So we must take the six days of the week, giving an average of over twelve hours a day. Will any gentleman rise in this House, will any employer of shop labour here rise, and say that a day of over twelve hours—approaching 13 hours—is not enough, and more than enough, for women to be employed throughout the year ? And what are the objections to this proposal ? The most respectable of the objections is the inconvenience to the public. Of course, in the poorer districts, customers have to do their shopping in the early hours of the morning or the late hours of the evening, often between the hours of 8 and 10. So it is thought inconvenience will arise from the earlier closing of shops. But that is a matter of arrangement, and I cannot see why a shopkeeper, in the slack hours of the morning and afternoon, could not give his employés, in turn, an opportunity for rest or for leaving the shop to take fresh air. Another objection equally respectable, and even more formidable, is that the effect of this Bill may be to deprive women of employment, and that it may lead to the substitution of male labour for female labour, and I read a letter to-day on that point in the Morning Post. I do not believe the Bill will have any such effect, because men's labour is, of course, dearer than women's labour ; and if this measure should lead to anything like a wholesale dismissal of shop-girls and large additions to the employment of male assistants, then we know the wages of men assistants would rise beyond the point at which they now stand, making the expenses of the shopkeeper too great. Another argument is that the restriction of women's work will diminish the profits of the shopkeepers; but shopkeepers are the only people who make enormous fortunes in these days: we see evidence of it on every side. One shopkeeper buys a mountain in Scotland for a deer-run; another pays a patrimony for a racehorse; so that the clipping of the profits of these commercial leviathans cannot be weighed against the health and happiness of the women who contribute in some degree to making those fortunes. There are some who object to interference with shopkeepers in the management of their own business; but I quite agree with Carlyle, that there are occasions when you must put a collar upon a man, and compel him to do that which is right. I am in favour of putting a collar upon some of our shopkeepers, to compel them to treat their shopwomen with care and humanity. There is another class of political philosophers opposed to legislation of this kind, who style themselves Individualists, the forlorn and fading remnant of an exploded school. I am an Individualist, but I am in favour of protecting, and not oppressing, the individual. In the struggle between the feeble and the strong, it is liberty which oppresses; it is the law which enfranchises and protects. I should ill discharge my task if I did not say a word or two upon the manner by which it is proposed to give effect to this Bill. It is notorious that the staff of Inspectors of factories and workshops is ludicrously under-manned for the work of the large towns, and I should be quite willing to very largely increase that staff. It is said that to carry out this legislation we should want an army of Inspectors. Very well, let us have an army of Inspectors. Nothing is more discreditable to the Government of this country than the niggardly manner in which the Treasury refuses to consent to the expenditure of a few hundreds of thousands upon an efficient staff of Inspectors, whilst Parliament votes ten millions to assist Irish tenants and English yeomen. I hold that the health of shopwomen in our large towns is as sufficient an object for the paternal, or even maternal, protection of the State as a British yeomanry. I must refer to an Amendment which stands on the Paper in the name of the hon. Member for Crewe (Mr. W. M'Laren), and I shall do so for the purpose of adducing a collateral political reason why the House should read this Bill a second time. The hon. Member proposes to ask the House not to read this Bill until the franchise has been extended to women; and without discussing the Amendment, I would ask if women had votes, what would be the attitude of this House towards the Motion of my hon. Friend? I am an opponent of the enfranchisement of women, but if women had votes this Motion would be moved not from those Benches, but from that (the Treasury) Bench; and we should be all tumbling over one another's heels in our anxiety to support and defend the interests of Mary Ann, just as we are now tumbling over one another's heels to protect the interests of poor Hodge, who has been so long neglected. I ask the House to show, by their willingness to attend to the just demands of the female portion of the community, that it is not necessary to extend the franchise to women in order to secure for them the protection of legislation.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time." —(Mr. Provand.)

"MR. SYDNEY GEDGE (Stockport): In the absence of the Member for Crewe, I propose to move the Amendment which stands on the Paper in his name, and I therefore at once meet the challenge of my hon. Friend who has just sat down. If I thought that those sensible women, who I hope will before long obtain a vote, were with anything like unanimity in favour of this Bill, I should certainly vote for it, without waiting for them to get a vote; but it does not seem to me that there is any proof before the House of any general demand on the part of women for this measure. First, I doubt whether there is any demand at all; and, secondly, whether if there be, it is a just one. At all events it would be very much wiser for the House to pause until we can ascertain whether women desire an alteration in the laws such as is now proposed. The hon. Gentleman who introduced the Bill put it before us as a very small matter indeed, and said he was proposing to introduce "only women." But women form half the human race, at all events. We remember how there was found an envelope left by Dean Swift with the superscription "only a woman's hair." To my mind that was very pathetic; but to some people it was a mere nothing, and that is apparently the opinion of the hon. Member who introduced the Bill as affecting "only women," as to his own proposal.

MR. PROVAND: May I correct the hon. Member? I did not say it was a small matter; but I said it was a simple question, because I refused to overload the Bill with any details of any kind, and confine it to bringing women within the scope of the law which now applies to young persons.

*MR. GEDGE: I do not see any difference between calling it a simple matter and a small matter, and to my mind it is a very large and important matter. We all agree in the desire that women should not be overworked. None of us contend that 74 hours a week is not quite sufficient time for young women to be compulsorily employed. But my first objection to this Bill is, that while it professes to give protection, it really imposes restraint. The hon. Member who spoke last said "liberty is oppression, but the law franchises and protects." One part of the hon. Member's sentence contradicts the other. I am in favour of protecting women by giving them votes, but I hold that they should be able to sell their work as much as they like without any restraint on the part of the law. No doubt the principle of the law interfering to protect those who cannot protect themselves has been admitted for 40 years. But that principle was first strenuously resisted by Mr. Cobden, Mr. John Bright, and the leaders of the Radical school. (A cry of "More shame for them.") Well, De mortuis nil nisi bonum. I was not particularly fond of those gentlemen when they were living, but I should be sorry to say anything to their discredit now. But Lord Shaftesbury and those who worked with him succeeded in overruling that objection by showing that you might push any principle too far. Are we, then, because we have gone so far, to be bound to go still further? If so, where are you going to stop? If you say, because we interfere in cases where the work is of an arduous character, are we bound to extend the same principle of interference for the protection of women to other work? If so, you will have to carry that principle into homes. I have no doubt I could bring a considerable number of cases to show that servant maids have very long hours in houses, and that women who are in employment—if you call their husbands employers—are working a great number of hours. If you vote for this Bill merely because we have admitted the principle of interference, you will be compelled to vote for restriction of every kind proposed in this House. With regard to the clauses, I wish to ask whether a married woman is considered to be employed by her husband, and whether it is intended, under this Bill, to prevent any married woman from being employed in the shops?

MR. PROVAND: Clause 10 of the Bill provides for that.

"Nothing in this Act shall apply to shops where only persons are employed who are at home; that is to say, are members of the same family dwelling there, or to members of the employer's family dwelling in the house to which the shop is attached."

Why is such a foolish distinction as that made? Because the promoters of the Bill know that without such an exception we should all rise against it. I want to know what employment means? When a woman sits at a desk all day exercising general superintendence, is that employment? We have felt bound to restrict the employment of women in factories, because we know that, if they were worn out by it, when they married they would have very weak children, whom the State would probably have to maintain. But I know of no other ground of interference with the employment of adult women. We have only the right to interfere for the protection of the

State. That is a very different matter to work in shops. Refreshment rooms are included in this Bill. In the Refreshment Room of this House young women serve us with tea, and, although they are busy at times, they have a very pleasant life at other times. It is the same at railway stations, and in City dining-rooms, where they work hard at breakfast, luncheon, and in the evening; but where, during the greater part of the day, there is very little for them to do. Yet those who employ them are to be subject to penalties. It is said the Workshop Hours Regulation Bill is not of much good, because we have got an army of Inspectors; but I suspect if there had been Inspectors poking their noses into the shops all over the country, you would have had such an outcry against that legislation you could not have resisted. I am afraid that under this Bill you will have Inspectors making inquiries and tting up cases against employers, and the result of such an obnoxious system would be a repeal of the w. The hon. Member thinks nothing spending a few hundreds of thousands of pounds upon Inspectors; but think my constituents would look rather askance at me if I voted for such additional taxation as that. With regard to the Amendment, I demur to a proposition that this House will not legislate for the reasonable wants of any of Her Majesty's subjects till they have votes. Long before the agriculturists had votes the Conservatives had done all in their power for their benefit; and when complaints were made of defects in the law, it could not be forgotten that the Member for Midlothian and his Party have been in power during the greater part of the time which has elapsed since 1881. But we do not know what the wishes of women are, and we want to have them constitutionally expressed. The late Mr. Forster, as I remember, stated that he was not in favour of the re-establishment and Disendowment of the Church of England being considered by Parliament until women had votes, because generally they had more to do with the clergy than men. If that were true on such a subject, how much more true is that argument when the bill before us affects "only women."

It is because they will be materially injured by the restraint of this Bill that I am against it, and in favour of the Amendment. I am in favour of liberty all round, and while I heartily desire that no woman should have to work longer than this Bill provides, yet I hold we have no right to prevent a woman from working longer if she chooses to do so, and we have no right to interfere until we have ascertained her opinion. I beg to move that this House decline to further interfere with the hours of labour of adult women until women have the constitutional means of expressing their opinions by the Parliamentary Franchise.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That," to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "This House declines to further interfere with the hours of labour of adult women until women have the constitutional means of expressing their opinions by the Parliamentary Franchise." —(Mr. Sydney Gedge.)

(1.40.) MR. A. C. CORBETT (Glasgow, Tradeston): I was much surprised, Sir, at the speech we have just listened to, and at the suggestion that legislation should be deferred till we have the enfranchisement of women. If we have any extension of the franchise which falls short of woman suffrage, the women for whom we plead would not be affected by it. The only objection that might be urged against the Bill is that what we want can be secured by voluntary effort. Any one familiar with the facts must realise that voluntary action will not adequately meet the case. As Chairman of the Board of the Early Closing Association, I have had special opportunity of making myself familiar with the facts bearing on that point. That Association has been in existence 50 years, and has spent £50,000 in endeavouring to cultivate voluntary early closing. If you consider the facts, you will find that those who have done most in the way of securing early closing are those who cry out most for legislative assistance in securing their object. If we desire to get early closing or a half-holiday in a district, we have to get the unanimous consent young women employed at railway stations and other similar places. The hours are prolonged, and though the labour may not be continuous, the attendance is, and they have no opportunity of recreation or exercise in the open air, and they have many difficulties to contend with. I do not say that the House would be right in restricting their labour, but am of opinion that there is a prima facie case for inquiry by a Select Committee. Then there is the shop-keepers point of view. There may be wealthy shopkeepers, but as a class they are not such, and care must be exercised before the House take steps which might seriously embarrass them, harassed as they already are by the competition of Co-operative Stores and other causes. We must be careful how we interfere with freedom. There is such a thing as mischievous and damaging philanthropy, and some of our legislation approaches very near to that limit. We must be careful how far we restrain trade, how far we interfere with the convenience of the community, and how far we impose disabilities and difficulties upon a worthy and deserving class. I hope this Bill will be referred to a Select Committee, and investigated by that tribunal.

*(2.40.) MR. ARTHUR B. WINTER-BOTHAM (Gloucester) : The House will have observed that every Member who sat upon the Committee of 1886, and who has spoken, has expressed approval of the provisions of this Bill, and gentlemen who went on that Committee, supposed to entertain a hostile aspect, could not resist the conclusion which the evidence brought before the Committee so clearly pointed out. I think that is an important matter. There has been a general unanimity by every speaker who has taken part in this discussion, with the exception of one discordant note struck by the hon. Member for Stockport. I do not propose to answer him, because there was no argument he used which would not apply with equal force to every one of the Factory Acts, for the regulation of the hours of labour, which this House has passed in former years. He spoke against the restriction of labour, and actually went so far as to say that it would tend to make women less womanly ! He spoke as if he were deeply anxious that there should be restraint in the hours of work; he fully admitted that the 74 hours' limit was ample, and he said he should be glad to see it brought about. But when he came to the question of the machinery to bring it about, and to carry his opinion into practice, then he fell back upon his admiration for voluntary work, and spoke about the results accomplished by a number of ladies in that regard. It is true there has been an Amendment moved to delay this legislation until Women's Suffrage has been passed ; but I cannot understand anybody supporting that Amendment, whatever views hon. Members may hold upon the question of Woman's Suffrage. Those who oppose Woman's Suffrage, and who think that the House of Commons is ready, able, and even anxious to legislate for women, should be only too glad to support this Bill, so that they may give proof of what they profess. Those who think that the absence of women from the House is an explanation why women's interests and social questions generally are not sufficiently looked after, surely ought to be the last people to offer any stumbling-block or delay to the passing of this measure, which is for the advantage and benefit of a large class of the more helpless women of our country. I rise chiefly because, as an employer of female labour myself, I have been rather surprised at the arguments that have been used to-night about the oppression by employers; and I want to point out, to the great credit of the shopkeepers of this country, that the agitation that has been carried on in recent years, whether it has been for the weekly half-holiday, or for the shortening of the hours of labour, has had amongst its principal supporters the shopkeepers of this country. Speaking for Bristol and other large towns in the West, I believe there is a very general desire amongst all the better class of shopkeepers to carry out legislation of this sort. But it is always the selfish, grasping minority who stand in the way, and who are never happy unless they are getting the better of their fellow-men, and these men prevent the voluntary principle from being carried out. I believe peak for employers of labour when I say that the Factory Acts have been of immense good to employers, and that you would get but a scanty few who would wish to go back to those days before the Factory Acts regulated the hours of labour; and I am sure it is a calumny on employers of labour to say that, as a class, they are opposed to the reasonable shortening of the hours of work. Some hon. Member has said that the shopkeepers would look upon the power in the Bill in regard to inspectors in a more hostile spirit than the Inspectors appointed under the Factory Act; and I remember the hon. Member for Stockport that the Inspectors would "violate the sanctity" of the shop! It is absurd talk about violating the sanctity of shops that are working their hands 80 or 90 hours a week, and in one case were I understand not less than 5 hours. I hold that in such cases the "sanctity" deserves to be violated. My own opinion is, that this Bill is so exceedingly reasonable and so exceedingly moderate that I should like it better if it went little further. I believe that work in a shop is as hard on the average as in a factory, and I fail to see why the same number of hours per week should not be enforced as in the case of tile factories for women and children namely, 55 and 56. During the past quarter of a century there has been great improvement in machinery; wonderful discoveries in science; we have had the telegraph, and telephone, and many other scientific discoveries; there have been great visions made for the community in the way of improved locomotion. All these things have tended to increase the productiveness of labour, while machinery has enormously increased it. Of course, I know there will be people who will rejoice if the House is so foolish as to reject this proposal. This Bill does not propose to touch adult male labour; and I hold it is most moderate all its provisions. For the last quarter of a century, as I have said, all these improvements in machinery have been enabling men who are in business to carry on business with great economy of labour, and with greater profit to themselves; and the time has come when this demand for some part of the result in more leisure for the workers—a natural demand, a wise demand, and a right demand—should be fallen in with. The Bill does not largely affect those who live in country districts, but who reside in large and populous districts. The hours of labour are not unreasonable in country shops; but it is the daughters of the farmer and the labourer, who find their way to the great cities, who are interested, and there is not one of us who have not a constituency who are not regarding this question with the deepest interest. It is a great matter for the village girl when she comes to the city to have this matter legislated upon, and I submit that every Member of an agricultural constituency should take this view of it. The Member for Stockport used one argument, which I call the "mother argument," and that was that they would not produce such strong and healthy children. There is a stronger argument, not the argument of mere expediency and profit, but the Christian argument. We have the right and we have the responsibility to see that the weak should not work unreasonable hours; and if the hon. Member could prove to me that the longer the work of a woman the stronger and healthier she will be, and the stronger her children, then I could understand his contention. I hope this will be only the beginning of other Bills in the same direction to make the lives of women and children brighter and happier than they are.

*(2.40.) MR. LEWIS H. ISAACS (Newington, Walworth): I wish to say that I cannot vote either for the Motion or for the Amendment. In the first instance, I do not think the Bill is in the right direction, and my reason for declining to support the Amendment is because I think it a most shabby attempt to set aside a Bill which has some merit in it by a proposal that it should be postponed, so as to fit in with another Bill not absolutely analogous to it or on all fours with it. I fail to see why a Bill to regulate the hours of shop labour should be deferred until this House has determined whether the franchise is to be conferred on women or not. That franchise, if conferred, would not reach, at any rate in the present day, those who are immediately concerned in the Bill now under the consideration of the House. But if I am unable to support the Amendment, I regret that I am also unable to support the Motion "That the Bill be now read a second time." And perhaps the House will be somewhat startled if I say that my reason for not supporting the Motion for the Second Reading of the Bill is that I do not think that it goes far enough, that it fails to deal with the class who are more immediately affected than those who are to come under the purview of this Bill, and that with regard to its inquisitorial character, that that inquisitorial character does not go far enough. I am of opinion that if there be one class of people more than another that should receive attention from this House with regard to the hours of labour in which they are engaged, it is the class of domestic servants. And I think we need only refer to our own establishments, and go no further back than yesterday to satisfy ourselves that if it is necessary at all to interfere in this direction the domestic servant has far more need of protection than even those for whom this Bill proposes to interfere. I remember last night, or rather this morning, getting to my house at something like 1 o'clock, and then not going to bed. The servants had to wait on me, and probably it was 2 o'clock in the morning before they got to bed, and they would have to resume their duties at 8 o'clock. I object to this Bill, also, because I think it interferes with what is a most salutary action on the part of the public, that is, the voluntary effort to reduce the hours of labour with which we are now dealing. If that voluntary effort be allowed to continue, I am sure it will eventually result in a satisfactory solution of this question. I may say that the Early Closing Association with which I am connected on the other side of the river, which has only one year's experience, held its first general meeting the other day, and they were able to make the announcement that by voluntary effort on the part of those interested, not by seeking to apply any coercion whatever, they had managed to get the result sought for in the case of no less than 7,000 employés. And if the feeling is that direction be allowed to expand and be not interfered with by vexation and troublesome and inquisitorial action such as that proposed by this Bill, it will in itself accomplish all that the promoters of this measure seek to obtain. I object, therefore, to further legislation in this direction. While unable to support the Amendment, I regret that I also am not in a position to give a vote to allow this Bill to go to a Second Reading.

(2.45.) MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I agree with one of the hon. Gentlemen on the opposite side of the House who said we ought not to mix up with this Bill the question of women suffrage. I think we should discuss this Bill on its merits, and not in reference to future questions of legislative reform. With another part of the hon. Member's speech I also heartily agree—namely, that this Bill is not intended to be a complete and final Bill with regard to all manner of employments. This Bill is only intended to deal with a certain description of employments. It is not a Bill which is intended to deal with every class of employment. But this I am bound to say, that there is this new principle involved in it which no doubt the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary will use as an objection to it—namely, that while in most of our coercive legislation in the past we have dealt with those persons employed in production, in this Bill we deal with those who are employed in distribution. But this Bill is divided into two parts; and I hope the House, if it cannot agree with that part of it affecting women labour, will, at all events, agree with that part of it which makes effective the measure introduced by the right hon. Member for the London University (Sir John Lubbock) a few years ago. I hope the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary will take this matter into his serious consideration, and as the House a few years ago definitely decided by a large majority that these young persons in shops should be protected, that he will now accept the means proposed by my hon. Friend behind me (Mr. Provand) to make that proposal really ctive; and as regards the latter part of the Bill, which, in my mind, in one way more or less extends the principle of interference with women going to shops for the first time, I hope he will also assent to that principle as well. I am not going to trouble the House with the particulars which have been already given in reference to the absolute necessity there is for further legislation in respect to this matter. But there is one great advantage which this Bill has over others which have been brought before us, namely, its considerable elasticity. The great objection to the Bill introduced by the right hon. Baronet behind the Shop Hours Bill—was that it fixed a fixed closing hour for every day in the week.

R. JOHN LUBBOCK: That was the Shop Hours Bill; it was the voluntary Closing Bill.

R. S. BUXTON: Yes. It was moved by hon. Members on the 2nd that it provided that there should be fixed hours for closing instead of leaving to the different districts a certain amount of elasticity in working it out. This Bill provides the maximum number of hours in a week should be 74. The hon. Member for Wigan said there had been a great deal of exaggeration in regard to the number of hours worked by women in shops; but I think he will agree that 74 hours a week is sufficient, and no further hours than that can be required. These 74 hours can be spread over the week in the way best suited to the particular trades and particular localities; therefore, the argument that it is too hard-and-fast a rule cannot be urged against this Bill. The hon. Member for Wigan said we should be very careful in respect to this matter, because we might injure the trades of shops; I think that was completely answered by the very admirable speech of the hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow when he pointed out that, after all, there is no foreign competition in contention with this matter. It seems to me that the great advantage of this Bill will be that it will take a step further in the right direction; that it will see that the Act of a few years ago in reference to these young persons, is properly carried out; and be a first step in further restriction in regard to the hours of those employed in shops. I think it is perfectly clear, from what I have heard from previous speakers, that the bulk of the women themselves are in favour of this proposal. No doubt the Home Secretary will use the argument which he used over and over again when we were discussing the Factory Acts—namely, that he is not prepared to take the responsibility on his shoulders; that his Inspectors were not prepared to undertake such labour as this. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary has a very considerable number of Inspectors to carry out the present Factory and Workshops Act. Last year we put aside from the Home Office a great deal of the responsibility in reference to the workshops, in regard to sanitary and other conditions, and I say that to add this particular duty to those already existing will not be throwing too heavy a burden upon him, and I believe it will be carried out with considerable ease. I firmly believe, also, that the employers themselves will be very glad of legislation of this sort, as my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow has said. I think voluntary closing may be possible in certain country districts and small towns, but it is impossible in very large towns and large cities; whereas, if the employers themselves were on terms of equality with regard to hours of closing, they would gladly carry out such an Act as this.

*(2.50.) VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Lancashire, N.E., Darwen): I had the honour of being a member of the Grand Committee which dealt very closely with the Factory Acts last Session. I do not propose to support the Amendment, as I cannot understand why we should mix this question up with so intricate a matter as women suffrage, which divides this House, not merely by Party lines, but into fragments. The matter on which I propose to make a few remarks is with respect to the clause which includes women in the purview of this Bill. I fully admit that it is very possibly, and very probably, is the case, that there are many women employed in shops who live a life of great hardship, which we should all desire to mitigate as far as we can ; and I cannot say that it would be contrary to the spirit of former legislation to do so, because with the Factory Acts staring us in the face—in which this House and Parliament has agreed to limit the hours of labour of adult women in factories—there is no reason why we should not extend that principle to the limiting of their labour in shops. But I have had representations made to me, not only last year, but this, on behalf of the women themselves, who are unwilling that such legislation should be passed. And the reason they allege—rightly or wrongly—and I am far from pretending that I have sufficient knowledge to pronounce upon it—but the reason they allege is that if the hours are limited, in many cases it will be the custom of owners and shop proprietors to dispense with women labour altogether, and employ none but men. Now, in my judgment, and, I think, in the judgment of the House, it would be better that these women should work, and work too hard, than not work at all ; it would be better they should earn wages—even that they should endure a great deal of hardship—than that they and their families should be deprived of this money, which goes to keep the house over them, and to keep themselves and their families. And there is no one who was present at the Debates of the Grand Committee last year but will bear me out when I say that this matter is a very important one. There was a speech delivered by an hon. Gentleman in the Grand Committee which to me let in a flood of light upon this question. The hon. Member for Bethnal Green, whom I do not see in his place at this moment, speaking with respect to women labour—not in regard to shops, but in regard to women labour in the chain-making districts of Staffordshire—urged as one of the reasons why the hours should be limited that, even if it led to the cessation of women labour altogether, it would raise the wages of the men. It was not cynically said ; he believed it would be an advantage to the community at large even if women did not work at all, if the wages of the men could be raised. I say that is a principle we cannot assent to, and have no right to assent to. These women are given by Providence powers for work and earning money, and they have every right to use them, and we have no right to restrain them from earning what they can for the common good. I believe that is the view of the hon. Member for Bethnal Green and the hon. Member for Poplar. I believe the hon. Member for Poplar would be only too glad if he could have stopped women's work altogether.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON : No, no.

*VISCOUNT CRANBORNE : Well, at any rate he is in favour of the restriction of their hours of labour, and he would be inclined to restrict the hours of labour of men as well as women. I do not at all agree with the arguments applied to the matter of the restraint of the hours of labour used by hon. Members opposite, and therefore I cannot support this Bill at the present stage. But no doubt the matter is full of interest, and it would be a public benefit if some method could be devised whereby in many hard cases of over-work on the part of these unfortunate women some remedy could be applied ; and therefore I confess that I welcome the Motion which has been put upon the Paper in the name of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London, that this matter should be referred to a Select Committee. I have no fear of the result of the Select Committee. I believe the result of the Select Committee would show the essential difficulty of dealing with this subject, but it might be fruitful in some suggestion which might benefit these unfortunate women.

*(34.) MR. THOMAS HENRY BOLTON (St. Pancras, N.) : I hardly like to give a silent vote upon this Bill as I have some difficulty in dealing with it. As the noble Lord has said the subject is full of interest, and is one appealing very strongly to our sympathies. I do not suppose anyone suggests that the legislation in reference to young persons should be repealed. I believe the general feeling is that this legislation should be re-considered, with the view of making it practically effective and if the proposition of the right hon Gentleman the Member for the University of London were carried out, and the Bill referred to a Select Committee, that Committee would no doubt primarily turn their attention to the legislation with reference to young persons, as to how in any way it could be strengthened so as to give full effect to it. But the Bill presents very serious difficulties in connection with the limitation of the hours of labour of women employed in shops. Of course, we all sympathise very much with these women, who, in many cases, are not very strong in health, who labour very many hours in very tedious employment in shops. But how far we are justified in prohibiting the employment of women—who have just as much right to be employed as men—beyond a certain period of time, and placing them to that extent at a disadvantage with men, is another and a much more serious question. I doubt very much whether there has been any strong expression of opinion by any large number of women with reference to this matter; and no legislation of this kind could be justified, much less enforced, unless there were a very strong popular feeling behind it. This Bill proposes not only to prohibit the employment of women in shops, but "about" shops—"in and about shops." I do not know what is meant exactly by that word "about," but I think that expression has a very extensive, and may have a very sweeping effect. The Bill defines a shop. It includes a retail as well as a wholesale shop, a market stall, a warehouse, and licensed public-house, and refreshment house of any kind. There may be very good reasons for limiting the hours of labour, if practicable, in factories and wholesale shops; but when you come to carry that still further to retail shops and places where a few persons are employed, many of them with the members of the family in the same house, I think you are making a proposition of extreme difficulty. Many of these employments are employments that are not continuous during the whole day; they are intermittent. Take, for instance, the case of refreshment houses, where women are largely employed. There is a press of business in the middle of the day in certain quarters of the City, and after that there is comparatively very little to be done. In the West-End they are not so busy in the early part of the day, but very busy in the later part of the day. Again, in the suburban shops there are periods in the day when they are busy, and when almost all the business is done. But if you, without any qualification, apply to those shops a sweeping law of this kind, it will be a strong thing. Again, Sir, there are many highly-paid women in West-End shops who are obliged, at certain seasons of the year, to work almost night and day. For the remainder of the year they have comparatively little to do. Is it desirable that they should be interfered with? I have no particular hesitation in dealing with the large places of business; but I desire to say a word in favour of that numerous class of struggling shopkeepers whose business will not admit of them keeping a large and qualified staff of assistants. I feel, as strongly as anybody can do, against the over-work in shops, but I am not prepared to go in advance of public opinion. I think the Bill should be read a second time, as most of us agree with a portion of it, and should go to a Committee; but it should go free from any influence or sanction on the part of this House. The Committee can take evidence, and I hope that some practical result will be the outcome of its labours.

*(3.15.) MR. J. R. KELLY (Camberwell, N.): In the absence of any sufficient indication of opinion on the part of the large section of the community more immediately concerned, I do not think the Government can, or ought, to support this Bill. What do the shop girls and the small shopkeepers think about it? That is what we want to know. As regards the Amendment upon the Paper, I was certainly astonished it should have found its way there; but I confess I was astounded that it should have been moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Stockport. It is a women's suffrage Amendment, and what do the few widows and scatter-brained spinsters, who are ratepayers, know of the wishes of tens of thousands of girls in humble life? How are they to know them? I was astounded to find the names of the hon. Members for Stockport, St. Helen's, and the Accrington Division of Lancashire on the back of the Bill. I should like to know what the small shopkeepers in their constituencies have to say to it. I should also like to know what the small shopkeepers all over England will have to say to it? The hon. Member for Peckham said—"We must compel the shopkeepers to treat their assistants with humanity." What does this involve, but a wholly unjustifiable charge against all who keep shop-assistants? Now, Sir, I should like to say that I have gone into hundreds of shops for the purpose of ascertaining whether they were in favour of early closing, and I found that it is not the shopkeepers who are to blame for the shops being kept open late, but the public who will not shop early. Induce the public to shop early, and there will be no necessity whatever for this Bill. Sir, the hon. Member for Peckham made use of an argument respecting the profits of shopkeepers, which I think he ought not to have employed, for it was practically that this House ought not to refuse to pass the Bill because those profits would be diminished. What does this House care about the profits of shopkeepers? In the suburbs of London, as I can tell him, there are very few shopkeepers who employ more than one assistant, and generally she has some claim upon them—either because she is a family connection, or for some other reason, and I know she is not treated as a servant would be treated by his master, but really as a member of his family. Moreover, I can say that, so far from making enormous fortunes, 999 out of every 1,000 shopkeepers find it a very difficult thing to live, and to make both ends meet. Sir, some astonishment has been expressed to my knowledge, as to why some servants are included in this Bill. If hon. Members will turn to the Definition Clause, they will find that the Bill will include all the cases of hotels. This Bill is so recklessly drawn that the kitchenmaids, and the chambermaids, after a certain number of hours will have to be turned into the street, until the time comes for them to return to go to bed. There is an invitation to the employers to do that, for the person must not be in or about a shop, or in or about an hotel, and the hotelkeeper could not escape conviction and punishment under this Bill, unless he turned his poor girls into the street for some hours at night. There is great force in what has been said by the noble and learned Member for Darwen. Women feel that there is a disposition to drive them altogether from employment. They claim, and I think they have a right to claim, to be at liberty to sell their labour when they like, to whom they like, and for what they like. So far as the Shop Hours Regulation Act goes, we have no objection to its renewal. We will vote for its being made perpetual at any moment. If that Act was properly enforced—and there is no reason why it should not be—there would be ample protection given to those who ought to be protected. Women of 18 years and upwards do not desire to be treated as children, and they ought to be allowed to go into the market and make their own terms. If this Bill passed, the first effect would be to compel small tradesmen to consider whether they should have assistants or not, and this would mean that wages would be reduced. But, Sir, I say that until there has been some real demand on the part of those for whom it is sought to legislate, the House should not allow the Bill to pass. The shopkeepers, so far as we know, are not in favour of this Bill, though, of course, they would be only too glad to limit the hours during which they are now obliged to keep their shops open. But until we have some knowledge of the feelings of those who will be affected, I hope the House will not allow this Bill to be advanced.

MR. SYDNEY GEDGE: May I say that, with the permission of the House, I will withdraw my Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question again proposed.

(3.33.) MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): The hon. Member for Camberwell seemingly spent a great deal of time in making observations in regard to the feelings of shopkeepers in relation to this question.

MR. KELLY: My inquiries, which were conducted two or three years ago, had reference to the early closing movement.

MR. ESSLEMONT: Then the hon. Member introduced a matter which had no reference to this question at all, but something which occurred two or three years ago.

MR. KELLY: Will the hon. Member again pardon me? The subject was not introduced by me, but by one of the Members for Glasgow, who spoke at considerable length upon it.

MR. ESSLEMONT: Well, I am not aware of the reason of the interruption, because I do not think there is any difference between us. I look upon this subject with a very great amount of jealousy. I am as much in favour of liberty as the hon. Member for Camberwell can be. But the Home Secretary knows that when he was dealing with the Workshops Act a year ago, I took the liberty of expressing to the right hon. Gentleman that he should deal with the hours of shops. In the workshops there is more difficulty about the visitations of Inspectors than in the case of sale shops. In the case of ale shops nobody has found the slightest fault with the intrusion of Inspectors, who are always courteous and who often make valuable suggestions in regard to matters of importance. A good deal was said by the hon. Member for Camberwell with regard to young women, and I maintain that to allege that the class of women who receive employment at our counters are going out, as he insinuated in an infamous way, into the streets is a slander.

MR. KELLY: I beg pardon; I said nothing of the kind. What I said was, that if this Bill passed it would force hotel-keepers to drive their servants to the streets.

MR. ESSLEMONT: What does the hon. Member mean by driving them to the streets?

MR. KELLY: The hon. Member must not make me say that. It is not fair. I said precisely the opposite. I said one danger of this Bill was, that it was so recklessly drawn that if it were applied, as it must be, to domestic servants of hotels, I do not see how an hotel-keeper could help being summoned unless he drove his people out on the streets.

MR. ESSLEMONT: I shall not again give way to the interruption of the hon. Member; but I repeat, and I am in the recollection of the House, that the hon. Member emphasised it again and again, that the consequence of passing this Bill would be to drive those young women on to the streets. No other deduction could be made from the statement of the hon. Member for Camberwell. He has not withdrawn that statement.

MR. KELLY: Will the hon. Member permit me—(Cries of "Order!")—the hon. Member has challenged me—(Renewed cries of "Order!")

MR. SPEAKER: I hope the Debate will be continued without personal altercations between the two hon. Gentlemen.

MR. ESSLEMONT: I am the last Member of this House to engage in an altercation; but I must respectfully enter my protest against the hon. Member for Camberwell making any statement which would imply that the passing of this Bill would in any way undermine the virtue of the persons who are at present engaged in shops. I challenge the Member for Camberwell to bring any proof that young women in shops desire to work more than 74 hours a week. My objection to the Bill is that it contains Clause 10; but I shall vote for the Second Reading, in order that it may go before a Select Committee.

(3.48.) MR. C. GRAY (Maldon, Essex): I am not at present convinced that those of us who sympathise with the large class of young ladies who come up from the country and are employed in the large towns would not show that sympathy in a more marked way if they were to vote for the Second Reading, and relegate the question to a Committee, rather than if they refused a Second Reading, and relegated the question to a party that perhaps would be altogether beyond the control of this Parliament. I want this question to be looked into as speedily as possible. We have heard from the noble Lord the Member for Darwen and others, to whom this House always listens with respect, that if this Bill becomes law female labour would be hardly wanted in the labour market. But there is a good deal these ladies do which could not be done by the male sex, and there is not the slightest danger that the Bill, after going through a careful sifting in a Select Committee, would be put on the Statute Book in such a form as to prevent the employment of ladies in those businesses for which they are pre-eminently adapted. The hon. Member for Camberwell challenged us to produce any evidence from the ladies themselves as to this legislation being wanted. If he had seen, as I have seen on many occasions, the daughters of our farmers, in counties near London, coming up rosy and stalwart girls, and then, after a few months of these long hours, going back home with all the roses gone from their cheeks, he would say there was evidence which should not be treated lightly. In the interests of country girls I beg the House to read this Bill a second time.

*(3.53.) SIR JOHN LUBBOCK (London University: I congratulate the hon. Member for Glasgow on having secured the first place for his Bill on this occasion. I think the House will agree that this is one of the most important questions that could be brought before us, and it is remarkable that no single Member who has spoken has distinctly intimated his intention of going so far as to vote against the Second Reading. The hon. Member for Walworth criticised the Bill as not going far enough, but let us invite him to go with us as far as it goes. The hon. Member for Camberwell spoke of the evils of the proposal as affecting public-houses. He could not have been aware that it is at present the law, so far as young persons are concerned; and, therefore, if the evils he foresaw are likely to ensue, they would have occurred already, so far as young persons are concerned. The change now proposed, so far as public-houses are concerned, is, that the law, in regard to young persons, should be extended to women. The hon. Member said there was no demand for any legislation as regards shops, and challenged the Member for Peckham on the point. I am unable to say what is the opinion there, but in the neighbouring district of Dulwich, inquiry has shown that 95 per cent. of the shopkeepers in the poorest quarters were in favour of some legislation. This is not a question between class and class, nor between employer and employed; and having attended a large number of meetings in favour of legislation for shop hours, I say unhesitatingly that the shopkeepers are almost as anxious as the assistants for some such legislation. In Liverpool, a few years ago, a circular was sent out to 2,000 shopkeepers, and it was found that 1,770 were in favour of legislation, and only 200 against it. The editor of the Chemist and Druggist sent out a circular to the chemists of the country, and received answers from 2,000, showing that 1,330 of that number were in favour of legislation and only 600 against it. Until within the last few years the Early Closing Association themselves were opposed to all such legislation; but they were so struck by the evidence of the Committee, over which I had the honour to preside in 1886, that they took steps to ascertain the feelings of several thousand shopkeepers in the poorest districts of London, and found there was a very large majority of them who wished for some legislation. There has never yet been a meeting of shopkeepers in London or in any great city which has opposed legislation on the subject. One was called for the purpose, which I attended in the South of London, but it ended by passing a unanimous resolution in favour of our Half-Holiday Bill. I believe it would be popular with the shopkeepers if Her Majesty's Government could see their way to allow this Bill to be read a second time, and referred to a Select Committee. As regards the feeling of customers, it is important that the Trade Council of London, as well as those of Glasgow and elsewhere, have passed unanimous resolutions asking the House to deal with this evil. I had the honour, two or three years ago, of presenting a petition, signed by the Presidents of the College of Surgeons and Physicians, Sir J.

agnet, and most of the other leaders of the medical profession, and more than 300 medical men practising in London, calling attention to the fact that the health of shop-women was suffering terribly. I have also presented their petitions signed, amongst others, by the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of London, several other bishops, and several hundred clergymen, as well as by Cardinal Manning, and by a large portion of the Roman Catholic priests of London, and by many Dissenting ministers of the metropolis, praying this House to pass some legislation, because, at present, small shopkeepers and their assistants have no opportunity or time for religious offices. The evidence we had before us in Committee was very strong, to the effect that work-shops was often more exhausting than even in factories. I think, however, the noble Lord the Member for Darwen made a very sensible speech on this subject, and I believe that the House would act wisely and prudently if it were to refer this matter to a Select Committee, which would take evidence, and I, for one, should be glad, to a certain extent, to suspend my judgment as to the proposal to extend this present Act to women. At the same time, I feel that the necessity for some interference is so great that I hope the House will refer the Bill, in order that we may examine the matter and take evidence. The second main point is the question of the appointment of Inspectors to carry out the provisions of the Shop Hours Regulation Act of 1886. That Act has done a great amount of good, it has done much to diminish the long hours of labour for boys and girls, but I never did think it would entirely meet that great evil. I should like the Committee to have power to deal with that point also. We are told that a whole army of Inspectors will be necessary, and thousands of pounds will have to be spent on them, but I do not think so at all. I believe that a much smaller measure than that suggested opposite might effect the whole object. Only yesterday, in the evidence of the Licensed Victuallers before the Committee on the Hours of

Labour, it was said that the hours of barmaids were very much exaggerated, they were not 100, but only 81 a week; surely that is a great deal too much. When the Early Closing Association hears of a case of long hours, there is great difficulty in getting the evidence in a form they can take into a Court of Law; the boy or girl, and the parents also, are reluctant to offer testimony, because it means unpleasantness between them and the employer. But if they could go to the Inspector quietly, and he could then go to the employer and say that he had reason to believe that young persons were employed there longer than was authorised by law, that would often lead to the remedying of the state of affairs. The number of prosecutions under the Act is no measure of the good it has done, because in many cases the employer shortens the hours when his attention is called to the matter. If, however, a few Inspectors were appointed, the Early Closing Association might go to one of them and say, "We have reliable evidence that the Act is not being complied with in such and such an establishment, will you inquire into the matter?" The Inspector would inquire for himself, and there would be nothing more invidious than in the case of the Factory Acts. I should propose, therefore, with the consent of my hon. Friend, if the Bill be read a second time, to move that it be referred to a Select Committee. If we do that, it will be a step which will be heartily supported by the vast majority of shopkeepers in the country. No hon. Member has expressed any doubt that thousands and thousands of shop assistants and small shopkeepers are being employed for 80 to 90 hours a week, and that is incompatible with maintaining the health of the population. Surely, this House, when the facts are brought before it, will make an effort to alter the state of things; they will not put this Bill on one side and say, We will not allow it to be inquired into. I would implore the House and the Government to let the Bill be read a second time and referred to a Select Committee: in that case the House will earn the gratitude of thousands of our countrymen and women, and have passed a piece of legislation which will be most enduring and beneficent in its effects.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): This is one of those measures in which the Government does not think necessary to intervene between the Mover and the House, and in the few observations I am about to make I am stating my own opinion, and not the opinion of the Government. As an individual Member of the House, such opinions as I have been able to form from the materials before me are certainly not favourable to the Bill. I quite agree that the hours of labour have been reduced in factories and workshops, and the argument is, why not go a step further and reduce the hours in shops? Because if they did that, some philanthropist would come forward and say, why not reduce the hours of labour in private houses? You deal here with the labours of women in a way in which you have not dealt with it in the Factory Acts. You had a general rule for the limitation of hours, but that was subject to many exceptions, and you introduced a provision allowing overtime in cases of pressure of work, and other cases. No shop assistant or shopkeeper is allowed by this Bill the slightest latitude in cases of emergency, such as are provided in the Factory Acts. In those Acts there are exceptional cases of overtime, such as the case of the Jews, which are dealt with. I belong to the exploded school of Individualism, which the hon. Member for Peckham derided. I am still old-fashioned enough to think that those who desire to shorten the hours of labour of adult persons, male or female, ought to make out an overwhelming case in their favour. I should be extremely sorry if the House were to adopt a slipshod mode of procedure, and say, We have restricted labour in one direction, and we are going to do it in every other. The only ground I have heard urged in favour of this Bill is the medical ground. It was said that the hours worked by women in shops were so injurious that the House ought to interfere on the ground of health. I cannot contradict that on my own personal knowledge, but in such documents as I have access to there is no evidence to support that view. In the Report of the Committee of 1886, to which so much reference has been made, there is nothing to show that the hours of labour of young women in shops—hours long and excessive, if you please—produced such injurious effects on their health as to form a fitting basis and ground for legislation in this House. It is true there was one medical man, the retained official of the Early Closing Association, Dr. Abbott, cited by the Mover of the Bill, who appeared to think that the work in a shop was more fatiguing and put greater strain on the feminine system than did work in a factory. The machinery in the latter was always the same, while in the former the customers were numerous and their humours variable. I do not think that many medical men will agree that a woman spending ten hours before a spinning-jenny—a machine requiring extreme watchfulness, and in a constant go and whirl—is not worked harder than one who waited on those whose tastes in ribbons were difficult to satisfy. The independent doctors who were called before the Committee of 1886 confined their observations to the cases of growing girls between the ages of 15 and 21—"young people" said one, "girls under 18" said another. They were the people in whose cases arose physical injury in consequence of the long hours kept in many of the shops of the country. I cannot find any evidence in regard to adult women. I applied to the Registrar General, and asked him whether he could throw any light on the question, and whether the mortality of shop assistants was higher than that of other classes of the population, and the information I received was, that no material exists for making any positive statement on the subject. If anybody asserts that shop women suffer in excess of other women, and have shorter lives, I should like to know the basis on which they found the assertion. According to my evidence it is mere supposition. If hon. Members will turn to

The last Report of the Registrar General you will find, it is true, no statistics relating to women, but the shopkeepers and the men employed as assistants are lumped together, and they have a lower mortality than any other occupations. Therefore the medical ground, which, so far as I know, is the only ground for supporting this legislation—exceptional, though not unprecedented—is not given. That it is an interference with the labour of adult men and women it is impossible to deny. I do not feel, I confess, as to what extent this Bill, if passed, will interfere with the intimate and proper employment of men, but I feel that it would tend to largely displace women from those classes of labour which they now occupy. There are shops in which you cannot dispense with the women assistants, but there are many shops, warehouses, markets, stalls, public-houses, and refreshment houses where you might well dispense with their services altogether; and I feel that in such cases they would be largely displaced by men, and mainly by foreigners. The hon. Member for Poplar, who knows the factory legislation and its benefit to this country, will at once see the embarrassment of the case if a factory Inspector had to decide when a young woman, employed, say, at an hotel, was at work. Is she at work when she is dawdling about waiting for a bell to ring? That would always arise when you are dealing with intermittent and non-continuous employment.

MR. S. BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Chair): We, on this side, are agreed that the Bill should go to a Select Committee, in order that these points could there be dealt with.

MR. MATTHEWS: I cannot help thinking that the Bill will seriously interfere with trade, and for that I have not heard a sufficient reason advanced. I do not know whether the House has noticed the fact that the figures quoted are from our friend the Early Closing Association, lived in a new cause. This House rejected the Early Closing Bill by a majority of three to one; but in a speech made earlier in the day by the hon.

Member for the Tradeston Division it was frankly admitted and avowed that this is an Early Closing Bill, the object of which is to bring about the simultaneous closing at an early hour of all the shops in the country. I do not know if hon. Members have altered their minds on that point; I have not, and should be prepared to vote against early closing, as on previous occasions. I suppose that no one would suggest that a small shopkeeper should have one assistant to attend during the earlier hours of business and another to attend during the later hours. We all know the conditions under which the small shops are kept open; if they were not, the customers would be discontented. Therefore, you must either have discontent or the shift system. Those Leviathan establishments against which the hon. Member for Peckham directed what I must think were valedictory sarcasms—on the undue wealth which was to be squeezed out of them—will not be touched by this Bill. Take Marshall and Snelgrove's, and those great establishments, they are not open twelve hours in a day; they do not begin till 10, and are all shut up at 7. The persons who would be affected are the small struggling tradesmen in the suburbs, who painfully works to gain a slight livelihood out of the business done with his poor customers in the early hours of the morning before they go to work, and in the late hours of the evening when they come back. I have seen statements by working men as to how impossible it would be for them to get home, have their supper, and get their shopping done before closing time if an Early Closing Bill were passed. One word I must say on the question of the machinery of the Bill. Again, my hon. Friend the Member for Peckham welcomes the idea of an army of Inspectors, and hundreds of thousands of pounds being spent upon the working of the Bill. I would ask the House to consider seriously, from the taxpayers' point of view, what would be the pecuniary result of a measure which must necessarily apply to every petty huckster's shop, warehouse, stall, and market.

throughout the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. And, speaking of Ireland, I must say that I am sorry the Members for Ireland have not raised their voice in the course of this Debate, as I am sure I know very little about the retail shop trade in Ireland, or of the conditions under which it is carried on; and, therefore, in the absence of the hon. Members who represent Ireland, I am unable to say how the measure would affect that part of the country. If this Bill were passed, every one of the shops I have mentioned would have to be visited by Inspectors appointed and controlled by the Government, and this, I believe, to be impracticable. Again, let me refer to the interesting speech of the hon. Member for the Tradeston Division of Glasgow, who, I am sorry to see, has left his place. He told us, as the Chairman of a large Association that is active in the matter of early closing, of a prosecution instituted against the employers of a young boy of 14 years having failed. Why did it fail? Because he said it was very difficult to get a lad so circumstanced to give evidence against his employer, as he did not wish to lose his situation. That is the great difficulty. Do you think the Inspector under this Bill would have any magic wand which would compel women to give evidence? Those are the very difficulties we have to deal with under the Factory Act, and you cannot suppose it easier for an Inspector to detect cases of over-work in shops than it would be under the present Factory Act. I believe that unless a Factory Inspector remained on the premises all day it would be impossible for him to detect whether, in particular cases, the prescribed number of hours had been exceeded or not; so that in that respect the Bill would be only a failure, and I should be sorry to see it passed. I would most strenuously urge upon the House not to throw upon a Government Department such a task, as I believe no Government Department would be equal to the burden. When it is said that these Inspectors would not be more annoying to the shopkeeper than they are to the owner of a factory, I confess I cannot accept the suggestion, nor do I see the truth of the observation. Who is the Inspector to pursue his inquiry? When is he to enter the shop? During the business hours, when the shop is open to customers? Imagine what would be the effect on the customer if an Inspector came in during business hours, called away young women engaged behind counters, and proceeded to enter upon inquiries as to the hours of employment. Is it suggested that that would not be an annoyance; that it would not be highly resented both by the shopkeeper and the customer? All these things seem to me not to have been very much considered by the framers of the Bill, and they seem to me to add to the matter considerable difficulty. These are grounds which incline me personally to vote against the Second Reading of this Bill; but, on the other hand, if the House is of opinion that this is a subject upon which inquiry can throw useful light, I should be very sorry to oppose that inquiry. It seems to me immaterial whether we read the Bill a second time and refer it to a Select Committee, or whether the Bill is withdrawn and we appoint a Hybrid Committee to inquire into the subject. I hope the inquiry may be useful; I am sure it will be interesting; and I, for one, would not be disposed personally to resist inquiry either by a Select Committee or by a Hybrid Committee. But, while consenting to such a course, I must, however, carefully guard both myself and the Government from any suggestion that we are assenting to the principle, and still less to the details, of the Bill before the House. When the Inquiry of 1886 took place nobody proposed at that time to go into these provisions, and it would, in my opinion, be most rash on the part of the House of Commons to embark on this legislation without the fullest inquiry being made in regard to those new provisions, as they would affect every part of the Kingdom. The inquiry would be an experiment, and an interesting one, I am sure. The result may possibly change the feeling, both on the part of shop assistants and shopkeepers, but, certainly, until I am convinced by the results of an inquiry of that sort, I st decline to support the Bill, and I reserve my consent either to its principles or to its details.

4.35.) MR. WALTER S. B. LAREN (Cheshire, Crewe) : I rise nowe that this Bill be read a seconde this day six months. I confess I very strongly upon this Bill myself, but, of course, for my part, if it been limited to young persons of or even 21 years of age, I should have opposed the Second Reading. would, in my opinion, be most unwise to embark on legislation of this kind without the very fullest inquiry. stened upon this point with great sure to the speech of the Home Secretary, and agree with him that if pass the Second Reading, and if, by econd Reading, we are to affirm principle of the Bill; we should be arking upon a course of legislation very serious character. But a nd Reading would affirm the ciple of it, which principle is this, women should not work more than a certain number of hours ; to pass the Second Reading without inquiry into that prin- , without ascertaining at all ther it would be a good thing do or the reverse, would, I end, be putting the cart before the e. By all means let the Bill be sted, and let the inquiry be made. have already got a Royal Commis- sitting upon this very question. have a Royal Commission sitting on the Labour Question, and that al Commission is about to appoint lady Sub-Commissioners to deal this very branch of the Labour siton ; and, under those circum- es, it would be a most ridiculous z to ask the House, while that mission is sitting, and when it is t to appoint lady Sub-Commis- rs, to forestall the judgment of the missioners. The speech of the Member for Aberdeen was practi- a speech in favour of the general closing movement. Very little in speech of the right hon. Baronet Member for London University was ed to the principle of this Bill. was directed principally to early ng. There is a great deal to said for general early closing ;

but the early closing movement applies to men and women alike, and it is therefore free from the strongest objection which can be urged against this Bill—namely, that if it became law it would exclude from employment a very large number of women. The hon. Member for Aberdeen argued that excessive hours should not prevail anywhere, and the right hon. Baronet the Member for London University spoke almost entirely about the necessity for early closing legislation ; but let it be borne in mind that if they pass this Bill they do not ensure early closing at all. It simply, in other words, means this : that, in the competition amongst shops, those shops that employ men only can keep open as long as they like, and get all the late customers, which would be so valuable to them ; while those employing women would have to close early, because it would not be worth while to keep their shops open when, say, two-thirds of their employées, who would be women, had gone home. This would give a great advantage to any establishment that employed only men. There is a desire upon the part of small shopkeepers to keep open longer than this Bill would allow them, as they wish to accommodate late customers, and the direct result would be that these small shopkeepers would at once dismiss all their female hands, and dispense with female labour. I think, therefore, this is a very serious thing for the House to legislate upon, without having any evidence before it that this is desired by women. I admit that the hours are long—in a great many cases they are far too long—and I have no desire to see them so long as they are. I would support the Early Closing Bill, because it is an optional Bill with regard to where it may be put into force ; and, secondly, because it would not necessitate the discharge of women, but deals fairly with both sexes. I believe there is no evidence that women desire this ; there has been no effort made to obtain it. It might be obtained by a Committee, and I think it will be obtained by the Royal Commission. I dare say if you go to a number of shop assistants and ask them whether they prefer to work

74 hours to working 80 hours, they will say "Yes"; but if they were asked whether they preferred being paid for 74 hours to being paid for 80 hours they would say "No." Wages will be reduced as the hours are reduced, and I certainly think that one of the direct results of this Bill would be that the wages of women and girls would be reduced; and, for this simple reason, that I believe that a large number of women would be dismissed in consequence of the passing of the Bill. These women, being thrown out of their employment, would compete in the labour market with others, and the result would be that the wages would go down. Now we desire to raise the wages of women, and that cannot be done by increasing competition of women among themselves, but by removing all artificial restrictions to their employment. This Bill has not been brought before the women of the country; it has not been submitted to them, and there are very few women in the country that have the slightest idea that it is before Parliament; therefore, you are asked to deal with the liberty of women to sell their labour in open market, without these women having been consulted. Not a Member of this House has authority for saying that he knows the women of this country are in favour of this measure. This is a principle of legislation I entirely disapprove of, and it is not the way in which Bills dealing with labour should be submitted to this House. This is not the way in which similar questions affecting other persons have been approached by the House. We had the opinion of the miners of the country taken for and against the Eight Hours Bill affecting the miners' hours of labour. I do not know, and the House does not know, the opinion of women upon this subject; yet the House is invited to legislate in entire ignorance of their views. I can only suppose that the reason is that the House has always classified women and children together; but I think we are not entitled to interfere with the working of women unless we know that it is the strong desire of the women of the country that we should do so. I put down an Amendment upon the Paper which was moved in my absence, and which has been withdrawn; but I desire to say that it is my opinion it would not be desirable to further control the hours of female labour until we have the views of women expressed by the election of Members to this House. If there were some other equally efficacious means of ascertaining their opinion, it might be another matter. During the passing of the Mines Regulation Act the House was invited to prevent women working at the pits' brow, and they declined to do so. In the Factory and Workshops Act the House was again asked to interfere in regard to the chainmakers, and the House again rejected the proposal; and therefore I ask the House to reject this Bill, and follow out the conduct they have adopted on two other occasions, as I believe this very important matter will not suffer by being left over for further inquiry, and until the House is satisfied by further inquiry, it would not be right to pass it into law.

MR. SPEAKER: I ask if any hon. Gentleman seconds it.

SIR J. C. COLOMB (Tower Hamlets): I will, Sir.

(5.45.) Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Walter M'Laren.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

(4.55.) MR. HENRY SETON-KARB (St. Helen's): I have listened with great attention to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, and to what I may call the humanity argument he advanced. It seems to me that what the right hon. Gentleman said was a very strong reason for the passing of the Second Reading of this Bill, and surely a Select Committee is the right tribunal to examine into these things. I have listened to a good many speeches upon this question; amongst others, I listened with some attention to the remarks of the hon. Member for Camberwell. I find myself unable to agree with the hon. Member in the argu-

agents he advanced against the Bill. The hon. Member said there was a very easy remedy, for shop assistants could readily go into domestic service, where they could get employment and secure a means of livelihood. I never heard a more extraordinary argument advanced. How could you say to one class of women, who were brought up to the shop system, go into domestic service, which is a wholly different sort of employment? I think very few people would employ as a domestic servant a person who had no training or that kind of work, but for work of totally different kind. Another objection of the hon. Member for Camberwell was that in regard to the application of the Bill to hotels. The hotel proprietors would have, I think he said, at some time in the evening, to turn all the servants working in the hotels out into the streets. It would be perfectly easy so to frame his Bill that it would not apply to barmaids and women serving in that capacity; and probably it was not intended to apply altogether to house work. But it seems to me that it would be perfectly easy so to frame it as to do away altogether with that objection. All these objections to some of the details could be easily remedied in going through Committee. The Home Secretary, the hon. Member who has just sat down, and the hon. Member for Poplar all used arguments founded on the statement that this Bill will reduce wages. Well, I cannot for the life of me see how the Bill will reduce wages; the amount of goods that purchasers are going to purchase in certain shops is still going to be purchased. The early closing movement to reduce the hours of labour has been organised by Associations without the authority of the people to whom these restrictions would apply. The result has been that some small shops have been infringing the restrictions just because there was no Parliamentary sanction given to those restrictions. The authority was not strong enough to enforce it. But if we pass legislation on the subject, it seems to me these objections will be done away with; and all these small shops will be obliged to comply with the restrictions, and customers will buy all the goods they were going to buy just the same. The only result will be that they will do it in a shorter time. The customers of all these shops will continue the same, the trade will continue as good, and therefore I see no reason whatever why, on that ground, wages should be reduced. It seems to me that the answer to the suggestion that this Bill, if passed, would throw a large number of women out of work is to be found in the fact that the greater part of this employment could only be performed by women. And with regard to large establishments, such as the Army and Navy Stores, and Marshall and Snelgrove's, it appears to me that this Bill will not apply to these establishments at all. It will chiefly apply to the small shops in the small towns. I should not have intervened in this Debate at all except that my name happened to be on the back of the Bill, and that I am an ardent supporter of it, and I desired to answer one or two points which the hon. Member for Camberwell had started. I hope the House will pass the Second Reading of the Bill; and if we have a bad case, that can be ascertained before a Select Committee.

*(5.0.) MR. HENRY JOHN ROBY (Lancashire, S.E., Eccles) : I desire to say a few words in support of this Bill, partly on account of what has fallen from the hon. Member for Crewe, and partly because I am myself an employer of young women in a cotton factory. This Bill only proposes to lay down a certain number of hours in the week; and that would allow a considerable modification for the particular days in the week. I see no difficulty whatever in the proposal that, in order to make up for the extension of hours on some days, there should be some diminution on other days of the week. I cannot myself see that to restrict women in shops to 74 hours per week can possibly lead to throwing a large number of women out of employment. I do not think there is any ground for that. At the same time, it is no doubt a perfectly reasonable thing that we should be well on our guard against it. In this matter of the limitation of the hours of employment, I am not inclined to go simply on one general rule, or on logical grounds to apply the restriction where it would lead to inconvenience. In my opinion, it is a difficult subject, and a subject that ought to have progressive treatment. I am prepared to see Parliament interfere with more than one industrial trade, but I wish it done only gradually—I wish to see it done by taking certain employments at a time, and seeing how far it can be carried out with regard to these employments; and it ought not to be carried out at all unless the great majority of those employed are in favour of it. Then comes the question whether we should have a Select Committee first, and then propose a Bill; or whether we should take the Second Reading of this Bill, and then have a Select Committee. My own belief is that we should be more likely to get the evidence of the willingness or unwillingness of those concerned in those restrictions if we passed the Second Reading of the Bill, and had the Select Committee afterwards. That would be better than if we refused the Second Reading, thereby implying to the country that this matter is not worth consideration. On that account I shall vote heartily for the Second Reading, reserving to myself the power to act afterwards in accordance with the evidence produced, and after consideration of such Amendments as may be proposed.

*(5.6.) SIR CHARLES DALRYMPLE (Ipswich) : I rise to make a suggestion exactly opposite to that which has been made by the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down. I understood that the Secretary of State, while he did not approve of the Bill, favoured an inquiry by a Select Committee. I would suggest to the promoters of the Bill whether the wiser course for them to adopt would not be to withdraw the Bill (cries of "No") on condition that they receive from Her Majesty's Government an undertaking to appoint a Select Committee to inquire into the subject. I make this suggestion, being favourable to the proposal for a Select Committee. I think it very possible, if hon. Gentlemen insist on going to a Division, that the Bill might be defeated, in which case they will lose everything.

(5.7.) MR. CHARLES FENWICK (Northumberland, Wansbeck) : I rise simply for the purpose of replying to a statement made by the hon. Member for Crewe, which I shall do in a sentence. His statement was to the effect that there was no demand made by those interested in this question for such a limitation of their hours as is proposed in the Bill of my hon. Friend below me. Perhaps the hon. Member for Crewe will allow that I have an opportunity of knowing, probably better than he has, that the opposite of his statement is the fact, and that there is a considerable demand on the part of those that would be affected by the provisions of this Bill, that some such diminution should be made in the hours of labour which they are now compelled to work; and only at the recent Trades Union Congress, held at Newcastle-on-Tyne, a resolution was submitted by the representative of the shop-assistants to this effect. It is perfectly true that that resolution was not submitted to the judgment of the Congress; but I think that, judging from the expressions of opinion which I had an opportunity of listening to at the Congress, there is not the slightest doubt that if the resolution had been submitted to the judgment of the Congress, it would have been passed by a very large majority indeed. The resolution was afterwards submitted to the judgment of the Parliamentary Committee of the Trades Union Congress—a Committee composed of gentlemen who take opposite views on the question as to the Parliamentary or legal limitation of hours of labour, and I am in a position to say that that resolution was endorsed unanimously by the members of the Parliamentary Committee ; and, therefore, it has the same sanction in the opinion of the organised trades of the country as if it had been endorsed by a large majority voting in the Congress itself; so that, therefore, the House will see that there has been an expression of opinion, at all events, from those interested in this subject. But my hon. Friend has gone further. He has said that as there is no demand on this subject, there can be no inquiry, and I think he has adopted a course which, if the House will follow him, would prevent the possibility of immediate inquiry on this subject, because we have no guarantee from the Government that if the Bill be withdrawn they will constitute that Committee which he says the House is anxious they should constitute. While I reserve to myself the right to take whatever course may seem wise and prudent to me with regard to the provisions of the Bill when it comes back again to the House from the Committee, without committing myself to the details of the Bill in any way, I believe it would be wise on the part of the House to allow the Second Reading of the Bill to be carried, and send the Bill to a Select Committee, so that we may have the proposals contained in the Bill fully and freely considered. Hence I shall have no hesitation in supporting the Second Reading of the Bill.

(5.10.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): Though I think it is not a question upon which the Government, as such, propose to offer advice to the House, I may perhaps be permitted to give my own view as to what would be expedient for the promoters of the Bill to do on the present occasion, and I think it is the view of hon. Members generally on both sides of the House. It appears to be the general opinion that there are sufficient precedents in our legislation for interfering with the labour of adult women to prevent it being a matter of principle to reject the Bill. I also think it is the general opinion that in some cases there may be a certain amount of undue length of employment during the week of women in shops and other places in large towns. But I do not think anybody could have listened to the Debate without also coming to the conclusion that the Bill before us is impracticable ; that it cannot be carried out ; that if we attempted to carry it out at all in the form in which the hon. Gentleman has introduced it, it would prove to be a wholly unworkable measure ; and that if it is possible to apply the hon. Gentleman's principle at all, it is not possible to apply it without the most careful preliminary consideration of all the difficulties surrounding a most difficult subject. Now, I must observe to the hon. Gentleman, that that being the view of a very large number of Gentlemen in the House, including my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary and others, he will, in a Division upon this Bill, have against him many persons not averse to legislation of this kind, if the necessity for such legislation can be shown, but altogether averse to committing the House of Commons to a scheme which they believe to be radically impracticable. Hon. Gentlemen opposite must be aware that if this Bill were carried against that large amount of opinion to which I have adverted, all that could then happen to it would be to refer it to a Select Committee, either to be rejected or knocked into some sort of shape very different from that which it now presents to the House, and its friends would be weakened by the opinion expressed by a very large section of the House of Commons that this Bill before us was not one that should be passed into law. The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down said he would vote for the Second Reading of the Bill, because he approved of its principle.

MR. FENWICK: Might I interrupt the right hon. Gentleman ? I did not say that I approved of the principle. I approve of inquiry, and reserve to myself liberty of action when the Report of that inquiry was submitted to the House. It is because the issue, as I understand it, clearly before the House at present is whether there shall or shall not be an inquiry into the subject that I propose to vote for the Second Reading.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Then I understand the hon. Gentleman does not even approve of the principle of the Bill?

MR. FENWICK; I did not say so.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: He does not commit himself to an approval of the principle of the Bill, but what he desires is an inquiry. What we are prepared to give is an inquiry; but what we are unwilling to give, and what I think many hon. Members in this House are unwilling to give, is the apparent adhesion of the House to a proposal which they do not think a workable proposal. I would therefore seriously suggest to the hon. Member and his friends that his object may be better carried out, or that he would get his end effected, with much less friction and with far more unanimity, if he would consent to withdraw the Bill, which even those who are going to vote for it do not commit themselves to approval of; and if he would consent to accept the offer made by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary at an early stage of this Debate, that this question should be referred to a Select Committee for critical examination.

*MR. A. D. PROVAND: I thank the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord for what he has said on this subject, and the Government for the statement that this is not to be a Party question. Nevertheless, I think we had better go to a Division. I stated, in moving the Second Reading of the Bill, that, for my own part, I was prepared to accept the Amendment placed upon the Paper by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for London University, and I am still prepared to do so. The Bill, when it goes before a Select Committee, will there be inquired into in any way they please. If they condemn it, why then we shall hear no more of it in this House; but if they approve of it in any form, it will then come back. Therefore I cannot accept the compromise which the First Lord has offered, and I think it better to take our chance in a Division.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.) : There is no unfairness in the course which the Government have taken. We do not think, so far as we are concerned, a Subsidiary Bill should be run by hon. Members and discussed by the House before the Bill of Her Majesty's Government.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.) : I fail to see any cogency in the argument of the right hon. Gentleman, or any agreement or connection between the Local Government Bill and this Bill. The House by an unanimous vote, and with the concurrence of the Government, passed the Second Reading of this measure. We have yet to see whether the Government Bill will command support. This Bill stands in a better position. It is the Bill of the whole House, and what we ask is whether the Government intend to allow this Bill to be blocked by their own supporters.

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.) : It is quite impossible for me to put down my Amendments until I see the print of the Local Government Bill. I am, therefore, obliged to ask hon. Members to defer the Bill for a few days longer.

MR. T. M. HEALY : We are quite willing to do that. What we complain of is the conduct of the Government.

ADJOURNMENT.

(5.43.) On the Motion for Adjournment:—

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (IRELAND) BILL.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I think we are entitled to complain of the extraordinary delay that has taken place in the circulation of the Irish Local Government Bill. Several days have passed since the Bill was read a first time, and we were led to expect it would be in our hands before this. There are rumours that the Bill will appear in a shape different from that in which it was presented to the House, and on that point perhaps the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, whom I see in his place, will give us some information. In regard to the Corporation of Belfast, there is standing for consideration on Friday next a Bill which proposes to give special powers in relation to a matter which is to be dealt with as a matter of general law by the Local Government Bill, and, therefore, it is absolutely necessary that the latter Bill should be circulated among Members to-morrow.

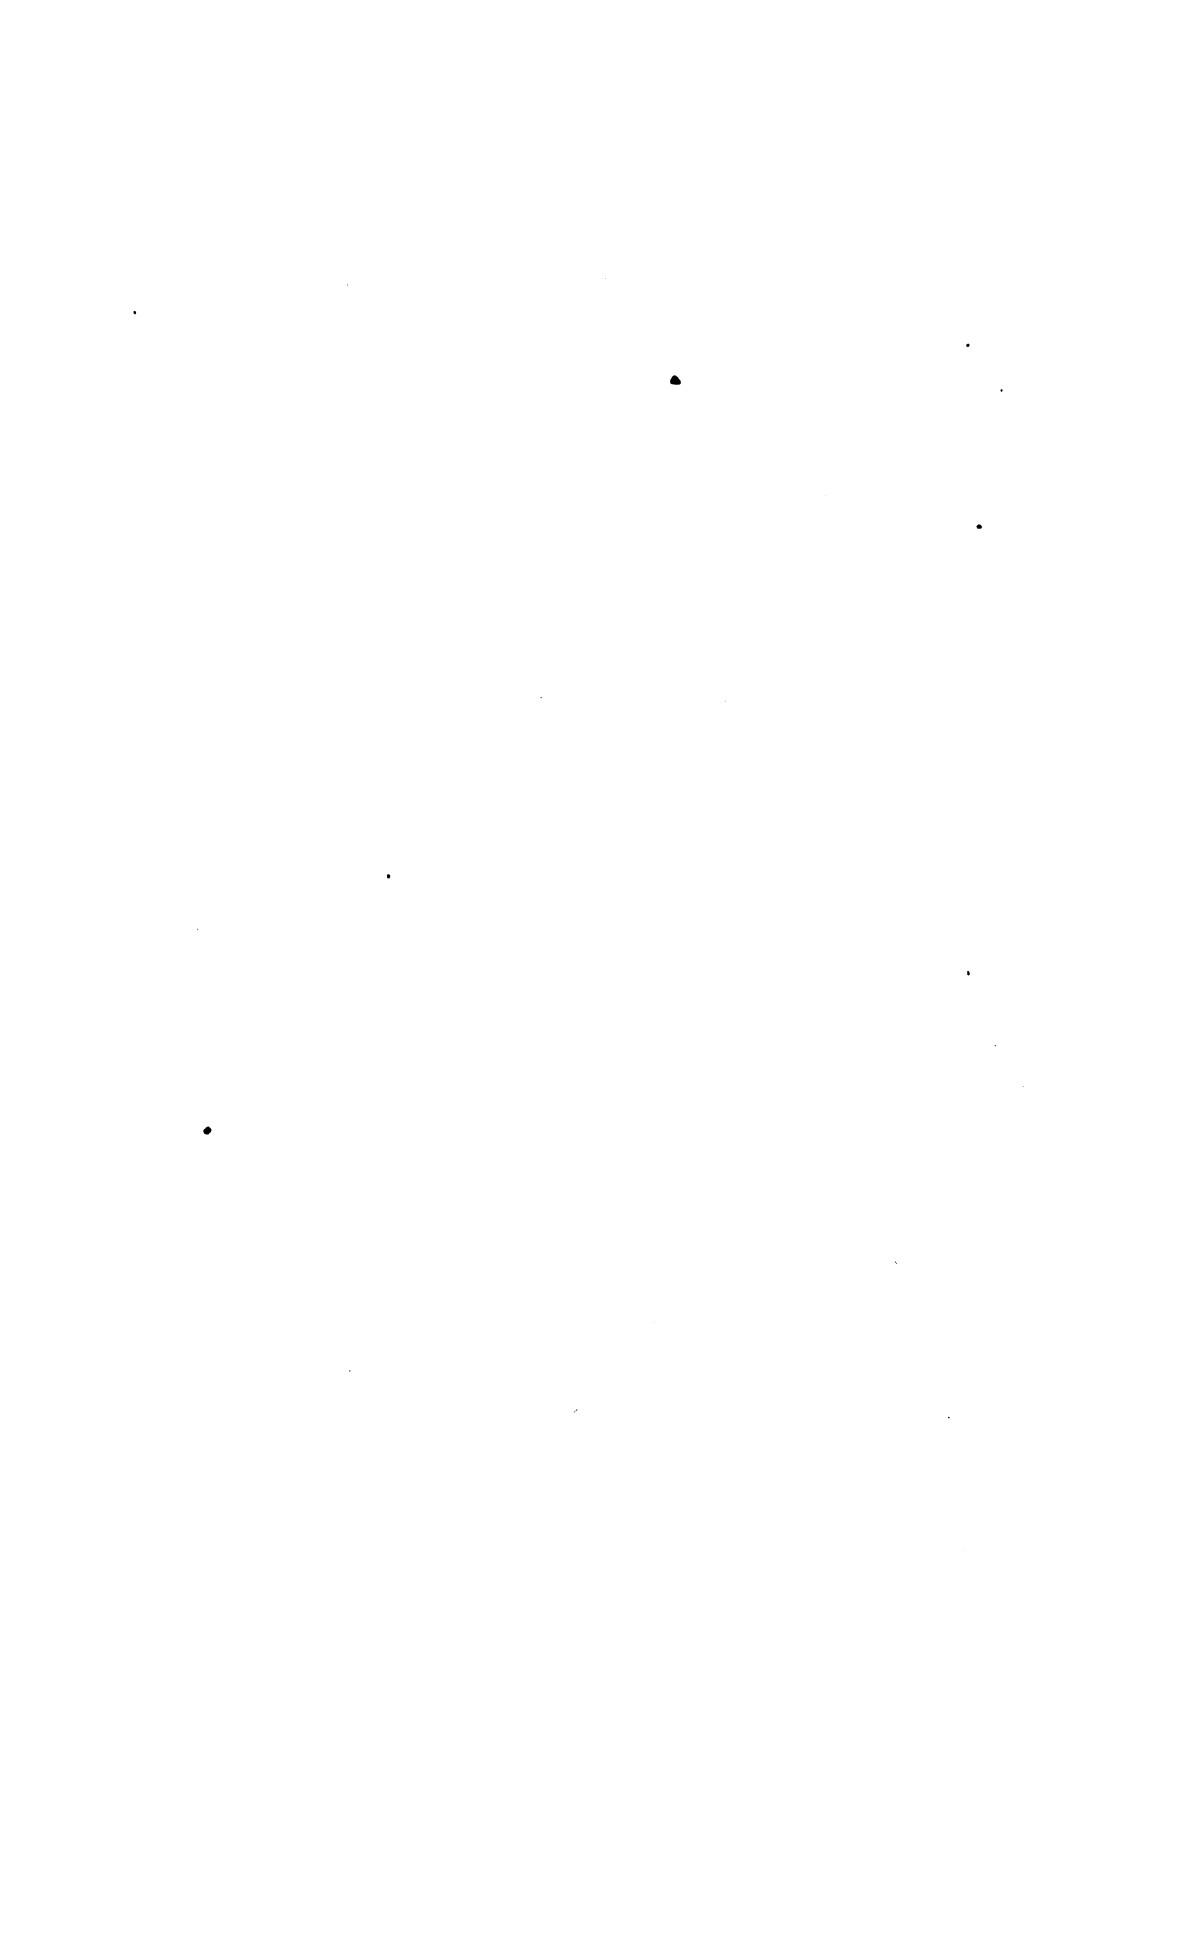

(5.45.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir MICHAEL HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I would strongly advise the hon. Member not to believe in the rumours to which he has alluded. As to the date when the Local Government Bill was to be circulated, if I remember rightly, the Leader of the House said he hoped it would be ready on Thursday.

MR. SEXTON: No; early in the week.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS BEACH: The last time my right hon. Friend gave an answer on the subject, I think Thursday was the date named; however, I will convey to my right hon. Friend what the hon. Member has said, and I am sure he will be glad to have the Bill circulated as soon as possible.

Motion agreed to.

L OF NORTHBROOK :
I beg to move that the e Governor General of nitted from the Schedule

I have not made any on the clauses of the gh I cannot say that I ree with those clauses, be-ught that it would save ips' time and trouble if I to the two points which ress upon your Lordships, it is not desirable to allow y of State to call the neral of India back upon

England, or that the eneral should absent himself for six months upon a ificate; and the same thing
t to the Commander-in-Lords, when the Bill was d tim; I gave to those of ups w o were then present which I had for wishing those alterations to be made in the Bill. They are very simple. I believe that all your Lordships will agree that India is a country where great and sudden dangers not unfrequently occur; and I suppose your Lordships would also agree that it might be very serious indeed if, when such a sudden danger occurred, the Governor General of India should be absent from India, and his place should be filled temporarily by some one who, however able, could not possibly carry the same weight as one who had been the Head of the Administration. I believe that the provisions of the Bill would require, when the Governor General was called home by the Secretary of State, or went home on sick leave, that the senior of the Governors of the two other Presidencies should take his place; and it does not always occur that either of the distinguished men who fill those places could have the same acquaintance with the affairs of India, or carry the same weight in the country, as one who had been selected for the office of Governor General. My Lords, for that reason I think it is very unadvisable to give the powers conferred by this Bill. When the Secretary of State for India moved the Second Reading of the Bill he gave some indication that the Governor General might be omitted from the Bill, upon further consideration; and when the Prime Minister, in answering the few remarks which I made the other night, gave the reasons which he thought made the Bill desirable, he rested his argument upon quite a different matter; he rested his argument upon the possibility that it might be very desirable that one of the Members of the Governor General's Council could be summoned home to England to confer with the Home Authorities. My Lords, I think that the observation made by the noble Marquess was very pertinent. I do not at all dispute that in certain circumstances it might be desirable to summon home on business one of the Members of the Governor General's Council in order to confer with the Secretary of State; and, therefore, I do not propose to move the omission of the power to call home on business from India the Members of the Governor General's Council. But the noble Marquess did not give any reasons, if my recollection serves me rightly, for the necessity of summoning home the Governor General of India. The Secretary of State did not give, either this Session or last Session, when the Bill was introduced, any reason, upon public grounds, why he thought it was desirable to summon the Governor General from India to this country; and the other day I asked him whether he could produce any correspondence which would show that this proposal (which is one of considerable importance, as I think all your Lordships will admit) had been communicated to the Government of India, and that the Government of India had had any opportunity of expressing an opinion upon changes which may very seriously affect the administration of affairs in that country. My Lords, in my opinion—I speak, perhaps, somewhat from the Indian point of view—but still, in my opinion, such legislation as this should not be introduced into this House, or in the other House of Parliament, excepting in very peculiar circumstances, unless the Government of India have had an opportunity of expressing their opinion upon it. There can be no reason at all in this case why the matter should not have been communicated to the Government of India, and an answer might well have been received between last Session and this. And, indeed, no urgency whatever has been alleged by the Secretary of State for introducing this Bill. Therefore, my Lords, I should very much prefer that the Secretary of State would drop this Bill altogether; but, as I do not suppose he will be prepared to take that course, I beg to move that the Governor General of India be omitted from the Schedule.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (The Viscount Cross): My Lords, I think your Lordships will see at once that, since this Bill was read a second time, the provisions in the first clause have been made rather stronger than they were in the original Bill. The Bill was never intended to enable the Government to call home any one of these persons except for special reasons; and, in order to show that it must be a very special reason, you have the safeguard of the approval of the Secretary of State in Council to begin with, and that of the Governor General in Council as well; and then you have the further safeguard, that these persons are only to be allowed to come home on public grounds, or upon a medical certificate, for a short time. But, my Lords, although the Government are of opinion that it is quite right that there should be some power that these persons may be allowed to come home in case of necessity; and although they are of opinion that the original provision in the old Act was perfectly right when the journey to and from India was so long; yet the fact of the journey being now so very much shortened materially alters the case as to the question of these great personages being allowed to come home. Because, not only would they come home in a very much shorter time, but, if anything should happen in India to require their immediate presence there, their return to India would, of course, be equally shortened. But, my Lords, I am, as Secretary of State, and I am quite sure all my colleagues are, always most anxious to listen to anything which falls from the noble Earl, considering the great position he has himself held in India, and the interest he has always taken in any matter relating to India since his return to your Lordships' House sitting here; and, therefore, I am quite willing to take into consideration what he has said. My Lords, when the Bill was before your Lordships' House the other day the noble Earl said what was perfectly true—that the Viceroy of India stood upon a sort of pinnacle that no one else could stand upon; that he was in a position totally different from that of any other officer in India. It is equally true that, if you want to consult on matters of very great importance with regard to general questions in India, it is possible to make use of one of the Members of the Governor General's Council, who would come home perfectly prepared to give you all the intelligence that the Viceroy could give. Therefore, my Lords, upon that particular point I am ious to meet the noble Earl so far I can; and, considering that the Viceroy stands entirely alone and quite distinct from all the other officers mentioned in the Bill, Her Majesty's Government will assent to the Amendment of the noble Earl. I cannot give him any hope that we will assent to the other Amendment which stands in his name, because I think the Commander-in-Chief stands on a totally different footing; but, considering the extreme importance of the Viceroy of India, and how he does stand out in a pinnacle above everybody else, we agree to the Amendment of the noble Earl in this matter. I may say, however, that the second clause will not amending in consequence, but it can be done by the Standing Committee; and so will the Schedule in another way; but, so far as this particular Amendment of the noble Earl is concerned, I am willing to agree to it. In order to make the Schedule right, it will be necessary to say "The members of the Council of the Governor General of India."

Amendment agreed to.

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK: My Lords, I now beg to move that the words "The Commander-in-Chief of Forces in India," be omitted from Schedule. The observations which have made upon the subject of the Governor General seem to me to apply, with almost equal force, to the office of Commander-in-Chief of the Forces. My Lords, India is a country in which, I said before, dangers occur suddenly, and military dangers occur with the greatest suddenness. I suppose many of your Lordships are old enough to recollect the time of the Mutiny. How long before the Mutiny took place was thought possible that such a thing could occur? And, my Lords, even of late we have had, within the last two or three years, constant outbreaks of hostilities of one kind or the other in India. So lately as last year we had a very sad event in Manipur, and it is not more than a week ago that we read from the papers that some hostilities had occurred in Burmah. Now, my Lords, I, myself, think that the Commander-in-Chief is an officer whose responsibility is so great in that country that he ought to take his five years' appointment for good or for bad, and not to return from India to this country during those five years. In case of the Commander-in-Chief being attacked with illness, if the illness was not very severe indeed, India possesses climates of every description; there is no difficulty in his obtaining change of climate in India at all; and I cannot conceive that, in the case of an illness so grave as to require his absence in England for six months, it would not be, in the public interest, desirable that the Commander-in-Chief should receive a successor to his appointment; and, being an officer of high military position, it does not seem to me that it would be likely in any way to interfere with his future career—other offices would be open to him which he could fill. That is with respect to his coming home on sick leave. It has not always been that the next senior officer (who, I suppose, is the person who would be appointed), would be an officer who would command the confidence of the Government here, or in India, to the same extent as would the Commander-in-Chief. In point of fact, if I were to ask the Secretary of State whether he could say that there is any officer now in India whom he would be inclined to appoint to be Commander-in-Chief in India, in the event of a vacancy, I doubt very much whether he would be able at this moment to name such an officer. That is a reason why I think that this officer also ought to retain his appointment, and not to leave India. Now, my Lords, as respects summoning home the Commander-in-Chief in India on business, I think there are considerable objections to it. If the Commander-in-Chief has to come home on business connected with the Army in England, by the provisions of the Bill the whole expense of his substitute and everything else would fall upon the revenues of India. Surely that is not fair! If the Secretary of State proposes to introduce clauses in the other House, putting that expense upon the Imperial revenues, well and good; but there is no such provision now in the Bill. My Lords, if the Commander-in-Chief is to come home on Indian business connected with Indian military affairs, I think it is not fair upon the Governor General in Council. There is no military business, in my opinion, in India—no military question in India—which is not essentially affected by political considerations ; and the effect of the Commander-in-Chief being summoned home on Indian military business to confer with the Government in this country (apart from the Governor General and the members of his Council) would be that the Governor General and the members of his Council would not be able, if they disagreed with the Commander-in-Chief, to represent to the Home Authorities the political views which they might hold, and which, if they could represent them, might very much modify the opinion of the Government upon important questions. I hold, therefore, that the Commander-in-Chief coming home to be consulted upon an Indian military question, apart from the Governor General, when the Governor General could not be represented, would not be fair or right to the Government in India. On those grounds therefore, my Lords, I beg to move that the Commander-in-Chief of the Forces in India be omitted from the schedule.

*THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY) : My Lords, I should be loth to sacrifice the discretion which we desire to obtain for the Secretary of State and the Viceroy in respect to this matter of the Commander-in-Chief coming home. The noble Lord seems to deal with the matter chiefly as an individual question as to what was fair to the Commander-in-Chief, and what was fair to the Viceroy. Those are important considerations; but there are public considerations of very much greater value. I do not base this provision chiefly, though I should to some extent, upon the question of a medical certificate. There is something to be said for the view of the noble Lord that, if the Commander-in-Chief is not well enough to continue in his work, he may be required to resign—though I think it is rather an inconvenient doctrine, and at variance with what is accepted in all other parts of the Indian Service at the present time. But I would venture to remind the noble Lord that the existing law in no way protects India from being left without her Commander-in-Chief. He may, at this moment, go to the Cape, and, for all I know, he may go up to Mashonaland ; that is within Indian limits ; and there is nothing to prevent his doing so. Therefore the protection is illusory, and I hardly think it is worth while to maintain it in this matter of medical certificate. But I acknowledge that it is not the question of medical certificate that is uppermost in my own mind. The noble Lord, at an earlier part of this conversation, freely admitted that consultation with the members of the Governor General's Council might be a matter of considerable value to the Government in England. But the Commander-in-Chief is one of the most important members of the Governor General's Council ; and the matters on which the English Government would wish to consult him are matters more deeply affecting the welfare and maintenance of the Empire than any other matters that could be conceived. The noble Lord speaks as though military questions were divided by a sharp line into two categories: those which concern the Army in England, and those which concern the Army in India. Does it not occur to him that there is a class of military questions which concern both Armies very closely—and those military questions in which not only the Army in India, but the whole strength of the Empire may be involved—with respect to which the main decisions have to be taken in India, though they must be taken in consonance with the views that are held at home ? Those questions have become much more important since the noble Lord was practically familiar with Indian Government. Since the year 1876 those questions have grown into vast importance. I will venture to say that no one who is familiar with the military questions of the day could put out of view the class of occasions on which it might be necessary for the English Army and the Indian Army to cooperate. My Lords, I can conceive of no question, or set of questions, upon which mature, and circumspect, and careful decision, taken in time before danger comes, by the English and by the Indian Government, is more vital to the interests of the Empire. I can conceive of no set of questions upon which all the light that can be thrown by the military knowledge and experience, both of those who rule in India and those who rule in England, is more required for guiding us into a right and wholesome path; and I will venture to say, speaking from my own personal experience,—for in these days these matters are not often absent from our consideration,—that, within no very great distance of time, it would have been a matter of the greatest possible satisfaction to myself, and to those with whom I act, if we could have had oral communication with the Commander-in-Chief in India. My Lords, I hope you will not ask me to develop that thesis. I think that most who hear me will see that it is capable of wide development, and that interests of a very considerable magnitude may hang upon the decision at which you arrive. I earnestly ask you not to take away this power, that we seek to obtain, from the Secretary of State and the Viceroy of India. There is no probability that they will use it lightly, use it without cause, use it for any frivolous reason. And, with respect to the last observations made by the noble Lord as to who is to pay the steamer fare of the Commander-in-Chief when coming home, if these matters are really important in the highest interests of the Empire, do not let us quarrel about which Treasury is to bear the cost of the travelling expenses. I think we are capable of coming to some arrangement upon that point. My Lords, I should, of course, repel at once the idea that the Commander-in-Chief would be often sent for. I believe it must necessarily be an occasion of very great rarity; but I can imagine, as I have said, cases in which it would be a matter of enormous value to our highest interests that we should send for him; and I cannot conceive that any real danger would arise from it. You have always two Commanders-in-Chief, chosen specially for their powers of governing large Armies in vast districts—the Commanders-in-Chief of Bombay and Madras; and either of those could surely hold, for the few necessary weeks, the office of acting Commander-in-Chief, while the actual tenant of the post was in England on consultation. If anything happened to him; if he was disabled; if he was killed; such a remedy would have to be taken; and nobody has ever yet suggested that any great danger lurked in that contingency. My Lords, without for a moment pretending (I desire to guard myself on that point) that such power would often be used, I say that the discretion of using it ought to be with the Government, and I hope your Lordships will not refuse it.

*THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, no doubt the mode in which the noble Marquess has approached this question is one which may make one hesitate upon this Amendment; because he has indicated that there are some tremendous occasions, to which he does not think it right, no doubt for public reasons, to allude, on which the presence of the Commander-in-Chief in this country is, in his opinion, of the very highest moment and importance. My Lords, not knowing what the circumstances are to which the noble Marquess refers, I cannot give my opinion upon them; but I have had myself some experience in the Office of Secretary of State for India, and certainly the military questions, which arose during the time I held that Office, were of so grave a nature that I can scarcely conceive that anything so grave can have arisen during the tenure of Office of the present Government. It never occurred to me, or to any of my Colleagues, that, in the circumstances in which we were then placed, it would for a moment have been desirable to have asked the Commander-in-Chief to come over to this country. I cannot allude further, any more than the noble Marquess could, to all the circumstances of the time; because, of course, one's opinion depends upon confidential information to which I had access, and to which it would be highly improper that I should allude in this House. But I still feel that,

although it would be impossible to deny the weight of the arguments used by the noble Marquess on the one side, there is very great weight indeed in what has been said by my noble Friend (Lord Northbrook) upon the other. The circumstances of India, as my noble Friend has pointed out, are wholly different from those to which we are accustomed in this country. Everyone knows that a small cloud in the distance will suddenly spread into a hurricane, and, before your Commander-in-Chief could get back from this country to India, his absence from the Indian Empire might be the cause of very serious disasters. My Lords, if I felt perfectly satisfied that it was only upon some extraordinary occasion that such a power as this would be used, I might regard it with more indifference; but your Lordships must remember what the working of clauses of this kind is. It is all very well to say that the consent of the Governor General in Council is required; but I do not believe that, if the Secretary of State and the Commander-in-Chief in India both desired that this power should be used, it would be possible for the Viceroy in Council to resist the demand; and what I should be afraid of is that this power would come to be used upon occasions not so grave as those which the noble Marquess has in his mind. Of course it is a balance of advantages and disadvantages. As I said the other night, I do not for a moment undervalue in the slightest degree—it would be childish to do so—the advantages of consultation with high officers. The whole question turns upon this: is it, upon the whole, more likely that the Public Service will suffer seriously by the Government not being able to bring over the Commander-in-Chief, or that the Empire of India may be endangered by the possible absence of the Commander-in-Chief at a crisis when his presence is greatly required? That is a matter upon which each person must form his own opinion. I, myself, for my own part, would greatly prefer that the law should rest as it is. With regard to sick leave, I think the natural conclusion from the noble Marquess's argument would be that the power of the Commander-in-Chief to go to the Cape ought to be abrogated. That, however, is a matter which I will not press further. Upon the whole, I must say that I remain of the same opinion as my noble Friend (Lord Northbrook).

LONDON FOG.

VISCOUNT MIDDLETON: My Lords, since my noble Friend the Prime Minister expressed his willingness to support the appointment of a Committee to inquire into this question, I have carefully considered the matter, and have taken counsel with those upon whose opinion I could rely; and I have come to the conclusion, rightly or wrongly, that no good or useful purpose is likely to be served if the Committee is to be restricted simply to Members of your Lordships' House. I say this for three reasons. In the first place, a Committee of your Lordships' House has already sat to inquire into this question, or into the kindred matter of the prevention of smoke, in the year 1887. Several distinguished Members of your Lordships' House served upon it; a Bill, founded upon the recommendations of the Committee, was subsequently introduced into the House: has been annually introduced for five years: and is still in the stage of being set down for Second Reading. That is not encouraging as to the results of the outcome of a Committee of your Lordships' House. But, in the second place, since the year 1887, not only do we know a good deal more about the subject-matter, but science has considerably advanced, and various methods for dealing with the subject have now been suggested, which were not known at the time when that Committee was appointed. But, in order that these methods should be properly tested and appreciated, they should be tested by those who are experts, and the number of those experts in a matter of this kind on the Benches of your Lordships' House is, and must always remain, limited. It is true that, within the last 24 hours, we have received a very distinguished addition to that number, in the person of the noble Lord who has taken his seat for the first time to-day. But that does not alter the fact that there are but very few of your Lordships' House, and those some of the busiest, and consequently most occupied, who could be appealed to to serve upon a Committee for this purpose. But there is a third, and a still more practical reason, which, after an experience (which has not been a short one now) of legislation, both in another place and in your Lordships' House, I think I am entitled to urge: and that is that, with hardly one single exception, no measure dealing with subjects of this kind, which has emanated from a Committee of your Lordships' House simply, and which has not been pressed in another place with all the force that the Government of the day have at its command, has had any chance whatsoever of passing into law. And in the case of a measure, founded upon the deliberations of a Committee of your Lordships' House in a matter of this kind, there would be a peculiar difficulty; because there are upon the Benches in another place many Members who are specially qualified by professional training to form their opinion upon a subject of this kind, and who are quite certain to tear in pieces any Bill that comes down from your Lordships' House, I am afraid in some cases because they have not been previously consulted in the matter. Now, my Lords, Her Majesty's Government have decided that it would not be desirable to issue a Royal Commission (which is the course I should have preferred) upon this subject, and, of course, I bow to that decision; but I do venture to submit that a Joint Committee of both Houses might meet these particular difficulties to which I have already referred. In the first place, they would have before them all the printed evidence taken before the Committee of your Lordships' House. In the second place, it would be possible to re-inforce any Committee appointed by your Lordships' House by an equal number, at least, of men specially qualified to deal with the subject from the Benches in another place. And, thirdly, I think that the recommendations of such a Joint Committee would come with much greater force, and with a much greater chance of having practical legislation founded upon them, than any recommendations which were arrived at by a Committee composed simply of Members of your Lordships' House. Now, my Lords, I should not for a moment think of asking a Committee of that kind to embark upon what the noble Marquess seemed to be afraid I was touching upon—namely, a hopeless crusade against the vapours of the North Sea and the Essex Marshes. No, my Lords, the London fog is, I think, just one of those things of which it may be said, as is said with regard to vice, that it loses more than half its evils when it loses all its grossness; and, if you could take away from the London fog the elements introduced into it by Londoners themselves, you would have done much to render it less injurious to human life, certainly more innocuous as regards sapping the vital energy, and incomparably less expensive than London fogs at present are. It may be in the recollection of your Lordships that a single foggy day means an extra expenditure of £4,000 in gas alone; and that, by the best computation, every year the combustible products which are sent up the chimneys to poison the air, instead of being used to warm our rooms and dwellings, amount to a tax upon the community of somewhat upwards of £1,000,000 per annum. Those are established facts, and those facts can be proved. My Lords, it has also been suggested that my object was to point out particular remedies. My Lords, that is exactly the point I wish to avoid. I think it is most essential that a burden of that kind should be left for the decision of a Committee, and that further inquiry should precede any legislation. As regards anthracite coal, I merely mentioned that as one of many methods which might be adopted for dealing with the question ; and I think scant justice was done to it in the answer of the noble Marquess. If any of your Lordships wish to ascertain what may be done in that respect, I am given to understand that there is a fire burning at the present moment in the Prince's Chamber, which was lighted this morning, entirely composed of anthracite coal, which I have just been looking at myself. I found that there was a very wholesome flame proceeding from it ; and certainly much more heat was given out than from the fireplace at the other end of the room. That, however, is only one branch of the subject. My Lords, since I first brought this subject before your Lordships' House, I have been inundated with suggestions, practical and unpractical, of all sorts and kinds. I have seen articles in almost every paper in the daily Press on the subject—many of them, I confess, not very encouraging to anyone who wishes to act as a reformer in this matter ; but some pointing out that science has defined various remedies, any one or more of which might be adopted. And there is one remedy, at all events, within our reach. If we only agreed, by legislation, to say that all future grates should be so constructed as to consume their own smoke, and that all future ovens should be rendered smokeless, you would, at once, have done a great deal to cope with the increase of the evil which is daily going on. Had such a measure been adopted, which the Smoke Prevention Act suggested, and put into force 30 years ago, the air of London would now be comparatively pure. The great mischief has been done, not so much by the ordinary chimney as by the kitchen chimney, which must be in every house ; and a very slight alteration indeed in many cases would entirely prevent the smoke and the deleterious action issuing therefrom. I merely mention these facts to prove that there is a distinct case to inquire into ; and

I believe that such an inquiry, if there is not to be a Royal Commission, might effectually and efficiently be carried on by a Joint Committee of the two Houses of Parliament. Those are the views I venture to submit to your Lordships. I gave the Home Office private notice of the question I was about to put three or four days ago ; and I hope no objection will be placed in the way if it be possible to form a Joint Committee of both Houses to inquire into this important matter. I do not say that such a Committee would be entirely, or perhaps even partly, successful ; but I do say that the subject is one which touches the comfort and health of so large a portion of the community that we ought not to sit down with hands folded, and say that nothing can be done, until it has been proved, beyond all manner of doubt, that the evil is one which is irremediable, and with which it is impossible for us to deal.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, in the first place, I must be allowed to congratulate my noble Friend upon the valuable auxiliary that he obtained this morning to the arguments which he desires to press upon the House and upon the public. Not all the eloquence of my noble Friend was equal to that very dirty fog which we found upon coming into London this morning, and which made me feel a wish that it were possible by any means, Royal Commission or other, to further my noble Friend's desires. But I am afraid the facts are too strong for us. I am not going through the arguments that my noble Friend repeated, with great force, upon the evils or the remediability of the London fog. I am afraid lest I should be considered to be an advocate and friend of the fog—anything more near an advocatus diaboli I cannot imagine. But, on the present occasion, I have not to argue the larger question. My noble Friend has gone off the safe field of Committees of this House and Royal Commissions into an unknown country —into the question of Joint Committees. He is touching the mysterious parts of the Constitution. I do not exactly know what the principles are on which Joint Committees are appointed, but I know that the suggestion of them is very apt to be received on the other side of the Central Hall. I remember some years back, when the noble Lords opposite were in power and had a large majority in the House of Commons, they proposed that the Indian Budget should be referred to a Joint Committee; it was a very reasonable proposal; but all the authority of Gladstone's Government of that day could not induce the House of Commons to accept it. And I am told that it is exceedingly unlikely that the House of Commons would accept a Joint Committee on this subject. herto Joint Committees; with I think only one exception, have been confined to questions concerning the private Business of the two Houses. I will not undertake, on behalf of the House of Commons, that they would consent to a Joint Committee; I should be giving an undertaking which I should wholly incapable of fulfilling; but I will undertake this: that if anyone comes in the House of Commons for a Joint Committee, and that House accepts it, I will do my best to persuade your Lordships' House to join in the House of Commons in entering upon it. I cannot do more than that. My Lords, much of my noble Friend's remarks were addressed to the point that the House of Commons would not accept any measure that did not initiate with them. If that is the case, the proper course is clearly for my noble Friend to induce one of his many adherents in the other House to move for a Committee in that House, and I daresay he would move it with success. But I do not quite understand the modesty which induces my noble Friend to abstain from going forward in that path of investigation which has here selected. After all, the main point is to collect information, and that information will be good enough whichever House it comes from; it will not matter which House has it into the Blue Book; and, if my noble Friend can get together, by arrangement in Committee, an amount of evidence which shows that there is an effective remedy for this evil, and that that remedy can be applied by Parliament, I will venture to say that the House of Commons will attach just as much importance to that evidence as if it were gathered by themselves.

House adjourned at twenty minutes past Five o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 25th February, 1892.

QUESTIONS.

JURORS AT IRISH ASSIZES.

MR. MULHOLLAND (Londonderry, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been directed to resolutions unanimously passed by almost every Board of Guardians in Ulster, protesting against the existing system of summoning jurors to the Assizes without remuneration, or compensation for actual pecuniary loss incurred; and whether it is his intention to introduce a clause into the Local Government Bill for the purpose of removing this grievance?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): Resolutions such as are referred to in the question have been received from Boards of Guardians. There is no intention of introducing a clause in reference to the subject into the Local Government Bill.

MR. LEA (Londonderry, S.): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that I have given notice of a Motion for a Select Committee on the subject? Will the Government state now if they are willing to grant that Committee?

MR. JACKSON: I have not heard anything about a Committee. I am not aware that there are any differences between jurors in Ireland and in England. I am afraid that to serve as jurors is a sacrifice that has to be made by citizens in either country.

OPIUM CULTIVATION IN BENGAL.

SIR JOSEPH PEASE (Durham, Barnard Castle): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India

whether he can state the number of acres licensed for poppy cultivation in Bengal in each year from 1880-81 to 1889-90, both inclusive; the number included in the revised Estimate for 1890-91, and in the Budget Estimate for 1891-2; the amount of Malwa revenue included in the revised Estimate of Rx.5,680,300 for 1890-91, and the amount of Malwa revenue included in the Budget Estimate for 1891-2 of Rx.5,318,000?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. G. CURZON, Lancashire. Southport): For the ten years, the extent of poppy cultivation is in acres. 1880-81, 536,017; 1881-82, 531,275; 1882-83, 495,740; 1883-84, 505,843; 1884-85, 565,246; 1885-86, 594,921; 1886-87, 562,052; 1887-88, 536,607; 1888-89, 459,864; 1889-90, 482,557; in 1890-91 it was 500,688. The figures for 1891-92 have not yet been received, but in order to restrict the area of cultivation, the Government of India reduced the number of chests for sale in the year from 57,000 to 54,000. As to the revenue, the Malwa contribution was estimated at Rx.1,747,000 in both of the years named by the hon. Baronet.

THE STRANRAER MAILS

MR. MULHOLLAND (Londonderry, N.): I beg to ask the Postmaster-General whether his attention has been directed to the statement publicly made by the Chairman of the Belfast and Northern Counties Railway Company, on 12th February, that his Company were able and willing to carry the Mails between Stranraer and Londonderry in half an hour less time than they had undertaken by the recently concluded agreement; whether he can state how often the Mail Train for the North of Ireland has been more than ten minutes' late in arriving at Carlisle and at Stranraer since the establishment of the accelerated Mail service on 1st September, 1891; and whether he has taken any steps with the object of enforcing reasonable punctuality in the delivery of the mails at Stranraer by the English and Scotch Railway Companies concerned?

Sir Joseph Pease

THE POSTMASTER GEN<sup>L</sup> (Sir JAMES FERGUSSON, Manc<sup>N.E.</sup>): Attention has been directed to the statement referred to, and the Department would be glad to have Mails carried between Stranraer and Derry in half-an-hour less time at present. But it is understood that the Company make the proviso that punctual arrival of the Mail Train at Stranraer shall be "ensured," and the Department is, of course, not in a position to guarantee absolute punctuality. Since the establishment of the Service on the 1st September last, the Mail Train has been more than ten minutes late at Carlisle on occasions, and more than 10 minutes late at Stranraer on 101 occasions. In 50 of these cases the irregularity has exceeded 15 minutes, and almost every instance in which there has been great delay, it has been either due to an accident or to the severity of the weather. Urgent representations have, however, been addressed to the Railway Companies concerning both as regards the general service and also in view of particular cases of delay, and they have promised to make every effort to secure punctuality. As I have already stated, the speed is high, 40 miles an hour over all, for 40 miles, with about 70 miles of single line in Scotland. There is heavy traffic to be done at the stations, including growing Parcel Post; and, in circumstances, absolute punctuality is difficult to maintain.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Will the delay arise chiefly on the English or Irish side?

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: The delay, as I have said, arises on English and Scotch lines.

ARMY PENSIONS.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether soldiers of over 50 years of age, who have served twelve years with colours, are entitled to have their names entered at Chelsea Hospital as a deferred pension under the Act of 1847?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincoln. Horncastle): To be entitled to a deferred pension from the age of years a soldier must have enlisted before 23rd July, 1864, and must have been discharged with two good conduct badges after not less than 14 years' service.

MAJOR RASCH: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman, will he have that fact more generally made known?

MR. E. STANHOPE: I will inquire, and see if it is necessary to advertise it further.

CONSUMPTION OF OPIUM IN INDIA.

MR. LEWIS FRY (Bristol, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether he will lay upon the Table of the House a statement of the consumption of opium and its preparation in British India for the year 1890-1, similar to that for the previous ten years, contained in Statement B appended to the letter from the Government of India, dated 14th October last, recently made public; and whether the figures in Statement B refer to annual periods expiring on 31st March in each year; and, if so, whether he can explain why Statement B does not comprise the figures for the year ending 31st March, 1891?

*MR. CURZON: No, Sir; the figures for 1890-1, in continuation of Statement B, have not yet been received from the Governor of India; but they will be laid on the Table as soon as they are received. In the meanwhile, I can give the hon. Member the figures as they appear in the Provincial Reports for all Provinces except Madras and the North West Provinces. The annual periods in Statement B expire on 31st March, except in the case of the North West Provinces, where they expire on 30th September. Statement B was sent home with the Governor of India's despatch of 14th October, 1891, when the figures for 1890-1 were not available in a complete form.

PRESBYTERIAN ARMY CHAPLAINS.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he has received the Report of a Committee of the Free Church of Scotland (since approved by the General Assembly) on the subject of Presbyterian Army Chaplains, in which it was suggested that the superintendence of the work shall be carried on by a Committee representing all the Presbyterian Churches in Scotland, and ministers of all the Presbyterian Churches shall be eligible as chaplains; and whether, in view of the fact that the scheme proposed, besides providing much greater efficiency, will also secure economy, and that under the scheme the Presbyterian Churches undertake to supply all additional service needed beyond that provided by the fixed maximum expenditure of £800 per annum, he will give his favourable consideration to these proposals, with a view to their early adoption?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: Yes; I have received the Report in question; but I have no means of knowing whether the suggestions contained in it are acceptable to all the Presbyterian Churches in Scotland. Until I know this is the case, I am not in a position to consider the suggestions of the Report.

THE COASTGUARD O'HALLORAN AT EASTBOURNE.

ADMIRAL FIELD (Sussex, Eastbourne): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he will cause a strict inquiry to be made into the case of a coastguard man, recently stationed at Eastbourne, by name O'Halloran, who has just been pensioned out of the Service on two shillings per day, to which he was entitled by length of service, with a gratuity of only £3 as a compensation for 15 months of bodily suffering, due to a terrible accident on a dark night in November, 1890, when on patrol duty, and which has reduced him to the position of a helpless invalid for life; whether he is aware that, owing to the fence round the Redoubt at the east end of the town being of insufficient height, the coastguard-man, who had only been about 48 hours at the station, stumbled over the fence and fell into the ditch, a distance of about 25 to 30 feet, and that he was after a time sent to Haslar and treated on the surgical side, and then on the medical side, and ultimately discharged as cured, whereas results show he ought not to have been discharged; whether he is aware that the man cannot be received into the Princess Alice Hospital at Eastbourne because of his serious condition, and that, by the aid of private charity, he will be moved to the London Hospital, if possible; whether the fence round the Redoubt has since been greatly increased in height on the representation of the Vicar of the parish; and whether, under all the circumstances of the case, the Admiralty will consider the advisability of granting him some addition to his pension, in view of the fact that if the Redoubt had been private property heavy damages could have been recovered for injuries received?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): I have had this case personally investigated by an officer of the Medical Department, and find that the circumstances attending the sad accident to O'Halloran are, in the main, as stated in the question. It does not, however, appear that any mismanagement occurred in the treatment of the injury; and, if desired, I shall be glad to show the Papers on the subject to the hon. and gallant Gentleman. The question of the pension to be awarded to O'Halloran has been again reviewed in the light of the circumstances which have now been fully reported; and the Admiralty consider that, under the regulations, they are justified in granting the unfortunate man an increased pension of £47 3s. a year for life, or 7d. a day more than the pension awarded in the first instance.

OUTRAGE NEAR CANTON.

ADMIRAL FIELD (Sussex, Eastbourne): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been called to a report in the Standard of Thursday, 18th instant, of a violation of a Treaty by the Chinese Authorities of Canton, from which it appears that about a week ago the Canton officials, by order of the Viceroy, came with a band of soldiers and seized a warehouse occupied by a British merchant within the 30 mile Treaty radius of Canton, possessed themselves of all the business books and accounts, and now have carried off the whole of the merchandise contained in the warehouse, upon all of which full duty had been paid; and whether any steps have been taken by Her Majesty's Government to obtain satisfaction for the outrage, especially as the Chinese Authorities themselves regard it as a test case?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. J. W. LOWTHER, Cumberland, Penrith): A Report of this case has been received from the Acting British Consul at Canton. As his own representations to the Viceroy had been unavailing, he had referred the matter to Her Majesty's Minister at Pekin, who had doubtless already addressed the Chinese Government upon the subject. Sir John Walsham will, however, be informed that the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been drawn to the case, and that they await his Report of the result of the steps taken by him. It is only fair to add that the contention of the Chinese Authorities appears to be that the gentleman in question was not entitled, according to Treaty, to have a trading establishment at Fatshan, outside Canton, but the methods resorted to for the suppression of his business seem to have been unjustifiable. They further allege that he was guilty of smuggling, but this he entirely denies.

POSTAGE OF REQUISITION FORM UNDER THE PARLIAMENTARY REGISTRATION (IRELAND) ACT.

MR. ROCHE (Galway, E.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General, with reference to the forms of requisitions which, under "The Parliamentary Registration (Ireland) Act, 1885," clerks of unions are obliged to serve on inhabitant occupiers in Ireland, whether he is aware that in returning the same to the clerks the inhabitant occupiers are not obliged to prepay the postage, and that where the postage is not prepaid double postage has to be paid by the Board of Guardians; and whether, considering that this penalty is incurred through no fault of the Board, he will in such cases direct that the original halfpenny postage only be charged?

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: I can only say that I have no power to remit the penalty in the cases described.

THE CLAIMS OF PRISON WARDERS.

SIR JOSEPH PEASE (Durham, Barnard Castle): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the Committee of the Home Office of last year, appointed to consider the claims of prison warders and other officers, in regard to certain matters concerning their remuneration and hours of duty, &c., has yet reported; and, if so, whether he will be prepared to lay the Report upon the Table of the House?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): The Committee on the claim of prison warders and other officers has reported, but, as I informed the hon. Baronet last session, it is not usual to publish the report of a Departmental Committee. I can, however, state the decisions come to in consequence of the Report—namely, that the pay and emoluments of officers of local prisons have been increased; a larger amount of leave has been sanctioned; and an addition has been made to the maximum rates of pay of assistant warders in convict prisons.

RURAL POSTMEN.

MR. PHILIPPS (Lanark, Mid): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether it is the case that unappointed rural postmen in Lanarkshire are only paid 18s. a week, with 12s. sick allowance, against 23s. pay, with full sick allowance, paid to the appointed rural postmen; whether the appointed postmen get pensions on retiring, while the unappointed postmen are not eligible for pensions; and whether the hours of labour and the work done by the two classes of men are frequently the same; and, if so, whether some attempt can be made to improve the condition of the unappointed postmen?

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: If unestablished rural postmen doing a full day's work are referred to in this question they would be on fixed wages of, in some cases, as much as 18s. a week; they would also receive half-pay during sickness. Established postmen have a scale of wages rising to 22s. a week (not 23s.), and receive two-thirds pay during sickness. Un-established men would not be eligible for pensions on retiring, as these are only granted to established postmen. Unestablished postmen are either men temporarily employed who may be permanently appointed when vacancies occur, or are men who are disqualified in some way for established appointments, but who are found able to do a particular duty, and whose employment is continued, therefore, as a favour, in order that they may not be sent adrift.

EDINBURGH SCIENCE AND ART MUSEUM CLERKS.

MR. WALLACE (Edinburgh, E.): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education if he can explain why only Clauses 8, 9, and 10 of the Order in Council of 21st March, 1890, have as yet been applied to the Edinburgh Museum of Science and Art; and whether there is a probability of the remaining clauses being applied soon?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): The Order in Council of 21st March, 1890, applies exclusively to clerks of the Second Division, of whom there are none at the Edinburgh Museum. The regulations respecting holidays, sick leave, and attendance-book, were settled Departmentally and without reference to the Order in Council of 21st March, 1890.

WOODFORD AND WHITEGATE POSTAL SERVICE.

MR. M'DERMOTT (Kilkenny, N.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General, with reference to the postal service at present existing between Woodford and Whitegate, whether he is aware that, owing to the delay at present involved in sending through Limerick and Dublin letters posted in either Whitegate and Woodford and addressed to the other town, a distance of only six miles, no letters requiring expedition can be sent through the post; and whether, considering the convenience of the people of the district, the increased number of letters which would be posted, and the fact that a rural messenger already goes about half the distance between these two towns, he will now have direct service established between them?

although it would be impossible to deny the weight of the arguments used by the noble Marquess on the one side, there is very great weight indeed in what has been said by my noble Friend (Lord Northbrook) upon the other. The circumstances of India, as my noble Friend has pointed out, are wholly different from those to which we are accustomed in this country. Everyone knows that a small cloud in the distance will suddenly spread into a hurricane, and, before your Commander-in-Chief could get back from this country to India, his absence from the Indian Empire might be the cause of very serious disasters. My Lords, if I felt perfectly satisfied that it was only upon some extraordinary occasion that such a power as this would be used, I might regard it with more indifference; but your Lordships must remember what the working of clauses of this kind is. It is all very well to say that the consent of the Governor-General in Council is required; but I do not believe that, if the Secretary of State and the Commander-in-Chief in India both desired that this power should be used, it would be possible for the Viceroy in Council to resist the demand; and what I should be afraid of is that this power would come to be used upon occasions not so grave as those which the noble Marquess has in his mind. Of course it is a balance of advantages and disadvantages. As I said the other night, I do not for a moment undervalue in the slightest degree—it would be childish to do so—the advantages of consultation with high officers. The whole question turns upon this: is it, upon the whole, more likely that the Public Service will suffer seriously by the Government not being able to bring over the Commander-in-Chief, or that the Empire of India may be endangered by the possible absence of the Commander-in-Chief at a crisis when his presence is greatly required? That is a matter upon which each person must form his own opinion. I, myself, for my own part, would greatly prefer that the law should rest as it is. With regard to sick leave, I think the natural conclusion from the noble Marquess's argument would be that the power of the Commander-in-Chief to go to the Cape ought to be abrogated. That, however, is a which I will not press further. the whole, I must say that I of the same opinion as my noble (Lord Northbrook).

LONDON FOG.

VISCOUNT MIDDLETON: My Lords, since my noble Friend the Minister expressed his willingness to support the appointment of a Committee to inquire into this question, I have carefully considered the matter and have taken counsel with those whose opinion I could rely on; and come to the conclusion, rightly, that no good or useful purpose is likely to be served if the Committee is to be restricted in its powers. Members of your Lordships' House I say this for three reasons. In the first place, a Committee of your Lordships' House has already sat to inquire into this question, or into the whole matter of the prevention of fog in the year 1887. Several distinguished Members of your Lordships' House served upon it; a Bill, founded upon the recommendations of the Committee, was subsequently introduced into the House: has been annually introduced for five years and is still in the stage of being set down for Second Reading. That is not encouraging as to the prospects of the outcome of a Committee of your Lordships' House. In the second place, since the year

It only do we know a good deal more ~~out~~ the subject-matter, but science is considerably advanced, and various methods for dealing with the subject have now been suggested, which were not known at the time when that Committee was appointed. But, in order that these methods should be properly tested and appreciated, they should be tested by those who are experts, and the number of those experts in a matter of this kind on the Benches of your Lordships' House is, and must always remain, limited. It is true that, within the last 24 hours, we have received a very distinguished addition to that number, in the person of the noble Lord who has taken his seat for the first time to-day. But that does not alter the fact that there are but very few of your Lordships' House, and those some of the busiest, and consequently most occupied, who could be appealed to to serve upon a Committee for this purpose. But there is a third, and a still more practical reason, which, after an experience (which has not been a short one now) of legislation, both in another place and in your Lordships' House, I think I am entitled to urge: and that is that, with hardly one single exception, no measure dealing with subjects of this kind, which has emanated from a Committee of your Lordships' House simply, and which has not been pressed in another place with all the force that the Government of the day have at its command, has had any chance whatsoever of passing into law. And in the case of a measure, founded upon the deliberations of a Committee of your Lordships' House in a matter of this kind, there would be a peculiar difficulty; because there are upon the Benches in another place many Members who are specially qualified by professional training to form their opinion upon a subject of this kind, and who are quite certain to tear in pieces any Bill that comes down from your Lordships' House, I am afraid in some cases because they have not been previously consulted in the matter. Now, my Lords, Her Majesty's Government have decided that it would not be desirable to issue a Royal Commission (which is the course I should have preferred) upon this subject, and, of course, I bow to that decision; but I do venture to submit that a Joint Committee of both Houses might meet these particular difficulties to which I have already referred. In the first place, they would have before them all the printed evidence taken before the Committee of your Lordships' House. In the second place, it would be possible to re-inforce any Committee appointed by your Lordships' House by an equal number, at least, of men specially qualified to deal with the subject from the Benches in another place. And, thirdly, I think that the recommendations of such a Joint Committee would come with much greater force, and with a much greater chance of having practical legislation founded upon them, than any recommendations which were arrived at by a Committee composed simply of Members of your Lordships' House. Now, my Lords, I should not for a moment think of asking a Committee of that kind to embark upon what the noble Marquess seemed to be afraid I was touching upon—namely, a hopeless crusade against the vapours of the North Sea and the Essex Marshes. No, my Lords, the London fog is, I think, just one of those things of which it may be said, as is said with regard to vice, that it loses more than half its evils when it loses all its grossness; and, if you could take away from the London fog the elements introduced into it by Londoners themselves, you would have done much to render it less injurious to human life, certainly more innocuous as regards sapping the vital energy, and incomparably less expensive than London fogs at present are. It may be in the recollection of your Lordships that a single foggy day means an extra expenditure of £4,000 in gas alone; and that, by the best computation, every year the combustible products which are sent up the chimneys to poison the air, instead of being used to warm our rooms and dwellings, amount to a tax upon the community of somewhat upwards of £1,000,000 per annum. Those are established facts, and those facts can be proved. My Lords, it has also been suggested that my object was to point out particular remedies. My Lords, that is exactly the point I wish to avoid. I think it is most essential that a burden of that kind should be left for the decision of a Committee, and that further inquiry should precede any legislation. As regards anthracite coal, I merely mentioned that as one of many methods which might be adopted for dealing with the question; and I think scant justice was done to it in the answer of the noble Marquess. If any of your Lordships wish to ascertain what may be done in that respect, I am given to understand that there is a fire burning at the present moment in the Prince's Chamber, which was lighted this morning, entirely composed of anthracite coal, which I have just been looking at myself. I found that there was a very wholesome flame proceeding from it; and certainly much more heat was given out than from the fireplace at the other end of the room. That, however, is only one branch of the subject. My Lords, since I first brought this subject before your Lordships' House, I have been inundated with suggestions, practical and unpractical, of all sorts and kinds. I have seen articles in almost every paper in the daily Press on the subject—many of them, I confess, not very encouraging to anyone who wishes to act as a reformer in this matter; but some pointing out that science has defined various remedies, any one or more of which might be adopted. And there is one remedy, at all events, within our reach. If we only agreed, by legislation, to say that all future grates should be so constructed as to consume their own smoke, and that all future ovens should be rendered smokeless, you would, at once, have done a great deal to cope with the increase of the evil which is daily going on. Had such a measure been adopted, which the Smoke Prevention Act suggested, and put into force 30 years ago, the air of London would now be comparatively pure. The great mischief has been done, not so much by the ordinary chimney as by the kitchen chimney, which must be in every house; and a very slight alteration indeed in many cases would entirely prevent the smoke and the deleterious action issuing therefrom. I merely mention these facts to prove that there is a distinct case to inquire into; and

I believe that such an inquiry, if there is not to be a Royal Commission, might effectually and efficiently be carried on by a Joint Committee of the two Houses of Parliament. Those are the views I venture to submit to your Lordships. I gave the Home Office private notice of the question I was about to put three or four days ago; and I hope no objection will be placed in the way if it be possible to form a Joint Committee of both Houses to inquire into this important matter. I do not say that such a Committee would be entirely, or perhaps even partly, successful; but I do say that the subject is one which touches the comfort and health of so large a portion of the community that we ought not to sit down with hands folded, and say that nothing can be done, until it has been proved, beyond all manner of doubt, that the evil is one which is irremediable, and with which it is impossible for us to deal.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, in the first place, I must be allowed to congratulate my noble Friend upon the valuable auxiliary that he obtained this morning to the arguments which he desires to press upon the House and upon the public. Not all the eloquence of my noble Friend was equal to that very dirty fog which we found upon coming into London this morning, and which made me feel a wish that it were possible by any means, Royal Commission or other, to further my noble Friend's desires. But I am afraid the facts are too strong for us. I am not going through the arguments that my noble Friend repeated, with great force, upon the evils or the remediability of the London fog. I am afraid lest I should be considered to be an advocate and friend of the fog—anything more near an advocatus diaboli I cannot imagine. But, on the present occasion, I have not to argue the larger question. My noble Friend has gone off the safe field of Committees of this House and Royal Commissions into an unknown country—into the question of Joint Committees. He is touching the mysterious parts of the Constitution. I do not exactly know what the principles are pon which Joint Committees are appointed, but I know that the suggestion of them is very apt to be ill received on the other side of the central Hall. I remember some years ago, when the noble Lords opposite were in power and had a large majority in the House of Commons, they proposed that the Indian Budget should be referred to a Joint Committee; it was a very reasonable proposal; but all the authority of Mr. Gladstone's Government of that day could not induce the House of Commons to accept it. And I am told that it is exceedingly unlikely that the House of Commons would accept a Joint Committee on this subject. hitherto Joint Committees, with I think only one exception, have been confined to questions concerning the private Business of the two Houses. I will not undertake, on behalf of the House of Commons, that they would consent to a Joint Committee; I should be giving an undertaking which I should wholly incapable of fulfilling; but I will undertake this: that if anyone moves in the House of Commons for a Joint Committee, and that House accepts it, I will do my best to persuade your Lordships' House to join with the House of Commons in entering upon it. I cannot do more than that. My Lords, much of my noble Friend's remarks were addressed to the point that the House of Commons could not accept any measure that did not originate with them. If that is the case, the proper course is clearly for my noble Friend to induce one of his many adherents in the other House to move for a Committee in that House, and I daresay he would move it with success. But I do not quite understand the modesty which induces my noble Friend to abstain from going forward in that path of investigation he has here selected. After all, the main point is to collect information, and that information will be good enough whichever House it comes from; it will not matter which House has put it into the Blue Book; and, if my noble Friend can get together, by examination in Committee, an amount of evidence which shows that there is an effective remedy for this evil, and that that remedy can be applied by Parliament, I will venture to say that the House of Commons will attach just as much importance to that evidence as if it were gathered by themselves.

House adjourned at twenty minutes past Five o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 25th February, 1892.

QUESTIONS.

JURORS AT IRISH ASSIZES.

MR. MULHOLLAND (Londonderry, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been directed to resolutions unanimously passed by almost every Board of Guardians in Ulster, protesting against the existing system of summoning jurors to the Assizes without remuneration, or compensation for actual pecuniary loss incurred; and whether it is his intention to introduce a clause into the Local Government Bill for the purpose of removing this grievance?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): Resolutions such as are referred to in the question have been received from Boards of Guardians. There is no intention of introducing a clause in reference to the subject into the Local Government Bill.

MR. LEA (Londonderry, S.): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that I have given notice of a Motion for a Select Committee on the subject? Will the Government state now if they are willing to grant that Committee?

MR. JACKSON: I have not heard anything about a Committee. I am not aware that there are any differences between jurors in Ireland and in England. I am afraid that to serve as jurors is a sacrifice that has to be made by citizens in either country.

OPIUM CULTIVATION IN BENGAL.

SIR JOSEPH PEASE (Durham, Barnard Castle): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India

whether he can state the number of acres licensed for poppy cultivation in Bengal in each year from 1880-81 to 1889-90, both inclusive; the number included in the revised Estimate for 1890-91, and in the Budget Estimate for 1891-2; the amount of Malwa revenue included in the revised Estimate of Rx.5,680,300 for 1890-91, and the amount of Malwa revenue included in the Budget Estimate for 1891-2 of Rx.5,318,000?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. G. CURZON, Lancashire. Southport): For the ten years, the extent of poppy cultivation is in acres. 1880-81, 536,017; 1881-82, 531,275; 1882-83, 495,740; 1883-84, 505,843; 1884-85, 565,246; 1885-86, 594,921; 1886-87, 562,052; 1887-88, 536,607; 1888-89, 459,864; 1889-90, 482,557; in 1890-91 it was 500,688. The figures for 1891-92 have not yet been received, but in order to restrict the area of cultivation, the Government of India reduced the number of chests for sale in the year from 57,000 to 54,000. As to the revenue, the Malwa contribution was estimated at Rx.1,747,000 in both of the years named by the hon. Baronet.

THE STRANRAER MAILS

MR. MULHOLLAND (London-derry, N.): I beg to ask the Postmaster-General whether his attention has been directed to the statement publicly made by the Chairman of the Belfast and Northern Counties Railway Company, on 12th February, that his Company were able and willing to carry the Mails between Stranraer and Londonderry in half an hour less time than they had undertaken by the recently concluded agreement; whether he can state how often the Mail Train for the North of Ireland has been more than ten minutes' late in arriving at Carlisle and at Stranraer since the establishment of the accelerated Mail service on 1st September, 1891; and whether he has taken any steps with the object of enforcing reasonable punctuality in the delivery of the mails at Stranraer by the English and Scotch Railway Companies concerned?

Sir Joseph Pease

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Sir JAMES FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): Attention has been directed to the statement referred to, and the Department would be glad to have the Mails carried between Stranraer and Derry in half-an-hour less time than at present. But it is understood that the Company make the proviso that a punctual arrival of the Mail Train at Stranraer shall be "ensured," and the Department is, of course, not in a position to guarantee absolute punctuality. Since the establishment of the Service on the 1st September last, the Mail Train has been more than 10 minutes late at Carlisle on 69 occasions, and more than 10 minutes late at Stranraer on 101 occasions. In 50 of these cases the irregularity has exceeded 15 minutes, and in almost every instance in which there has been great delay, it has been due either to an accident or to the severity of the weather. Urgent representations have, however, been addressed to the Railway Companies concerned, both as regards the general service and also in view of particular cases of delay, and they have promised to make every effort to secure punctuality. As I have already stated, the speed is high, 40 miles an hour over all, for 406 miles, with about 70 miles of single line in Scotland. There is heavy work to be done at the stations, including a growing Parcel Post; and, in the circumstances, absolute punctuality is difficult to maintain.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Does the delay arise chiefly on the English or Irish side?

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: The delay, as I have said, arises on the English and Scotch lines.

ARMY PENSIONS.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether soldiers of over 50 years, who have served twelve years with the colours, are entitled to have their names entered at Chelsea Hospital for a deferred pension under the Warrant of 1847?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): To be entitled to a deferred pension from the age of 50 years a soldier must have enlisted before 23rd July, 1864, and must have been discharged with two good conduct badges after not less than 14 years' service.

MAJOR RASCH : May I ask the right hon. Gentleman, will he have that fact more generally made known ?

MR. E. STANHOPE : I will inquire, and see if it is necessary to advertise it further.

CONSUMPTION OF OPIUM IN INDIA.

MR. LEWIS FRY (Bristol, N.) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether he will lay upon the Table of the House a statement of the consumption of opium and its preparation in British India for the year 1890-1, similar to that for the previous ten years, contained in Statement B appended to the letter from the Government of India, dated 14th October last, recently made public ; and whether the figures in Statement B refer to annual periods expiring on 31st March in each year ; and, if so, whether he can explain why Statement B does not comprise the figures for the year ending 31st March, 1891 ?

*MR. CURZON : No, Sir ; the figures for 1890-1, in continuation of Statement B, have not yet been received from the Governor of India ; but they will be laid on the Table as soon as they are received. In the meanwhile, I can give the hon. Member the figures as they appear in the Provincial Reports for all Provinces except Madras and the North West Provinces. The annual periods in Statement B expire on 31st March, except in the case of the North West Provinces, where they expire on 30th September. Statement B was sent home with the Governor of India's despatch of 14th October, 1891, when the figures for 1890-1 were not available in a complete form.

PRESBYTERIAN ARMY CHAPLAINS.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he has received the Report of a Committee of the Free Church of Scotland (since approved by the General Assembly) on the subject of Presbyterian Army Chaplains, in which it was suggested that the superintendence of the work shall be carried on by a Committee representing all the Presbyterian Churches in Scotland, and ministers of all the Presbyterian Churches shall be eligible as chaplains ; and whether, in view of the fact that the scheme proposed, besides providing much greater efficiency, will also secure economy, and that under the scheme the Presbyterian Churches undertake to supply all additional service needed beyond that provided by the fixed maximum expenditure of £800 per annum, he will give his favourable consideration to these proposals, with a view to their early adoption ?

*MR. E. STANHOPE : Yes ; I have received the Report in question ; but I have no means of knowing whether the suggestions contained in it are acceptable to all the Presbyterian Churches in Scotland. Until I know this is the case, I am not in a position to consider the suggestions of the Report.

THE COASTGUARD O'HALLORAN AT EASTBOURNE.

ADMIRAL FIELD (Sussex, Eastbourne) : I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he will cause a strict inquiry to be made into the case of a coastguard man, recently stationed at Eastbourne, by name O'Halloran, who has just been pensioned out of the Service on two shillings per day, to which he was entitled by length of service, with a gratuity of only £3 as a compensation for 15 months of bodily suffering, due to a terrible accident on a dark night in November, 1890, when on patrol duty, and which has reduced him to the position of a helpless invalid for life ; whether he is aware that, owing to the fence round the Redoubt at the east end of the town being of insufficient height, the coastguard-man, who had only been about 48 hours at the station, stumbled over the fence and fell into the ditch, a distance of about 25 to 30 feet, and that he was after a time sent to Haslar and treated on the surgical side, and then on the medical side, and ultimately discharged as cured, whereas results show he ought not to have been discharged ; whether he is aware that the man cannot be received into the Princess Alice Hospital at Eastbourne because of his

Board of Agriculture whether he can give the House any information regarding the Royal Commission on Tuberculosis; whether he can say when it held its last sitting; whether the Minutes of Evidence given before the Commission have been printed and distributed; whether he is aware of the anxiety with which its Report is awaited for by those whose industry may be vitally affected by its recommendations; and when he expects it to report?

*MR. RITCHIE: I am informed that the Royal Commission held its last meeting on the 28th of January last; but I may observe that investigations are being carried on in addition to the taking of evidence at the meetings of the Commission. Minutes of the evidence given before the Commission have been printed for the use of the Commissioners, but the evidence has not been distributed to the public. I do not under-estimate the interest with which the Report of the Commission is awaited, but I am not in a position to state when their investigations are likely to be concluded.

THE PARLIAMENTARY REPORTS.

MR. LENG (Dundee): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the "conditions," upon which tenders were invited for printing and publishing the Parliamentary Reports of Debates and Proceedings, stipulated that the first edition should be issued in daily parts, stitched, "without covers"; and whether the tenderers were informed that permission would be subsequently given to the successful competitor for the contract to issue that edition in covers, and with advertisements, yielding a larger profit than the subsidy?

SIR JOHN GORST (Chatham): The answer to the first question is, Yes; to the second No.

THE POSTAL SERVICE.

MR. M'DERMOTT (Kilkenny, N.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that letters posted at Dublin for Castlecomer, County Kilkenny, are usually sent by train to Thurles and thence per mail car to Castlecomer; and whether, in view of the fact that there was no mail service between Thurles and Castlecomer for a number of days from the 19th instant, and considering the great inconvenience caused to the public by the interruption of the mail service, he will in future, in case of a block on the ordinary mail road, give directions to have the mails from Dublin to Castlecomer forwarded by way of Urlingford, Freshford, or Ballyragget, or by some of the other roads which are always open to traffic?

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: The mails for Castlecomer are sent in the manner described, the railway to Castlecomer not being used, because there is no convenient train available for the service. The mails arrive in ordinary course, by car, at 7 a.m. The recent very exceptional snowfall caused both roads and railways to be blocked in many parts of the district; and inquiry is being made into the question of adopting the route mentioned in the event of any similar emergency in future.

THE BRAZILIAN AND ARGENTINE REPUBLICS.

MR. BAUMANN (Camberwell, Peckham): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he will lay upon the Table copies of any recent laws passed by the Brazilian and Argentine Republics respecting the naturalisation of foreigners?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER: A translation of Chapter 69 of the Constitution of the Brazilian Republic, which contains the Brazilian Law on Nationality, will be laid upon the Table. With reference to the Argentine Republic, a Bill on naturalisation was before the Chamber of Deputies last year, but, so far as Her Majesty's Government are informed, it has not yet been passed into law.

THE FINANCIAL CONDITION OF ARGENTINA.

MR. BAUMANN: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Report of Mr. Arthur Herbert, Secretary of Legation at Buenos Ayres, upon the financial condition of Argentina, has been published; and, if not, whether he will lay it upon the Table?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER: The proof of the Report has been sent to Mr.

Herbert, in order that he might have the opportunity of revising it before publication. It is hoped that it will shortly be received back from him, and the Report will then be laid upon the Table.

THE SCOTCH EDUCATION CODE.

MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox) : I beg to ask the Lord Advocate when Members may expect to see the Scotch Education Code, which was laid upon the Table of the House in "dummy" on the 15th instant?

SIR C. J. PEARSON : The Code was delivered to Members at the Vote Office on the 23rd February.

AGRICULTURAL RETURNS FOR ENGLAND.

MR. O'KELLY (Roscommon, N.) : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether he is responsible for the annual publication of the Agricultural Return for England, the collection of which is forced on another Department ; if he is aware that those Returns are notoriously unreliable, owing to the inability of Excise officers to collect them on account of their revenue duties, the objection of farmers to give the required information, and the want of provision by Act of Parliament to make the information compulsory ; if those Returns could not be collected with less cost and more accuracy by overseers, who are willing to undertake the work ; and whether he was informed, on taking office, of the unreliability of those Returns ?

MR. CHAPLIN : The Board of Agriculture are responsible for the publication of the Agricultural Returns, which are collected by the Inland Revenue Department. Regarding the character of the Returns, the opinions of the officers whose duty it is to examine them are quite adverse to the view expressed in the question. The work of collection is one of considerable magnitude, and it is considered that, on the whole, it is exceedingly well done. I do not consider that the Returns could be collected, either with less cost or more accuracy, by overseers. I believe that whatever objection may have prevailed at one time on the part of farmers and others to render the Returns has practically disappeared ; and I am satisfied to rely on the increased recognition by agriculturists of the value of the statistics obtained without resorting to further powers. Since I took office I have on one or two occasions, I believe, received letters criticising the accuracy of the Returns ; but, upon inquiry, I am satisfied that this view is not supported by the facts.

NORTH PARK, ELTHAM.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK (London University) : I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether the Commissioners of Woods and Forests have declined to name a price for North Park, Eltham ; if so, whether they will not re-consider that resolution, and leave some time for negotiation before letting it out for building or cutting down the old timber ?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir JOHN GORST) : The Commissioners of Woods and Forests have not declined to name a price for North Park, Eltham, but they could not do this without a valuation, of which any intending purchaser would have to guarantee the cost.

IRISH RATING LAW AND BOARDS OF GUARDIANS.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether there have been any, and, if so, how many, cases in which the abuse of rating powers under the Poor Law in Ireland has called for the interference of the Central Authority ; and whether it is possible under the Irish Rating Law for a Board of Guardians to abuse its rating powers ?

MR. JACKSON : With regard to the matter of fact referred to in the first paragraph, the Local Government Board report that there have been several cases in which Boards of Guardians fail to strike adequate rates, with the result that the unions are in debt at the end of their financial year. I am unable to advise respecting the subject-matter of the second paragraph.

THE PURCHASE OF LAND (IRELAND) ACT.

MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.) : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury when the rules directed by Sec. 27 of "The Purchase of Land (Ireland) Act, 1891," will be issued; and when the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland and the Treasury propose to make known their decision under Sec. 28, Sub-Sec. 7, of the same Act?

MR. JACKSON : The rules are prepared, and will shortly be laid upon the Table. The Treasury has already approved the recommendations of the Lord Lieutenant under Section 28 (7). Perhaps the House will allow me to make a short explanation with regard to a portion of my speech in reply to the Amendment to the Address, moved by the hon. Member for West Belfast. I find that in some quarters I have been supposed to have implied that there had been delay on the part of the Land Commission in issuing rules under the Purchase of Land Act, 1891. I thought, and I think hon. Members who were present will agree with me, that it was clear that the rules about which I was then speaking were the Treasury rules referred to in the question of the hon. Member for West Cavan, which has just been answered. As a matter of fact, as was stated in my speech, the rules for which the Land Commissioners were responsible were issued within ten days after the passing of the Act.

PENSIONS TO IRISH TEACHERS.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he could lay soon upon the Table a Return showing the calculations on which the present issue of pensions to Irish teachers is based, and also Returns showing why such calculations are now held to be insufficient without reinforcing the reserve by £90,000 of Irish money?

MR. JACKSON : The subject-matter of this question is one for the Treasury rather than the Irish Government. But I have no doubt the hon. and gallant Member will receive full information on the matter when the Supplementary Estimate dealing with the £90,000 is before the House.

THE IRISH EDUCATION BILL.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland when will the Irish Education Bill be distributed?

MR. JACKSON : I am anxious that the Irish Education Bill should be in the hands of Members as soon as possible, and every effort is being made to have it immediately distributed.

INTERMEDIATE EXAMINATIONS IN IRELAND.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, in reference to the charge of 3s. 7d. for each certificate of birth which has to be paid by children intending to compete at the intermediate examinations in Ireland, whether the Government will telegraph immediate instructions to the registrars in Ireland to charge only a nominal fee (as is done in England under the Elementary Education Act), in view of the fact that these certificates must be procured before the end of the present month?

MR. JACKSON : The charge of 3s. 7d. is, I find, a statutable fee, and even if considered advisable, there is no power to adopt the course suggested in the question. It is, moreover, to be borne in mind that such fees are the only sources of income of the superintendent registrars, and that the ability to pay on the part of intermediate education candidates is far greater than that of those coming under the elementary education system.

OPEN AIR MEETINGS IN LONDON.

MR. JAMES ROWLANDS (Finsbury, East) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will grant a Return of the places available for open air meeting in London, referred to by him in his answer to the deputation on Tuesday?

MR. MATTHEWS : I have no objection to give a Return of the places where open air meetings can lawfully be held in the Metropolis, and I will lay it on the Table in a day or two, or as soon as it can be prepared.

TUNNEL RAILWAYS IN THE METROPOLIS.

MR. T. H. BOLTON (St. Pancras, North): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he will arrange to refer all Bills before Parliament relating to tunnel railways in the Metropolis, to a Hybrid Committee or to a Joint Committee of both Houses of Parliament, with power to consider the policy to be adopted with regard to such railways, and the conditions and regulations to be applied to the same in the interest of the public?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir MICHAEL HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): It has been usual or a Bill of this kind to be referred to a Hybrid Committee, but it is a matter for the House itself to decide.

UNCLAIMED BALANCES OF DECEASED SOLDIERS.

MR. HANBURY (Preston): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the total unclaimed balances of deceased soldiers now amount to a considerable sum, many of them exceeding £20 in the case of individual soldiers; and in what newspapers commonly read by soldiers and their relatives are these balances and the names of the soldiers leaving them published, and how often annually?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: The unclaimed balances of deceased soldiers amount to a considerable sum; and, after being advertised for seven years, are handed over to the Royal Patriotic Fund for distribution in accordance with the Regimental Debts Act. Balances of individual estates frequently exceed £20. The balances are advertised in the London Gazette and in the monthly Army List; and the lists are exposed at the headquarters of regimental districts. Very little practical result was found to be brought about by advertising in newspapers.

PENSIONERS AND RESERVE MEN EMPLOYED BY THE WAR OFFICE.

MR. HANBURY (Preston): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether any reduction of, or deduction from, the usual wages is made in any of the departments or factories connected with the War Office in the case of pensioners or Reserve men; and, whether, irrespective of their pension or Reserve pay, these men receive the same treatment in all respects when in Government employment as an ordinary civilian doing similar work would receive?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: There is no distinction in any respect between the treatment accorded in any department of Army administration to pensioners and Reserve men as compared with civilians employed on similar work. If my hon. Friend is aware of any case leading to a contrary impression I shall be glad if he will bring it to my notice.

COSTS IN CHANCERY SUITS.

MR. DUNCAN (Barrow-in-Furness): I beg to ask the Attorney General whether his attention has been called to the case of Essen v. Weldon, in which it was shown that in the course of an administration suit in the Chancery Division an estate of more than £2,000 net had been reduced by costs to such an extent that no more than £280 was left for the residuary legatee; and whether he is prepared to offer some proposal for the amendment of the procedure in administration of estates in Chancery, so devised that it will not be possible to swallow up small estates in costs?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): The hon. Member has been entirely misinformed as to the circumstances alluded to in the question. The actual amount of the money paid into Court was £2,139. Of this sum no less than £1,465 was paid away to 40 different creditors of the intestate. The whole costs incurred were £435 8s. 1d., of which £202 were the costs of the executors and residuary legatee herself. The costs were, I think, certainly increased by reason of there being a dispute between the parties interested, the will being in favour of a person who was no relation of the deceased, his wife and family being entirely excluded. The Lord Chancellor proposed last year and hopes again to introduce a measure for dealing specially with the administration of small estates, and he is now being assisted by a Committee of Judges with reference thereto.

THE BRITISH EAST AFRICA COMPANY.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, West): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, with regard to the Supplementary Estimate for the Mombasa and Nyassa Railway, whether he will state to the House how much of the money has been spent and how much of the survey completed; and whether the money is payed to the surveyors and engineers employed, or to the British East Africa Company?

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): My right hon. Friend has asked me to reply. I have to say that the preliminary survey for the Mombasa and Victoria Nyanza Railway was begun in December last, and that the latest information which we have received shows that, on 22nd January, the surveying parties had reached a point on the Tzavo river about 150 miles from the coast. When the Supplementary Estimate for this survey was withdrawn at the end of last Session under circumstances which will be in the recollection of the House, I stated in the strongest terms that the withdrawal was not to be held to imply any change in the policy of the Government. The action we took was as follows:—We made arrangements with the company that they should proceed with the survey, the expenses being met by them, and the Government, on their part, giving a pledge that they would ask the House to vote the money at the earliest opportunity, in order to reimburse the company for expenditure upon the expedition to the amount of £20,000. Under this arrangement the cost of the survey has hitherto been met by the company, and none of the money which the House is asked to vote has been actually spent. The money, when voted, will be paid to the British East Africa Company. I should add that the company is responsible for the conduct of the expedition, but that the engineer in charge of the survey, Captain Macdonald, R.E., is appointed by the Government, and will make a Report to the Government.

SIR W. HAROURT (Derby): Before this Vote is taken I should like to know whether the Government propose to lay on the Table any papers relating to East Africa and the East Africa Company, and their relations with the Government, and the territory through which the railway will go? What I ask is whether the Government propose to offer to the House any information with reference to the undertaking generally?

MR. GOSCHEN: We hope that papers on the survey and the territories through which the railway would pass will be in the hands of hon. Members to-morrow. I think they contain full details of the cost of the survey. I cannot promise papers as to the standing of the East Africa Company, and I do not know if such papers exist, but I hope the House will feel that the Government have afforded all necessary and proper information for the discussion of the Vote.

SIR WILLIAM HAROURT: What about Captain Lugard's Report?

*MR. GOSCHEN: I do not know that Captain Lugard has reported in any way to Her Majesty's Government, and I do not think his Report bears on this particular question. Certainly Her Majesty's Government have no official cognisance of him in the matter, but inquiries will be made.

SIR WILLIAM HAROURT: It was a Report to the East India Company last year, and it purported to be a preliminary survey of the whole of this country. I should like to know whether that Report will be laid upon the Table?

*MR. GOSCHEN: I will certainly see that that shall be done, if it can be conveniently done.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): Will the Charter be included in the papers?

MR. GOSCHEN: No.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): What is the expenditure incurred by the Company?

*MR. GOSCHEN: We have no knowledge of the amount spent on the survey up to date, and, the expenditure having taken place in Africa, I doubt whether the Company themselves know what it has been. We have, however, had a most careful estimate prepared, which puts the amount at om between £16,000 and £18,000 to pwards of £20,000. Every care has been taken to secure the accuracy of that estimate. As to the Charter, I am not sure that I can undertake to lay it on the Table to-morrow, but I would remind the House that the money asked for is only for the preliminary survey, and does not in any way pledge the House to any future action.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton) : Will the right hon. Gentleman able to tell us what is the precise financial position of the Chartered Company at the present moment, and also, view of his statement that papers to be laid on the Table, may we not take it for granted that the vote will come on to-night ?

MR. MORTON (Peterborough) : I understand that the Government have not yet spent any of this money. May I have they in any way pledged the assent of this country to any portion of it before getting the consent of the House ?

MR. GOSCHEN : We have pledged ourselves to the company to submit this estimate to the House, and we shall do our best to pass it. We have entered into no contract with the company to pay them money. The company has itself undertaken this survey at a considerable expense, and we shall ask the House to grant money to reimburse part of the expense. It would be very convenient that the House should take the Supplementary Estimates up to this point this evening, so that this Vote might stand first on the Order Paper for the next sitting, as it will, doubtless, interest Members in all parts of the House.

THE VETERINARY DEPARTMENT.

MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.) : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether, having regard to the uncertainty of outbreaks of contagious disease requiring the vigilance of the Veterinary Department, he will take steps to obtain the whole time of the Director and Officers of the Department ?

MR. CHAPLIN : I am informed by Professor Brown, the Director of the Veterinary Branch of the Department over which I preside, that at the present moment he holds the positions of Principal of the Royal Veterinary College and Lecturer upon Cattle Pathology. Professor Brown has, however, resigned the Lectureship, and his resignation will take effect at the end of the current term, but he proposes to retain the Principalship of the College, without salary, although it is possible that some honorarium may be assigned to him. Notwithstanding the fact that Professor Brown has held the appointments referred to, it has always been recognised by him that his whole time is at the disposal of the Board. It has always been considered that Professor Brown's connection with the College has been of the greatest service to the Department, inasmuch as it has enabled him to keep constantly in touch with the most recent scientific work. No other officer of the Veterinary Department holds any other salaried professional appointment, and in every case the officer's whole time is available for the work of the Board. During the recent outbreak the services of the veterinary staff have been constantly available, both in and out of office hours, every day.

THE GOVERNMENT CLOTHING FACTORY, PIMLICO.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War what is the rate of wages paid to cutters at the Government Factory, Pimlico, and the number of hours per week worked by them ; when the last rise of wages or reduction of hours took place ; and whether he is aware that the wages of cutters outside Government employment have been materially raised within the last fifteen years, and that the almost universal practice in the trade now is to pay cutters wages of 40s. for a week of 50 hours ?

*MR. E. STANHOPE : Cutters at the Clothing Factory on the best class of work receive from 36s. to 39s. a week ; there are some employed on inferior work who receive 30s. a week. The hours of work per week are 54. Wages and hours have not varied for fifteen years. Inquiries have been made into the practice in the trade outside, and I am informed that when the continuity of employment, the leave with pay, medical attendance, and other advantages are taken into account, the Government employment compares favourably with any to be obtained in the private trade.

OVERLOADING PROSECUTIONS.

MR. STAVELEY HILL (Staffordshire, Kingswinford): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he can inform the House how many prosecutions for overloading have been instituted by the Board of Trade since he became President; the number of convictions obtained; and what has been the total cost to the Department of these prosecutions?

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: Between 18th February, 1888, and the present date, there have been 88 prosecutions for submerging load-line discs (in contravention of Section 28 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1876), and convictions have resulted in 77 cases. During the same period 53 prosecutions in connection with 52 vessels (39 Foreign and 13 British) have been instituted for breaches of Section 24 of the same Act, in bringing illegal deck cargoes into ports in the United Kingdom, and 50 convictions have been obtained. Proceedings have been instituted against eight British and three foreign ships for proceeding to sea in defiance of detention for overloading, or improper loading, and convictions obtained under Section 34 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1876, in ten cases. Leaving out of consideration a few unsettled accounts, the total cost of the prosecutions to which I have referred has been under £1,200.

THE INSPECTION OF THE RIVER SHANNON.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what has been done since the inspection of the River Shannon by Mr. Berrington, the English Inspector of Fisheries, to prevent the injuries likely to be caused by the drainage works being executed by the Board of Works to the fisheries of that river; and, if he will lay upon the Table copies of any correspondence between the Board of Works, the Inspectors of Irish Fisheries, the Conservators of Fisheries of the Limerick District, or the Government on the subject since the date of Mr. Berrington's Report?

SIR JOHN GORST: I am informed that the Board of Works has requested the Fishery Inspectors to get their own engineer to make a thorough examination of all the works, with the view of preventing such injuries as are suggested in the question. There is no correspondence at this stage which I can lay on the Table of the House.

SALMON FISHERIES.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether Lord Ventry has established his right to a general fishery near Brandon, County Kerry, within half a-mile from the mouth of the river Clohane; if not, why has he not been prosecuted, as a number of fishermen have been, for netting within the half-mile limit? Was this prosecution of the fishermen conducted in the names of the Clerk of the Limerick District Board of Conservators at Lord Ventry's instance, and did the skipper of Lord Ventry's boat receive a portion of the fines; and do the Crown admit Lord Ventry's title or his right to the fines; and, if not, will he be prosecuted for netting within the half-mile limit, like other fishermen, until his alleged rights are legally established?

MR. MADDEN: I am informed that Lord Ventry's fishery extends to within half a-mile of the river Clohane. The prosecutions referred to were undertaken by the Clerk to the Limerick Board of Conservators; and the fishermen employed by Lord Ventry, having been the informants, received a portion of the fines. So far as proceedings are concerned against Lord Ventry to establish his claim, the Inspectors of Fisheries do not contemplate taking such a course.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman what is the position of the Crown in this matter. Lord Ventry enjoys several fisheries in these waters. Does the Crown recognise his right? Is it to be ten that because Lord Ventry puts private Board in motion that he himself is entitled by the mere assertion of these rights to have other objects of Her Majesty fined, and that the Crown will stand idly by without inquiring as to his rights?

MR. MADDEN: No facts have come to my notice to suggest any question as to the validity of Lord Ventry's rights, and I do not see why the Government should interfere in the matter.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Does the right hon. Gentleman, on behalf of the Crown, consider that Lord Ventry has these fisheries to the exclusion of other subjects of Her Majesty? Is Lord Ventry any title to this right?

MR. MADDEN: It is not the duty of the Government to call on persons to assert and prove their right to property of which they are in enjoyment.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Will the right hon. Gentleman be good enough to order a prosecution to be instituted against Lord Ventry, so that if Lord Ventry raises the question of title the matter could be taken to a superior court?

MR. MADDEN: I think the hon. learned Gentleman must see the reasonableness of his suggestion, that without any facts whatever before me I should order these proceedings. If my person disputes Lord Ventry's title it is open to him to take proceedings.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Can the right hon. Gentleman intervene to prevent the Limerick Board of Conservators being prosecutors, and instruct them to leave Lord Ventry to assert his title?

MR. MADDEN: I have no control whatever over the Limerick Board of Conservators, nor has any Department of the Government.

ORD KENMARE AND HIS TENANTRY.

MR. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if his attention has been called to the proceedings at Bantry Quarter Sessions early in February, at which a tenant named John Keohane brought an action against Edward Godfrey, P.L.G., estate bailiff to Lord Kenmare, for illegal seizures and distressment of cattle. Is he aware that it was proved at these proceedings that Lord Kenmare used to charge 12s. for every distress warrant against his tenants, whether executed or not, and appropriated these illegal charges to his own use; and, in view of the fact that Lord Kenmare is a justice of the peace, as well as his agent, Mr. Maurice Leonard, will the Lord Chancellor take notice of these proceedings?

MR. MADDEN: I must ask the hon. Gentleman to postpone his question till to-morrow.

MEMBERS' LETTERS.

MR. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he will explain upon what principle Members of this House are charged additional fees upon letters addressed to the House of Commons, but which are re-directed to the Member's private address; and, if he will consider the propriety of redressing this grievance by abolishing these additional fees?

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: Members' letters have no privilege of postage, and, when re-directed, are liable to charge like other letters, except when they are re-directed to an address within the same postal delivery as the original address. Re-direction of letters from the House of Commons to any address within the London area is made, therefore, without charge, but, if the second address is beyond the London area, the letters are liable to charge for re-direction. It is, however, in contemplation to abolish the re-direction charges on letters generally.

THE CASE OF MR. MONTAGU.

MR. P. O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Constabulary Sergeant Shier, of Portstewart, twice visited the house of Mr. Montagu, J.P., on the 14th instant, the day after the death of his child, Mary Helen Montagu, and obtained full information as to the cause of death, and the name of Mrs. Montagu, mother of the child, as the person alleged to have caused the death; whether the information so obtained was communicated to District

without the money, I think we may take it from this. But if the Estimates are looked into, I think it will be found that the other parts of the Empire have an advantage over us in respect of money given to the Universities; and I think that it ought to be taken out of the ordinary expenditure for the year. As for the rest of the money, as I have said, the Government give it in relief of rates. For want of any more definite claim on the part of the Scotch people, I should have been content to see it given over to the Town Councils and County Councils, but for definite purposes which could not otherwise be met out of the rates. And, at any rate, I would at least bargain for this: that if the proposal of the Government be adopted, if the money is to be given over to the Town Councils and County Councils, surely they need not be tied down to apply it for the relief of the rates. I think we might at least strike out these words "for the relief of the rates" from the Vote which is on the Table when we come to deal with the definite words, and leave it to the discretion of Town Councils and County Councils. These are the observations which occur to me. I cannot express too strongly my opinion that the whole of these proceedings are slip-shod finance, and slip-shod administration. That is not our fault. We have to make the best of it. I have said that the proposal to hand over the money for the relief of rates for the present year may be accepted. It may be inevitable in the present state of public opinion, but we should be slow to pledge ourselves, by actual statute, either to any fixed sum, or to objects which we are not certain will satisfy the Scotch people.

<sup>*(5.45.)</sup> MR. RONALD C. MUNRO FERGUSON (Leith, &c.): I think the majority of the Scotch Members who have listened to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down will agree very heartily with the expressions which he has used in regard to this Bill; and I sincerely hope that this may be the last time we shall be called upon in this House to discuss an equivalent grant. When a generous Government scatters bounty over the land like this we find that the money is wasted, and we find that the local administration becomes entirely disorganised. Now, with regard to the specific proposals of the Government, I also very much regret that no place has been found amongst them with regard to primary education. So far as secondary education is concerned, I believe that we are not yet provided with a plan which would warrant such large expenditure as is sometimes proposed for that very necessary branch of education, but a large sum may very well be voted for that purpose. Again, with regard to technical education we find no provision whatever made under the proposals of the Government; and so far from making any provision for it, the County Councils are absolutely prohibited from undertaking further work in connection with this case. The County Council with which I am connected myself have shown no disposition to spend this grant in relief of the rates. As it is desirous of carrying on technical education, and as there are quarters in England where the sum of £750,000 has been spent by County Councils in connection with agricultural and other forms of education, I feel that in Scotland we will be placed at a very serious disadvantage if we are to be prohibited from undertaking a work which is doing so much good throughout the whole of the counties of England. The Universities are to be given £30,000, and, knowing as I do the necessity for a grant of that character, I must confess that I do not see my way to oppose it in any form whatever. But, at the same time, I should be very much surprised to find much enthusiasm on behalf of this proposal amongst hon. Members on this side. Our chief knowledge of the Universities on this side is that we find their representatives ranged against us upon every possible occasion, and instead of men of science or men of high culture being sent to represent the Universities here, we find a lawyer or a politician coming to this House in order to pursue Party purposes. I do not think that this is a recommendation which will enable hon. Members on this side of the House to receive the proposals of the Government as well as they might otherwise

At the same time, I think that it has been said, that the University grants should come from the ordinary taxation of the country, is extremely ; and I think that the money for Universities ought to have come of the Treasury in the ordinary n instead of that in which it now ears before the House. The £25,000 ich is to go to the relief of charge for the pauper lunatics uld also come under the same d. A statement has been t round by the Parochial Board ich demands that some contribution uld be made towards the support the pauper lunatics. It shows that rate in Scotland amounts to about a week, while in England it is fixed 4s. a week. I think here, again, is not an occasion for making emand upon the equivalent grant, it is an occasion demanding that Chancellor of the Exchequer shall at Scotland upon equal terms with gland. With regard to the expenditure on medical relief and those other tters, they should more properly come ore the Committee on the equalisa- a of the burdens of local taxation n different parts of the United gdom which is now sitting. I irely agree with what my right Friend has said in regard the objects to which it should be igatory upon the Local Authorities give the money that should come to under this grant. I think some d might be done if this money were nt for public libraries, for baths, for improvement of public parks, and other necessary purposes, such as hnical education, or in the con- uction of harbours or new works, ich are very much required. In ss-shire the demand for new rks and harbours is very great. I nk these are matters to which we gt perfectly well devote the money ich is to come to us under the pro- als of the Government. The whole item of these grants I think is irely unsatisfactory ; and as these miscuous bounties descending upon lead to a very bad system of ad- nistration, I sincerely trust that we the last occasion upon which this y be done. I think there has been immense amount of money wasted, and I think it upsets the whole system of Imperial finance.

*(5.53.) MR. JAMES SOMER- VELL (Ayr, &c.): We have already taken advantage in Scotland of the grants from Imperial taxation to give free education to Scotland, and the only subject that remains now is to see whether we will adopt the English practice and give this grant entirely to the relief of rates, or whether it is in accordance with the feeling of the people of Scotland, to give a portion to improve the education which has been already made free. I think that the remark of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Stirling Burghs as regards this amount being stereotyped is a very forcible one. We were told that this sum of £265,000 is more than originally was calculated would come to Scotland, and, as the calculation was wrong in the past, it very probably will be equally wrong in the future, and as education and the number of children must increase in England, so the share to Scotland will be considerably increased, and I hope, in a few years, will amount to £300,000. If that is the case, I think this measure should state the manner of allocation. It is right that a certain sum should be stereotyped. I think it is perfectly right if the Universities are to receive £30,000, that sum should be definitely fixed. I have very great sympathy with the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Stirling Burghs upon this Vote. I think it very hard upon Scotland that this £30,000 should be taken out of this money. I think that money should be given alto- gether out of the general finances of the country. The right hon. Gentleman rather sneered at the members of the local Town Councils and County Coun- cils in effecting economy and reducing the rates. I would remind him that he is the representative of the same electors as have returned these bodies ; and that, while it is their duty to diminish the rates as far as they can, the same electors would be very thankful if the right hon. Gentleman, in his place in Parliament, would do his utmost to get a grant by which the rates should be reduced. The right

aware, with the unanimous consent of the representatives of Scotland. I hope and believe that the average Scotch ratepayer is a Scotchman first and a ratepayer afterwards, and that if a really strong claim is made for spending a portion of this money for a purpose which is in accordance with the traditions and history of Scotland, and which will result in much benefit at comparatively small expenditure, the ratepayer will be quite willing not only to consider the proposals on their merits, but also to accept them if they are in the direction of the general improvement of the community in which he shares. With reference to the allocation of the £110,000 I have referred to, the Government have considered themselves bound by the indication—to place it no higher—which was given last year with reference to the destination of that money; and therefore we propose in the Bill to hand it over to the Town and County Councils, on the same basis of allocation as was adopted in regard to the Local Taxation grant—on the basis of valuation. I believe, at all events, that the voting of the whole of the money to the Town and County Councils was a thing which had been reckoned upon, and in certain instances reckoned upon practically and acted upon, not altogether without warrant, and therefore I hope there will be a general acquiescence in that mode of dealing with the sum which arises during the current year. With regard to the future, we propose to devote a certain amount to other purposes. The fund, as I have indicated, is more than has been anticipated, and of that amount of £265,000, which will be the amount when on a permanent basis, we propose to allocate £175,000 in relief of rates. Of that sum, £100,000 we propose should go to the Town and County Councils on the same footing as the £110,000 I have already dealt with, and we propose that the balance of £75,000 should be handed to the Parochial Boards, to be applied by them, to the extent of £25,000, towards the cost of maintenance of the pauper lunatics, and as regards the rest of it, namely £50,000, in relief of the local rates levied by those bodies. We believe that will be regarded as no unsubstantial benefit to the ratepayers in the way of relieving the burdens which have been imposed upon them by the increasing expenses of local administration; and, getting that benefit as they will, we further believe they will be willing, as we think the public opinion of Scotland will be willing, that the remainder of the money should be devoted to other purposes of the nature I have indicated. We therefore propose to devote a large sum out of the balance of £90,000 which remains, to the improvement and development of secondary education. We believe that this object is one which is not only in accord with the traditions of Scotland, but also is one that directly affects every class of the people, and certainly I do not think that the ratepayers of Scotland, considered as a class, will be the persons the least interested in this mode of expending the equivalent grant. I do not believe that there is any class of the community who will be more grateful for it, and I believe, further, they will be quite willing in lieu of the fair fee that many are prepared to give for the higher education of those dependent upon them—they will not be unwilling to grant the benefits of higher education, sought for and obtained through the means of this grant, wisely expended, to those who cannot afford to pay for it. I apprehend one of the objections which may fairly be taken to the present state of things is this, that a child has to be sent to a distance, and perhaps to be boarded, in order to obtain that higher education which, in the belief of many, was practically given under the old system of parochial and burgh schools. It is undoubtedly a hardship in some quarters that the advance and development of elementary education has been accompanied with some amount of detriment to higher education. That development has fallen heavily on the rates, but it has led to the opportunities for secondary education being restricted in more directions than one. I may remind the House as an illustration that the burgh schools were put under the School Board by the Education Act of 1872, but they were not eligible for the grant, and in consequence, the School Boards had a natural disinclination to spend the rates in an undue amount upon them. They have in some instances been conducted with increasing difficulty, and that has led to a certain extent to a decrease in the efficiency; that, again, tends to the increase of the fees, and the result in some cases is that the school goes down, the children attend elsewhere, and the place in which the school is situated is deprived of some, at least, of the advantages it used to enjoy as an educational centre. That is not a fancy picture, but has been realised in certain parts of Scotland, and is within the knowledge of Members on both sides of the House. We propose that the amount to be devoted to this purpose should be £60,000 out of the £90,000, and that the distribution of it should be in accordance with the Minutes of the Education Department to be laid before Parliament. I shall take leave to reserve the more detailed development of what is proposed until a later stage.

DR. CLARK: Do you include Technical Education under Secondary Education?

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: I rather think not, but the hon. Member will take my answer subject to correction. The only features which I should venture to lay before the House at this stage are these: In the first place we desire, as far as possible, to combine those pupils who can pay a moderate fee with those who cannot in this matter of secondary education, and we propose that such conditions should be made as to secure this combination. In the second place, while undoubtedly undue and unfair competition with voluntary schools ought to be avoided as much as possible, yet we believe there may be found, or, if not found, may be created, in the large centres of population particularly, a school under public management that would be the proper recipient of this part of the grant. And in the third place, while we have no desire—but the contrary—to interfere with the development of elementary education, and the increasing thoroughness of it, we believe that the requirements of secondary education will not be fully met without encouraging, where the locality admits of it, and where it is considered fitting to do so, the higher grade departments in the ordinary schools. These have already been developed satisfactorily, with good results in some places, and although the conditions of the Code are well suited to elementary education, it is felt that they do not adapt themselves so well to the higher or secondary education, and, therefore, that the work in that direction would be conducted more efficiently if such departments formed a portion of a large scheme for the organisation of the higher education of Scotland. Well, the sum I have mentioned as proposed to be devoted to this object is, I am aware, not so large as the most earnest advocates of secondary education might desire; but, at the same time, we have considered the necessities of the case and have inquired into the existing means for the furtherance of this important branch of the educational system of Scotland, and we have come to the conclusion that with the sum I have named we shall be able to do much to stimulate the higher education; to perfect the existing system, and to carry it further in the direction I have indicated, so as to make it more national in its character. There remains a sum of £30,000. The topic to which I have just adverted leads naturally to the Universities of Scotland, and we propose that this balance of £30,000 should be handed over to the Universities of Scotland, to be distributed amongst them in accordance with an ordinance of the existing University Commissioners. It is known to hon. Members that a Commission has been sitting under the Act of 1889, and that they have developed in certain directions schemes which will require additional pecuniary aid to carry them out, and it is thought the sum I have named will go far, if not wholly, to meet the pressing necessities of the case, having regard to the ordinances already presented and about to be issued by the Commissioners; will go so far as to enable these Commissioners to carry through the much desired and much needed reforms of Universities, and therefore the balance of £30,000 we propose to devote to that object in the mode which I have described. That, Sir, is a very brief and imperfect description of the proposals of the Government in the Bill which I now ask leave to introduce.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That leave be given to bring in a Bill to make provision in regard to the Distribution and Application of sums from time to time paid to the Local Taxation (Scotland) Account, and in regard to the fee grant in Scotland."—(The Lord Advocate.)

*(5.15.) MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.): I am not unmindful of the presence of my right hon. Friend the Chairman of Ways and Means, and of the authoritative admonition which he addressed to us a few nights ago in regard to the imprudence of discussing a Bill before seeing it in print. Upon this occasion I am not quite sure that the prudent course he referred to can altogether be followed, because these are matters with which we are familiar, and the nature of the proposals is such, that I think we are about as well qualified to discuss them now as at any other period in the proceedings. The first observation I have to make affects the form, not the substance, of the proposals by which the Government have thought it right to deal with this matter. They still divide the money that is coming to us into two portions; they deal with these two portions separately. They deal with the money which has accrued in the present financial year differently from the rest of the money. It is not divided between the Universities and secondary education and the Town and County Councils and Parochial Boards, but it is handed over entirely to the County and Town Councils for the relief of the rates. Why should this difference be made? Last year the right hon. Gentleman's predecessor—and I ought, by the way, to thank the right hon. Gentleman for the admirable clearness with which he stated his case—the late Lord Advocate, on the 9th June, broadly stated the various claims that had been made on this money, and he said that it was so difficult to decide between them, and our knowledge, especially on the matter of education, was so imperfect, that the Government would devote the Autumn to the consideration of the matter, and would therefore not proceed with their scheme until this Session. But the money that was accruing during this year they proposed immediately to deal with. It was regarded as urgent, and, therefore, the right hon. Gentleman said—"As we have not time as regards this £110,000 to consider how it should be apportioned among the various claimants, we will, without prejudicing the course we may take with regard to the annual sum afterwards, simply hand this money over to County Councils and Town Councils for the relief of rates." There was something to be said for that course then; but there is nothing to be said for it now. I cannot see any reason why this sum should not be distributed in the same proportions as it is proposed to apply to the annual income. But something has happened since then, and I wish to call the attention of the House to it. The Government consider themselves pledged to give this £110,000 to Town and County Councils. And why? Because certain Town Councils—I do not know whether any County Councils—have actually proceeded upon the supposition that the money would be given to them. They have reckoned on it in their annual budgets, and if they do not get this money they will have, by a rate, to meet a deficit. This must seem to us a very imprudent and foolish course on the part of a public body. I can quote no higher authority than the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Speaking on the 31st July last year on this very question, he said—alluding to a statement made that action had already been taken upon the view that a particular class of ratepayers would receive it—that the course was premature—

* Because the mere opinion of a Minister that a certain course will be taken cannot be assumed to afford a basis for administrative action."

That is true doctrine, because any other doctrine would involve that this House was to be set aside as of no consequence, that there was no probability of our altering in any way the proposals of the Government, and it even would deny to the Government the opportunity of changing their mind. Therefore, up to this point, we are driven to the conviction that these local bodies have done something very foolish and improper. But that is not so, because what did these local bodies do? The principal among them, the Corporation of Glasgow, had some of its representatives in London. They went to the Scotch Office, and asked the officials of the Scotch Office whether they would be justified in counting upon this money, and they were told that they were justified; they were told the exact amount they would receive; they were informed that cheques were being written out, and thus, upon the mere statement of a Minister that it was the intention of the Government, in an Estimate that had never been before the House, to take at some future period of the Session a certain course, not only the House of Commons but the Government itself was actually set aside by the officials of the Scotch Office. I venture to say that it was a breach of duty on the part of those officials, and I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman who represents that Office (although I fear he has very little practical acquaintance with it) what has happened to the official who gave this reply? Has he been rebuked for it? Because I think I have never known in the whole course of my acquaintance with public Departments anything more improper on the part of public officials; because it compromises the freedom of the House of Commons, and supersedes Parliamentary action altogether. The truth is that this is only another of the little proofs we receive from time to time of the evil which arises from the fact of the Scotch Minister being in the other House of Parliament. If the Scotch Minister had been in this House he would have known the situation better, and would have been aware that they could not count upon the distribution of the money among local authorities until the Vote had actually passed the Committee of this House. That is a matter by the way, but I think it deserves some attention on account of its importance.

Come now to the proposals. The Government propose to proceed first by Vote for this year for the purpose of relieving the rates, and hereafter by Bill. Now the question occurs to us at once. Why by Bill? There may be advantages; it may in some respects be necessary to have a Bill, but it is perfectly evident that there are one or two very serious objections to proceeding to deal by a Bill. In the first place, it destroys, as I understand it, our chance of benefiting by the elasticity of the sum involved. As I understand, Scotland and Ireland are to receive certain grants annually as an equivalent for the sum which is to be expended in England for the abolition of fees. The sum to be expended in England is 10s. per child upon the average attendance, and this sum is calculated upon the statistics of three years ago. These statistics are not stereotyped. The population is increasing, and, even if the population were not increasing, we hope that under the benefits of free education there will be an increase in the attendance, so that there is every chance that a larger sum, if this doctrine of equivalents is to be kept up, will be available year by year. We are accustomed now-a-days, under the influence of our Separatist Chancellor of the Exchequer, to consider with great nicety, and to weigh the balance carefully, between the three Kingdoms, and I really think, if this principle is a proper one, the amount ought to be a moveable sum. The Bill, however, will stereotype it, and it will stereotype not only the sum to be treated under it, but also the objects to which it is to be applied. There may be differences of opinion even on this side of the House with regard to these objects; but I think no one will dispute that there is at least no very fixed opinion in Scotland with regard to the distribution of this money. I have endeavoured, to the best of my power, to gather the opinions of my constituents and others. I gather that there are some things that they do not like, but I have not been able to get much light upon the particular things which they desire. I have said that we have a Separatist Chancellor of the Exchequer, but it is not in that respect that he is peculiar; because we have had these sums dangled before the Scotch people from year to year, and they have been invited to say what they wanted, and what they would spend them upon, when really they had expressed no very definite desire for money of this kind at all. Ordinarily, it would seem that a Finance Minister should consider what were the financial requirements of the year, fix his taxes to meet those requirements, and then invite the people to bear them; but our Chancellor of the Exchequer lays on the taxes, and then asks the people what they want the money spent upon. Members on both sides of the House will admit that the Scotch people, in regard to the greater part of this money, have no very definite feeling whatever, and therefore it seems to me that it would be undesirable that we should embody this temporary allocation in a Bill; that we should embody in a Bill something which cannot be altered, not only without the difficulty of passing a Bill through the House of Commons, but without the consent of the House of Lords, which body may take a very different view from ours upon Scotch matters. Again, I say, we have a very peculiar Chancellor of the Exchequer. This is not the first occasion, nor even the second or third, upon which expenditure which should be voted by the representatives of the tax-payers has been stereotyped—I do not say in order to deprive, but with the effect of depriving Parliament in future Sessions of having the free disposal of its own money. I will not dwell upon these extraordinary arrangements further; upon this see-saw between the countries—one always having to receive something equivalent to a grant of some sort given to the other the year before—nor upon the sort of Dutch auction in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has been engaged. But coming to the purposes to which it is proposed to apply this money, I would say, speaking for myself, I am entirely opposed to giving it to any Body whatever for the mere relief of the rates. I have no objection indeed to assisting from the general taxation local expenditure in a proper way. Local expenditure does bear heavily in many instances, and I have no objection to assistance being given towards definite objects and in a definite proportion, and so as not to invalidate in any way the direct pecuniary responsibility and sense of responsibility on the part of administering bodies. But I can conceive nothing more demoralising or ineffective than the mere handing over—flinging—a lump of money to people, saying “Here, if you are short of money you may make it up out of that. We do not care much what particular object this relief shall be applied to. Relieve your rates, make yourselves popular, and leave us alone.” It will be said there is an almost unanimous opinion, from Town Councils especially and Parochial Boards, in favour of getting this money. I do not wonder at it, and I do not blame them for it. If I were a member of a Town Council or a Parochial Board I should be very anxious to make my short reign of office popular by reducing or keeping down the rates. But I have observed a remarkable uniformity and almost identity in the terms of the memorials on the subject, not indicating that voluntary and spontaneous action which one would expect; and I find that, unanimously, the members of these very bodies, which have memorialised in favour of the money being used in relief of rates, are ready to admit in private conversation that they think this state of things is a mistake, and that although they were very glad to get it, and although it would be very useful to them, yet it is bad finance and very likely to have an evil effect in the long run. I am therefore not afraid of having the authority of these public bodies thrown at my head; but I say with regard to the Parochial Boards—the right hon. Gentleman says the Government propose to give £75,000 to the Parochial Boards—there will be a considerable feeling against that so long as the Parochial Boards are unreformed and are not thoroughly representative bodies. I conceive there is much less harm in giving, as is proposed, £25,000 for the definite purpose of relief in respect of Pauper Lunatics. This is free from some of the objections I have been urging; but to give money for the general relief of rates to bodies which do not, as a rule, command the confidence of the people is a course which ought not to be taken, although some of the large Parochial Boards, I admit, are extremely well administered, and not open to any criticism of that sort. But I have another objection with regard to this relief rates. Not only, as I consider, would it be about the least proper pose to which he could apply this money, but also the relief would be given to the wrong people. I am not going to enter at this stage into the details of Scotch rating, but undoubtedly in many cases this relief will go into the pockets of the landlords, and in towns the sensible relief will go to larger ratepayers, the manufacturers and large shopkeepers, while the benefit the working classes will obtain is practically infinitesimal. Each man may have a halfpenny, or a penny, or twice as his proportion; and when we consider that it is the working classes that contribute the greater part of the money out of which this is to be paid, I think it furnishes an additional, and perhaps a stronger, argument than those I have already adduced. These are the views I entertain. I am aware that some of my friends may have other views; but I thought it right frankly to state the very strong feeling I have on the subject. Now, what are the other expenses to which the money is to be applied? The right hon. Gentleman did not say anything about compelling the freedom from fees of the primary schools. That, I understand, was not included. I deeply regret that a cession of the Government; and my impression is that even those most strongly in favour of obtaining all they can get in relief of rates, and who are perfectly fanatical against secondary education, will admit that the completion of free primary education was a very first charge upon this money, and I regret that the Government have omitted it. Then I go on to secondary education. Well, I am very pleased to hear from the right hon. Gentleman that the Government are going to give so large a sum of money for this purpose; not so much that it is wanted in the towns or populous places, or in cases where there are School Boards, over a very large area, which can make special arrangements to meet the case; but I have rather in mind the country districts and sparsely populated districts where we have undoubtedly fallen back. I hope I shall not be held to be at all offensive when I say that we have fallen down towards the English level. We have lost a great deal of the old superiority we had, when we gave in all the parochial schools higher education to the sons of the people. I am quite sure of this, that no Scotchman will express in this Debate or in any other Debate any jealousy of secondary education. The old theory that continuation schools and opportunities for higher education—scientific, literary, and technical—were peculiarly for the middle-class population, and not for the working classes—that is a theory which never had any footing in Scotland, and, I hope, never will. It is a great benefit to the poorest and humblest man in the community, as it is to the middle-class man, that there should be this opportunity all over the country for superior education, and we have not that opportunity at present. The right hon. Gentleman did not say anything—perhaps he could not say anything—as to how the Government propose to meet the difficulties of the case. That is to be done by ordinances from the Education Department. I am not sure that we are very full of, or overflowing with, faith in the Education Department. But that is a point of detail which may be more properly discussed, perhaps, at another time. I am perfectly aware of the difficulties that may arise from conflicting jurisdictions and other sources; but, at the same time, we will certainly co-operate with the Government in arriving at the best solution of it. Then the last purpose for which the money is to be given is the Universities. Speaking for myself, personally, I am in favour of giving quite as much money as this to the Universities, but I have a strong idea that we do not receive a sufficient amount of money for our Universities compared with the other countries, at present, out of the money annually voted by Parliament, and I should prefer to see this money coming out of a direct Vote on the Civil Service Estimates rather than out of this fund, to which it does not properly belong. At the same time, we must not look a gift horse in the mouth; and if money is scarce—I should much prefer to take it from other sources myself, but rather than see our Universities go without the money, I think we may take it from this. But if the Estimates are looked into, I think it will be found that the other parts of the Empire have an advantage over us in respect of money given to the Universities ; and I think that it ought to be taken out of the ordinary expenditure for the year. As for the rest of the money, as I have said, the Government give it in relief of rates. For want of any more definite claim on the part of the Scotch people, I should have been content to see it given over to the Town Councils and County Councils, but for definite purposes which could not otherwise be met out of the rates. And, at any rate, I would at least bargain for this : that if the proposal of the Government be adopted, if the money is to be given over to the Town Councils and County Councils, surely they need not be tied down to apply it for the relief of the rates. I think we might at least strike out these words "for the relief of the rates" from the Vote which is on the Table when we come to deal with the definite words, and leave it to the discretion of Town Councils and County Councils. These are the observations which occur to me. I cannot express too strongly my opinion that the whole of these proceedings are slip-shod finance, and slip-shod administration. That is not our fault. We have to make the best of it. I have said that the proposal to hand over the money for the relief of rates for the present year may be accepted. It may be inevitable in the present state of public opinion, but we should be slow to pledge ourselves, by actual statute, either to any fixed sum, or to objects which we are not certain will satisfy the Scotch people.

\(5.45.) MR. RONALD C. MUNRO FERGUSON (Leith, &c.):* I think the majority of the Scotch Members who have listened to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down will agree very heartily with the expressions which he has used in regard to this Bill ; and I sincerely hope that this may be the last time we shall be called upon in this House to discuss an equivalent grant. When a generous Government scatters bounty over the land like this we find that the money is wasted, and we find that the local administration becomes entirely disorganised. Now, with regard to the specific proposals of the Government, I also very much regret that no place has been found amongst them with regard to primary education. So far as secondary education is concerned, I believe that we are not yet provided with a plan which would warrant such large expenditure as is sometimes proposed for that very necessary branch of education, but a large sum may very well be voted for that purpose. Again, with regard to technical education we find no provision whatever made under the proposals of the Government ; and so far from making any provision for it, the County Councils are absolutely prohibited from undertaking further work in connection with this case. The County Council with which I am connected myself have shown no disposition to spend this grant in relief of the rates. As it is desirous of carrying on technical education, and as there are quarters in England where the sum of £750,000 has been spent by County Councils in connection with agricultural and other forms of education, I feel that in Scotland we will be placed at a very serious disadvantage if we are to be prohibited from undertaking a work which is doing so much good throughout the whole of the counties of England. The Universities are to be given £30,000, and, knowing as I do the necessity for a grant of that character, I must confess that I do not see my way to oppose it in any form whatever. But, at the same time, I should be very much surprised to find much enthusiasm on behalf of this proposal amongst hon. Members on this side. Our chief knowledge of the Universities on this side is that we find their representatives ranged against us upon every possible occasion, and instead of men of science or men of high culture being sent to represent the Universities here, we find a lawyer or a politician coming to this House in order to pursue Party purposes. I do not think that this is a recommendation which will enable hon. Members on this side of the House to receive the proposals of the Government as well as they might otherwise do. At the same time, I think that what has been said, that the University grants should come from the ordinary taxation of the country, is extremely fair; and I think that the money for the Universities ought to have come out of the Treasury in the ordinary form instead of that in which it now appears before the House. The £25,000 which is to go to the relief of the charge for the pauper lunatics should also come under the same head. A statement has been sent round by the Parochial Board which demands that some contribution should be made towards the support of the pauper lunatics. It shows that the rate in Scotland amounts to about 3s. a week, while in England it is fixed at 4s. a week. I think here, again, this is not an occasion for making a demand upon the equivalent grant, but it is an occasion demanding that the Chancellor of the Exchequer shall treat Scotland upon equal terms with England. With regard to the expenditure on medical relief and those other matters, they should more properly come before the Committee on the equalisation of the burdens of local taxation upon different parts of the United Kingdom which is now sitting. I entirely agree with what my right hon. Friend has said in regard to the objects to which it should be obligatory upon the Local Authorities to give the money that should come to them under this grant. I think some good might be done if this money were spent for public libraries, for baths, for the improvement of public parks, and for other necessary purposes, such as technical education, or in the construction of harbours or new works, which are very much required. In Ross-shire the demand for new works and harbours is very great. I think these are matters to which we might perfectly well devote the money which is to come to us under the proposals of the Government. The whole system of these grants I think is entirely unsatisfactory; and as these promiscuous bounties descending upon us lead to a very bad system of administration, I sincerely trust that we see the last occasion upon which this may be done. I think there has been an immense amount of money wasted, and I think it upsets the whole system of Imperial finance.

*(5.53.) MR. JAMES SOMERVELL (Ayr, &c.): We have already taken advantage in Scotland of the grants from Imperial taxation to give free education to Scotland, and the only subject that remains now is to see whether we will adopt the English practice and give this grant entirely to the relief of rates, or whether it is in accordance with the feeling of the people of Scotland, to give a portion to improve the education which has been already made free. I think that the remark of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Stirling Burghs as regards this amount being stereotyped is a very forcible one. We were told that this sum of £265,000 is more than originally was calculated would come to Scotland, and, as the calculation was wrong in the past, it very probably will be equally wrong in the future, and as education and the number of children must increase in England, so the share to Scotland will be considerably increased, and I hope, in a few years, will amount to £300,000. If that is the case, I think this measure should state the manner of allocation. It is right that a certain sum should be stereotyped. I think it is perfectly right if the Universities are to receive £30,000, that sum should be definitely fixed. I have very great sympathy with the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Stirling Burghs upon this Vote. I think it very hard upon Scotland that this £30,000 should be taken out of this money. I think that money should be given altogether out of the general finances of the country. The right hon. Gentleman rather sneered at the members of the local Town Councils and County Councils in effecting economy and reducing the rates. I would remind him that he is the representative of the same electors as have returned these bodies; and that, while it is their duty to diminish the rates as far as they can, the same electors would be very thankful if the right hon. Gentleman, in his place in Parliament, would do his utmost to get a grant by which the rates should be reduced. The right

hon. Gentleman alleged, as regards grants being given to the Parochial Boards, that the Parochial Boards were not elected upon a sufficiently popular basis. I would remind him that it was entirely owing to the action of hon. and right hon. Gentlemen on the opposite side of the House that a measure for the establishment of Parochial Councils in Scotland was not carried at the same time as the County and District Councils Act. It is not a question really of throwing money at the heads of the ratepayers of Scotland. This is a question to enable the Scotch ratepayer to get that relief to which he is justly entitled; and which he did not get for two years owing to his desire to have free education for his children first. I must say I should like to have had a more definite view from the Government in regard to the £60,000 which is to be spent upon Secondary Education. I cannot adopt the view that this higher education affects all the children in Scotland. I think that the poorer classes will derive very small benefit indeed from the £30,000 to be given to the Universities, and it will depend entirely upon the manner in which this £60,000 is appropriated whether the children of the working classes will get any benefit from it at all or not. It is impossible for the children of the working classes to attend school beyond a certain age. If they are to earn a living, and, at the same time, to improve their education, they must be apprenticed, or must be learning, from the age of 14 and upwards, the trades which they are going to pursue. It can only be by the means of technical education that they can hope to raise themselves to a higher position than that which they now occupy. I think, therefore, that it would have been a very great advantage if the Government had seen their way to enable a portion of this money to be applied towards technical education. What is wanted in Scotland is not so much more money, but a thorough administration of existing funds. The right hon. Gentleman opposite says the allocation should not be embodied in a Bill. I think it should be. It was done in the case of England, and that course met with general acceptance. The Government have, in my view, shown wisdom in defining the objects to which this money is to be applied. If the county of Ross, for example, desire that part of the money should go for roads, it can spend it in that way. But, Sir, I think it is altogether opposed to the general local convenience of the county that it should be made a matter of contest every three years how certain money is to be applied. One of the strongest arguments in favour of this measure is that it defines definitely the destination, instead of leaving it to the passing breath of the moment. I think also that the Government were wise in adopting the principle of valuation, and not of assessment. This will contribute to economy. No reason has been shown why this Bill should not be now read a first time, and I trust the negative criticisms of the right hon. Gentleman opposite will not be allowed to retard its progress, but that the points that have been mentioned will be reserved for Committee, where they may be properly discussed, and a Bill advanced by which the people of Scotland will get considerable remissions of local taxation.

*SIR GEORGE TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): I think the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down is a little hard in protesting against one of the few opportunities which Scotch Members have of discussing Scotch business, and I do not think the Government will join with him in his protest. In a question of this great importance and complexity, and at the same time so familiar to hon. Members that they have all made up their minds upon it even on this its first presentation to the House, I imagine it will be a much greater assistance than an obstacle if the opinions of the Scotch Members are expressed as clearly as they have been expressed. And it is necessary that those who do not take altogether the same view as those who have already spoken should say something, remembering, at the same time, that we have no right, on the first reading, to speak longer than is necessary to express concurrence or emphatic dissent. Now, Sir, I feel bound to say I never heard a speech in which I more agreed with the conclusions, but in regard to one or two-of the principal arguments with which I less agree than that of my right hon. Friend the Member for Stirling. Therefore, it is necessary to put in a protest against one or two of those arguments, in order that the Government may not think that there is universal agreement amongst Members on this side. The history of this money, the disposition of which we are discussing, is complicated enough, and goes through various historical stages; but the present position of it is undeniable. It is the same sum of money which was made over to the English ratepayers from the Exchequer, and to do anything else than give it, in one form or another, to the Scotch ratepayers is to lay upon the Scotch ratepayers a special Imperial tax. You may like the distinction, or you may dislike it; you may like to spend money on the University or on secondary education, or you may dislike it; but no less if so spent we levy a differential tax upon the Scotch ratepayer, and against that I briefly but unreservedly protest. I cannot agree with my right hon. Friend that Scotch opinion is anything like unanimous in this matter. The local bodies are, in my opinion, on this question of expenditure the true spokesmen of the country. Hon. Members deny that the Municipal Bodies are fair exponents of the feelings of the boroughs. I think that the principles we hold on this side oblige us to say that those local bodies, in regard to the larger cities at any rate, are strictly representative, and they almost unanimously regard this money as a debt to the Scotch ratepayer. So far as I know, they unanimously regard any other application as frittering away Scotch resources instead of keeping them intact to give sensible relief in the quarter in which relief is due. They are unanimous in thinking that the relief of 2d., 3d., or 4d., even 5d., which has been given to great English cities, would be equally acceptable to Scotch cities, and equally their due. There was a great deputation last year to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The strongest arguments were urged by members of Municipal Bodies and of Parochial Boards. But of what Parochial Boards? There are many Parochial Boards which contain a really representative element. I know that the representative members of the Parochial Boards are elected under the plural vote, and in so far they are less representative than we would wish to see them; but in the Barony Parish of Glasgow, out of 29, 21 are elected members. As regards the deputations from the Municipal Bodies, there can be no question whatever as to their elective character. The constituents of these bodies—the enormous town populations of these cities—have not found it necessary to take exception to the action of their representatives last year. I do not want to put the matter mainly on the ground of Scotch feeling. I maintain that there are grave reasons of public policy against dribbling out fractions of public money to be applied to special services. Nothing leads to so much waste and gives rise to so much worry among Local Bodies as having a certain sum from the Treasury to put to a certain use, to which, perhaps, they do not want to put it. The importance of the public object, and the wisdom of carrying it out, ought to be considered on its own merits by the local authority. When the Glasgow Municipality set up baths and wash-houses and model lodging-houses they, first of all, considered whether these were advisable matters to be undertaken by a public body. Having considered and determined that, they allotted a sum of money out of the rates. But that is a very different thing from giving a body like the Glasgow Council a certain amount which may only be spent in the superannuation of the Police, on secondary education, or on technical education. My right hon. Friend says he wishes Parliament to have the disposal of its own money. I wish the local Parliaments of our great towns to have the free disposal of their money. If Glasgow or Aberdeen, or Dundee, wish to have secondary education or public parks, or model lodging houses, well, let them say so, but do not give them a sum of money which they may not have unless to spend upon some service which Parliament dictates—money which is indubitably their own, and which they have a right to spend as they choose. I cannot agree with the hon. Member in thinking that the allotment of money for technical education in the English counties has been altogether a success, but what has made it even the success that it is, is this—that they are not obliged to spend it upon technical education; therefore, if there is not a real machinery for carrying out technical education, they would not spend the money upon it. In what follows I am speaking entirely for my constituency, which is in a different position from the rural districts. I entirely object, and the people in Glasgow entirely object, to regarding secondary education as a proper burden for the ratepayers. There are great endowments already in Glasgow, quite sufficient to give secondary education to the entire city. Already, the poorer ratepayer, the working man, as well as everybody else, pays large sums for keeping up the High School at Glasgow, upon which I am told that there is a debt of £45,000 for building and repairs. Who go to the High School? Not so much the sons of the working men, not even exclusively the sons of professional men and commercial men of Glasgow, but people from a distance, whose education is largely paid for by the poor working man of Glasgow. But that is not all. Glasgow is in a very peculiar position. In Glasgow directly you improve by public money the elementary school, so that it is able to give that sort of education which the right hon. Gentleman described so admirably at the end of his speech, and which is a special characteristic of Scotland—so soon as the school is able to give that education, what does the School Department do? Why, Sir, it separates that school from the rest, and puts it into a special class of fee-paying schools. These schools are not the schools of the ratepayer. He has to pay for the building and maintenance of these schools, but he cannot send his children there. He has to pay his money out of the rates in order to make more of this class of schools, which are to remain select and privileged, and from which his children are to be excluded.

I have no objection to any amount of bursaries that will enable the children of the elementary schools to get a higher class education, but I do object, in Glasgow especially, to the ordinary working man ratepayer paying for secondary education which he does not share. As regards the Universities, I gather there is unanimity. We all wish the Universities to have more money, but we all wish that it should come from the Treasury. The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury—if he will allow me to refer to his admirable replies to the deputation that waited upon him from Scotland—spoke of Oxford and Cambridge as being very highly endowed. But these are not the only Universities in the South. There are Colleges in Wales, there are Universities in England—some in existence, some in embryo—and if more money is given to the Scotch Universities out of the rates there will be, almost immediately, a demand for more for the South country Universities. Again there will be an equivalent grant to Scotland for which we shall have to find some special destination, and, therefore, we will go on in this vicious circle of special grants for special objects to Local Bodies in Scotland. The remedy is plain. Let the Local Bodies have their own money, and let them dispose of it themselves. We talk of the wisdom of Parliament, but these Local Bodies are wiser still with regard to their own wants. I would not fetter them. I would not tie them down even to the relief of local rates. I would leave the matter to their absolute discretion. I apologise for having spoken so warmly on a subject on which there is so much difference of opinion, and I thank the House for its attention.

*(6.20.) MR. HOZIER (Lanarkshire, South): I tender to the Lord Advocate my warmest congratulations upon the clearness and lucidity of his speech, and upon his proposals generally: though it seems to me that the discussion upon those proposals will come more conveniently when we have the measure before us in print. In the next place, I wish to congratulate the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down upon a most unwonted isplay of backbone. The confident way in which he spoke shows that he has many supporters at his back, and on the present occasion I am one of the most enthusiastic of them. Thirdly, I wish to congratulate the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Stirling Burghs on the comparative moderation of the language with which he now attacks the unfortunate ratepayer in Scotland.

MR. CAMPBELL BANNERMAN : did not attack the ratepayer.

MR. HOZIER : Perhaps not the ratepayer, but at any rate the relief of rates. He said the ratepayer ought to be able to do without any relief whatever. On the 28th July, 1890, the right hon. Gentleman spoke of the naked and brutal relief of rates. That was a little stronger than his language this evening.

MR. CAMPBELL BANNERMAN : am sorry the hon. Gentleman does not understand the word brutal, which used in its French, rather than in its English, sense. In its French sense it means "simple."

MR. HOZIER : I think that on the whole, Sir, a Scottish Member in the British Parliament ought to speak in English rather than in inferior French. naked and brutal relief of rates, indeed! It is a "nakedness" of which no Government need be ashamed, and "brutality" for which the people of Scotland may well be deeply grateful. Now, Sir, we hear two voices from the Front Opposition bench. Is it possible that there are going to be dissentient Gladstonians in the future? Does the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Stirling Burghs act as the spokesman of his Party when he says that deficits are better than surpluses? He said every Chancellor of the Exchequer ought to be very careful not to have a surplus at the end of a year. Sir, as a County Member, there is one portion of his Bill on which I look with some anxiety—namely, that portion allotting £60,000 for technical education. It is difficult to see how the rural districts will derive much benefit unless, indeed, there are to be lecturers who will go about from place to place. I understand that technical education is not to be included in secondary education. If that is so, I must say that I am very sorry indeed. The hon. Member for Leith (Mr. Munro Ferguson) earnestly hopes that no further sums of money will be granted to Scotland. Of course, that merely means that he earnestly hopes that his Party may come into power, for, with the Gladstonian Party in power, there is not the slightest chance of there ever being any surplus.

(6.28.) MR. D. CRAWFORD (Lanarkshire, N.E.): I shall not adopt the controversial tone of the hon. Gentleman opposite, and, as I come after him, I shall escape the lash of his criticism. Sir, as regards this very important Bill, I believe that £265,000 wisely husbanded and wisely expended will do a great deal of good, and make many improvements that are much required. I do not follow the example of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury in making comparisons between measures of relief and other measures relating to Ireland. I confess I listened with astonishment to that comparison. Sir, I desire to mention one or two points to which the Government may give consideration. These points mainly refer to the £60,000 for technical education. But on the point of rating I should say that I am more in agreement with the Member for the Stirling Burghs than the Member for Bridgeton. I am not astonished that the Government has gone some way in the relief of rates. I agree there has been no strong demand from other quarters in regard to the disposition of this money. It does not carry us any length to say the Parochial Boards are not unanimous in asking for this money. and then the right hon. Gentleman said that it was not desirable to give the money to Local Bodies and to tell them to apply it for certain purposes which they did not ask the money for. I agree with my right hon. Friend when he said that the money should be given to these Local Bodies with a large discretion as to the use of it. But that is not the proposal of the Bill. It would be very easy to make the proposal still more advantageous and workable by this addition to it; the Local Bodies should have the power of accumulating this grant. They ought not to be obliged to spend it, and, it may be, waste it year after year. I know the Town Councils have come to the consideration of how this money is to be spent with a good deal of anxiety. Why should they be obliged to spend the money all in one year? If they are allowed to save it up and make it the foundation of a common-good fund, such as many of the towns of Scotland used to have, that money would be a most valuable nest-egg to the County Council. I earnestly ask the Government to consider this point—that in addition to giving the Local Bodies discretion as to the use they are to put the money to, they should also have the power of accumulation. With regard to the sum that is proposed to be devoted to secondary education, so far as my information goes, I think it is too small. I should say that not less than £75,000 would be necessary for the purpose. The proposal to split up the educational endowments is an entire impossibility. These endowments must remain localised. The question is—and it is an all-important question—how is this money, which it is proposed to devote to secondary education, to be administered? The Government proposed that it should be administered by the Education Department. Let them remember that this is local money, and it is so called even under the title of the Bill. It, therefore, ought not to be administered by any central department whatever. I look with the greatest anxiety and jealousy on the proposal if it is really persevered in by the Government. I am aware that the Scottish Education Department is not only faithfully, but most zealously and ably, administered at the present moment, but that is no reason for placing in its hands what I might describe as an unconstitutional discretion in the disposal of public money. There is no precedent to be found for it in the large sums that passed through the hands of the Education Department under the Act of 1872, because the money goes out almost automatically and according to rules, so that it was impossible to favour one school more than another. But by the present proposal it would be the duty of the Department to pick and choose here and there what part of Scotland was to get the dole out of this education money. And why should this expedient be resorted to when we have a much better one at hand? and that is that the distribution of the money should be by the counties. The proper authority to administer the money is the County Council. It is local money, and ought to be locally administered, and in the manner which the Local Authorities thought the best. Speaking generally, the County Councillors are, for the most part, the pick of the School Boards, and are therefore perfectly competent to form a sensible plan to meet the educational needs of their own county. Let the Government look to the precedent of the Welsh Intermediate Education Act of 1889, under which it is the duty of the County Council to form an educational scheme for the wants of the community. I think this money ought to be available both for intermediate education as well as secondary education.

*(6.40.) MR. J. A. CAMPBELL (Glasgow and Aberdeen Universities): I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Lord Advocate on the clearness of his statement in introducing the Bill. I join the hon. Member opposite in expressing satisfaction that the claims of secondary education are recognised by the Government in the measure. On this subject, however, as to the application of the money, one must reserve his opinion until the details of the scheme are made known to the House. I am not prepared to say that the Scottish Education Department is not a very fit source from which the scheme should emanate, but a great deal will depend on how the money is to be applied, and we have no information from the Lord Advocate to enable us to give a decided opinion on the subject in its details. I am sorry to find my hon. Friend the Member for South Lanarkshire not quite clear as to the principle of applying part of this money for the promotion of secondary education. In Scotland we have always considered secondary education to be mixed up with primary education, so that they could not very all be entirely separated ; and if we said that primary education is a fit object to receive money which might be said to be claimable by the ratepayers, we may in the same way claim the same character for secondary education. I am sure there will be no satisfaction in Scotland with this application of a portion of the money, provided the scheme for its distribution is a fair and reasonable one. It is of importance that this should be done.

Our educational measures of late years have rather thrown secondary education into the background. It has been said by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bridgeton that the working man has not the same interest in secondary schools as his neighbours who are better off.
It in the speech of the right hon.
gentleman who was Lord Advocate last year, we had an assurance from the Government that they would consider the importance of having facilities for deserving youths who are not themselves in a position to obtain mission to secondary schools, finding admission to them as bursars. That is the principle which has been largely allowed in many parts of Scotland, and I hope the Government will provide the facilities for extending the scheme. On the subject of assistance to the Universities, I have to acknowledge with satisfaction that our aims have been very fairly met by the Government, I will say is, however, that no grant given in this way to the Universities must be looked upon as a closing of the account, or as if we are thereby to lose the claim which the Universities have, as national institutions, to any assistance from Government which is necessarily necessary for their maintenance and prosperity. But the Act of Parliament passed a year or two ago for the Universities has exposed them to great additional expenses, and without some such assistance as it is proposed to give them in this Bill it will be almost impossible to put in practical application the Act of 1889.
I believe that what is proposed to give them now will go a great way towards making it possible to apply the Act in such a manner as to benefit the Universities as the country would desire. After all, the sum to be given, if divided equally among the four Universities, will only amount to £7,500 each. That is not so large an amount as to lead us to suppose that there will be no more need for private benefactions to extend these institutions, to found new Chairs, and so on ; but it will go a great way towards making it possible to put them in thoroughly good working order under the new constitution which this House has recently given them. The hon. Member for Leith (Mr. Munro Ferguson), while not wishing to say anything against the Universities, objected to this part of the Government proposals, because their Parliamentary representation is not entirely to his mind. In reply, I may say this : that this money is not for the Parliamentary representatives, nor for the graduates who elect them, but to enable the Universities to do better work as teaching institutions ; and the hon. Member may console himself with the thought that if the Universities do their work with greater efficiency, they will in the future turn out better graduates—men who will possibly exercise a better judgment in the selection of their Parliamentary Representatives.

(6.48.) DR. CLARK (Caithness) : I look upon this question from another standpoint than that of the hon. Members who have spoken ; and I do not know that it is necessary for me to move an Amendment, but I intend to vote against the First Reading of this Bill, and to oppose it from its first stage till its last. I am very strongly opposed to this dying Parliament, which does not represent the feeling of Scotland to-day—trying to tie the hands of future Parliaments in reference to this matter. I am astonished at my right hon. Friend the Member for Bridgeton looking at England and Scotland from the same standpoint. Of this grant of £175,000, £75,000 is to go to the Parochial Boards. Well, one-half of that will be a present to the landlords, because, as my right hon. Friend is aware, in Scotland one-half of the rate is levied upon and paid by the landlord, and the other half by the occupier. So that as regards one-half, or £37,500, there is no doubt at all that it will go to the relief of the landlords. Then another share is to go for the relief of rates in the counties in burghs ; and assuming that only 15 per cent. goes to the relief of the landlords, that at once gives £15,000 that will go to the landlords.

An hon. MEMBER : They will get 22 per cent.

DR. CLARK : Well, I will take it at 15 per cent. only ; I want to be moderate. Well, then, at least £50,000 will thus at once go into the pockets of the landlords ; and those who have bought estates with certain burdens on them will immediately have the value of their property increased by the proposed application of this grant. That is for the present year ; but ultimately the whole will go into the pockets of the landlords, so that we are by this Bill simply voting a subvention of £175,000 to the Scotch landlords. I, for one, am strongly opposed to that ; I, for one, want to secure the very opposite. In the past, landlords have been turning all the burdens they took upon themselves on to the shoulders of the tenants, and I want to turn back those burdens upon the landlords. I therefore hope that when this Parliament, which was elected upon false pretences, goes back to the constituencies, the new Parliament will consist of men of a different type altogether—men who will be animated by new ideas. The proposed method of distributing this grant simply means the taxing of industry for the benefit of the landlords. The workers of Scotland are the people who contribute four-fifths of this money ; yet not one-fifth of it will go back into their pockets. Here, again, you are trying to rob the workers for the benefit of this privileged class of landlords. I do not object to the contribution to be given towards secondary and technical education, but the £30,000 to the Universities I do object to on historical grounds. When the Chancellor of the Exchequer three years ago brought in a Bill by which he proposed, by giving £46,000 to the Scotch Universities, to free this Parliament from the pledge given at the Union to maintain the Scotch Universities, I opposed that proposal. I think the Member for the Stirling Burghs (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) is scarcely accurate in what he said as to Scotland getting more than England for University purposes. The English Universities were endowed by Governments and Parliaments. The Scotch Universities were not so endowed. They came under the control of the bodies constituting them, and they got annual votes for their maintenance, which is a wider and better system than that of England, a system by which Parliament has been able to retain control of the Universities. Then, when we united with England, this was one of the burdens which was to be taken over by the united Parliament. We had the privilege of taking upon us our share of the English burdens, not one of which has been lightened for us ; but England, to its eternal disgrace, has been lightening her burdens so far as Scotland is concerned. Where she does carry out her bargain she gives a miserable thousand pounds, say, to the National Gallery. In every way I hold that Scotland has been badly treated by England, just as in this case the Chancellor of the Exchequer, by giving £46,000 to the Universities, sought to relieve Parliament of the promise to maintain the Scottish Universities. I opposed that proposal persistently, and until the Chairman of Committees refused to take any more Amendments from me. I say you have taken upon yourselves the burden of the Scotch Universities. We have taken the burden of your National Debt and other burdens ; and you must carry out your part of the agreement as we have done ours, and I will tease this House in the future, as I have done in the past, until I can get for Scotland financial fair play. On these grounds I oppose this Bill ; but I admit that what you may have a right to do is to give your gift to the landlords for this year. You, however, want to pass a Bill that would tie the hands of what may be a much more Democratic House of Commons through the action of the House of Lords. Well, I do not care if you do bring in the House of Lords. We are going to fight the House of Lords ; but I think the only true and honest course for Members who think as I do is to vote against this Bill in all its stages. I am opposed to its principle. You may apply it in this way

Dr. Clark

England. The English Members we frittered away this money and we lost it; but we, the Scotch Members, refuse to do so. Our position with reference to rating has always been different from that of the English Members. I am willing to give this money, which we must have, our equivalent grant, should be sent for any purpose for which there is present no rating power. If you send it for a purpose for which you have ready a rating power, then you are rowing away the money. If my hon. friend the Member for North Aberdeen (Mr. Hunter) brings in a scheme for pensions in Scotland, and allows us to settle the pension question in Scotland

we did Free Education, then I would support the use of this money entirely for that purpose, although I see that, to a certain extent, it would go to relief of the rates in the end. It is as far as I am concerned, my intention is to oppose this Bill in any shape or form. The only thing you have a right to do is to settle the question for the present year, but not tie our hands in the next Parliament.

(9.55.) MR. MARK STEWART (irkcudbright): The hon. Member for Airthness (Dr. Clark) has avowed a policy which I cannot think will be very acceptable to his own constituents; and I shall be curious to see how many Scotch Members will follow him into the Lobby if he carries out his intention to divide the House. He seems to think that this Bill is thrown out as a sop to the landed interest.

DR. CLARK: Hear, hear.

MR. MARK STEWART: Well, I think not. I would point out, in the first place, that in his county the rustlers pay two-thirds of the taxes and the proprietors one-third. I believe that the opposite to that is the case in the burghs. But then, again, we find that the proprietors pay the county rate, and they have hitherto paid large portions of the cost of the formation of new roads and ridges, and still do so. They also pay half of the road rate and half of the poor rate. But there are other rates which fall exclusively on the shoulders of the proprietors, such as those under the

Cattle Diseases Acts and other matters which it is not necessary for me to go into at this moment. To say that £100,000, to be given in relief of local rates levied by the Councils is a sop to the landlords, therefore, is not at all the case, and is very far from being in any way accurate. The way in which the Government propose to allocate this £100,000 will, I maintain, be found to be most equitable to the country at large. We had a large meeting some weeks ago in Scotland of various bodies interested in this matter, and they came to the conclusion that a large proportion—a half—of this grant should go for the relief of the rates, leaving the application to particular rates to the discretion of the different Local Authorities. It was not, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Stirling Burghs had said, to be stereotyped; but it was to be left entirely to the discretion of those who levied the rates to decide how the grant was to be applied. Well, now, the Bill has met with general acceptance in this House, but there are many questions which must come up for further discussion, and one of them will relate to the £60,000 to be given for secondary education. It is a most important provision of the Bill, but one which it will be difficult to carry into practice. I suppose in country districts it will be used to provide more teaching power in the schools. It is all very well to put in another master; but although sometimes there will be many farmers' sons anxious to reap the benefit of secondary education, at others there will be very few to attend a class. Any clause on this subject ought to be an enacting clause, appropriating a certain sum for secondary education each year. While I have always been a friend of technical education, I must honestly say that my view is not shared in my part of the country. I should like to know whether the Local Authority would be permitted to use any part of the grant out of the £40,000 for building as well as for teaching purposes? I believe the allocation made by the Government generally will meet with the approval of the whole country, and satisfy the people of Scotland, whether Liberals or Tories, University or otherwise, and I xes on the Budget. The right hon. Member for the Stirling Burghs has taken a departure from general Liberal principles on this occasion. I should regret the money going into the pockets of the landlords; but I think in the municipalities five-sixths of this amount could go direct into the pockets of the ratepayers, and only one-sixth into the pocket of the landlord. It may be different in rural districts, but representing an urban constituency including a respectable working class, I feel satisfied that not 10 per cent. of them would be favourable to this money being devoted to any other purpose than the reduction of the rates. I trust the Government will re-consider their proposals, and act upon the representations made to them by the strong deputation which waited on the First Lord of the Treasury and the Lord Advocate in reference to this matter.

(7.25.) MR. A. BIRRELL (Fife, W.): When the Members for Glasgow do agree their unanimity is wonderful. They seem to be disturbing the House by introducing into it a new party, and I am not surprised that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has not been in his place during any part of the evening to witness what is the somewhat degrading spectacle of the Representatives of Scotland meeting together to discuss, not the question of what taxation may be necessary or useful, but how certain swag should be disposed of. I can see no reason in the speech of the Lord Advocate to justify his arbitrary division of this fund, and I am sure he will not say he has acted upon any profound or certain calculation, or gone upon anything but the rule of thumb. It is much too soon to proceed by Bill in this matter. There is one omission in it which all Parties regret, and that is that an opportunity has not been taken for absolutely freeing primary education. With reference to the £60,000 for intermediate education, the Lord Advocate might have plucked up courage to extend the amount to £75,000. I regret the introduction of this Bill, and I feel sure, if it is proceeded with, as no doubt it will be, it will only increase the discontent of the Scotch with the way in which their business is transacted in this House, and their wishes overruled by an English majority.

(7.29.) MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berwickshire): I do not wish to go into the details of this scheme, but I do wish to place on record the fact that I object to the scheme altogether. I maintain that the Government are going to rob Scotland in this matter, and not to obtain any great national advantage. Here you have a great sum of £260,000 a year, and how are you going to use it? Simply to try to blind as many different classes in Scotland as you possibly can. Now, Mr. Speaker, that is not the way to deal with a great national matter like this. Windfalls of £265,000 a year do not come to Scotland every day, and therefore, I say, this sum ought either to have been used for some great scheme of national education, some great scheme, like that of the hon. Member for Aberdeen, of national pensions for Scotland, or some other scheme for the benefit of the whole people of Scotland. Several references have been made as to how the different classes of the community would benefit from using this money in relief of the rates if the Government scheme were adopted. Calculation has been made, I think, with regard to Edinburgh, in which it all came out in a very clear manner. The Treasurer of that city calculated that he would have £33,000 to deal with this year—that is for the coming year and the current half-year, and on that he calculated that he would be able to reduce the rates by 3d. in the £. What benefit would that confer on the ratepayers? Forty per cent. would have 2s. 6d. each in their pockets; 28 per cent. would have their burdens lightened by sums varying from 2s. 6d. to 5s.; 19 per cent. would have sums varying from 5s. to 12s. 6d.; and 13 per cent. would absorb in varying proportions more than one-half of the entire grant. That is to say that 13 per cent. of the population, and they the richest and best able to bear rates, would receive the greatest relief. It seems to me, Sir, that that calculation absolutely condemns the proposal of the Government.

(7.35.) MR. J. P. SMITH (Lanark, Partick): There is one point in regard to this fund on which we shall all agree: it ought not to be stereotyped. The Bill fixes it at £265,000, being a certain proportion to the amount granted to England. Now, if there is one thing more certain than another, it is that the charge for free education in England will increase, and we should take care that Scotland has her fair share of that increase.

SIR CHARLES PEARSON: The amount will fluctuate each year according to the fluctuation of the corresponding amount for England.

MR. J. P. SMITH: That will remove and explain some difficulties. It seems to me that inside the division made by the Government between the claims of rates and education there will be other divisions—between Municipal and County Councils and Local Boards, in respect to the amount to be devoted to the local rates. There will be a great disappointment among these bodies at the fact that in future years they will receive less than in the present year. The Lord Advocate did not say who were to be the residuary legatees of this fund, and obtain anything which is over the exact figures he specified.

SIR CHARLES PEARSON: That would go to increase the £175,000 in relief of local rates.

MR. J. P. SMITH: That ought to go a good way in satisfying the Town and County Councils. It is the Municipal and County Council rates which need relief more than those imposed by Parochial Boards; the latter in respect to the general poor rate are diminishing positively and more rapidly as valuation increases. It is proposed to distribute this money according to valuation; but the result will be that the rates in counties will be diminished three times as much as in the boroughs. The assessment in counties is almost three times as great as in the towns, and the population in the towns is nearly three times as great as that in the counties. In regard to the money devoted to education a question will arise between Universities and Schools. I do not say anything against the claims of the Universities to £20,000, yet as they are, to a large extent, national institutions, a share of that money should come from the general fund of the country, and not from that specially for Scotland. I cannot agree with the hon. right Member for Bridgeton in his attack on the Elective Bodies who had been dealing with the schools and making the best of them fee schools. I have been round looking in England and Scotland at the best schools I could find, and I must say that the equipment of the school I saw at Govan was better than any of those I saw. The hon. Member for South Lanarkshire said that this scheme would be of no use to the country. It is of the utmost importance that in any scheme of secondary education special care should be taken to make it apply to rural districts as well as to the towns. I think it might be done by developing the higher branches of study in the schools. I feel that to some extent we ought to have local work in the administration of this money, something corresponding to the case of Welsh Intermediate Education, though I agree with the control being to a great extent in the hands of the Scotch Education Department. In a general way it seems to me that the Government may be very well satisfied with the reception accorded to their scheme. It has been a very difficult task indeed to satisfy all the claims on this fund; but it will be a great blessing to hon. Members living in Scotland to have an Act passed which will save us from the continual and inconsistent claimants from all sides.

(7.40.) MR. J. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I was inclined, when the Lord Advocate introduced the Bill to congratulate him on inaugurating his representation of the Government in Scotch affairs by introducing a Bill which would give a large gift of money to Scotland. But since I have listened to the debate and seen how much diversity of opinion exists among Scotch Members, how much work there is before us before we get rid of the allocation of the money, I am not sure that I can make that congratulation. There is something very peculiar in the way in which the question comes before us. As a rule Bills of this kind would be framed with a view of providing for an object which everybody desired, and that we should go to the Chancellor of the Exchequer and ask him to provide the money. But here we reverse the order. We, having a sum of money thrown at our heads which has not been disposed of, have to find some way of disposing of it. This is a grant in aid of local taxation which has never been asked for by Scotland. It will be recollected that the question was brought up by English County Members on account of the undue pressure of the rates upon them, and they called on the Government to relieve the pressure. In those debates I do not think there was any indication of a similar demand on the part of the Scotch Members. However, something has been done to relieve the rates in England, and an equivalent is given to Scotland. I believe I may say with some confidence that there does not exist among the people of Scotland a desire for a relief of the rates—at any rate it does not exist outside of Glasgow. The Town Council of the city I represent is in favour of the proposal, and the Parochial Boards will be glad to get the money, but I do not believe that they represent the opinion of the mass of the people of Scotland. If we were to take a plébiscite of the boroughs of Scotland as to the disposition of the money, we should have an overwhelming majority against expending it in relief of rates. I believe the reason of that is that the relief would not be to the majority of the ratepayers, but to a minority, because it would go to the pockets of the wealthier class. This money would have furnished an opportunity for conferring some great and permanent benefit on Scotland. It is a serious incidental evil in this case that the relief which appears to be given to the ratepayers by the grant from the central Exchequer will not be found, in the long run, a standing benefit to them, because it is generally found that instead of producing a diminished charge on the ratepayers it only produces a somewhat larger expenditure, and therefore I do not believe that the benefit to be derived from the grant to Parochial Boards, for instance, will be so great as the Government appear to expect; it will be felt only to the extent of 50 or 60 per cent. of the whole grant. Surely, Mr. Speaker, the great difference of opinion which has been shown to-night among Scotch Members as regards the distribution of the money furnishes an extremely effective argument against disposing of the money once for all by the scheme of the Government Bill. When we see all these differences between the Scotch Members with regard to the rates as between town and country, and with regard to the Universities and secondary education, there is surely a very strong case for not proceeding rashly and wholly in this matter; for giving the people of Scotland and their Representatives here opportunity to consider the matter in future years, and to see how the experiment works we are asked to try is succeeding, and to take the true constitutional view in money questions; of having an opportunity in each Session of considering the matter, and, if necessary, taking away some of the money from appropriations where it is not doing well, and giving it to some other purpose. When we come to the Second Reading I hope the Government will see the force of the argument used at the beginning of the Debate, and say that this shall only be done by Bill for one year. On the question of secondary education we hope also to have, not a suggestion that this sum of £60,000 should be applied according to the goodwill of the Scotch Education Department in pursuance of Minutes framed by that Department, but a real scheme for the reform and extension of secondary education. We have not heard from the Lord Advocate the intentions of the Government in the matter of secondary education, and we ask that some inquiry shall be held on the matter, or the mind of Scotland consulted during the Recess. There has been some discussion amongst the teachers, but the view of Scotland, as a whole, has not been troubled on the question, and we are asked to vote this money without any idea as to how the Scotch Education Department may deal with it. I agree that there is now a great opportunity to re-develop secondary education, which is the weak point in our Scotch education. We feel that this sum of £60,000 should be taken to put secondary education on its feet. One hon. Member referred to the fact that, though we have large educational endowments in Scotland, they are so restricted up by local restrictions that we cannot dispose of them in places where they are most needed. The example of Wales is very much in point. The Endowed School Commissioners have re-distributed school endowments, and have met with much opposition, but if you give power over the local endowments to Local Authorities that experience does not occur. Proposals for the re-distribution of endowments which would not be listened to if they came from the Charity Commissioners have been accepted and carried through, with little friction, when they came from the County Council. I think the same would be the case in Scotland if we created County Authorities to deal with the question of secondary education. I believe you would be acting entirely in accord with Scotch opinion if you were to endeavour to create a Scotch Local Authority to deal with the matter. If we let this £60,000 now slip through our fingers and give it away as some piece of patronage, to be disposed of by the Scotch Education Department, we lose the chance of establishing a truly national system of secondary education, and that is another reason why I hope the Bill will not be accepted as a final settlement of the question, but that the House will insist on retaining in its hands the control of this fund, and will insist on revising its application in the light of the experience of a year or two.

(7.55.) MR. C. S. PARKER (Perth) : I quite agree that where money is asked for it is easy to appoint a Departmental Committee to inquire into the matter. But the situation is at once altered when there is money at the back of the Government recommendations. I regret that there should be the least appearance of endeavouring to settle finally a question which is hardly ripe yet, and which would be the better for more consideration. I think, on the First Reading, we should look at the broad question, how it is that we are dealing in this unusual way with the money. My experience of the House goes back further than that of the hon. Member for Aberdeen, and I cannot agree that there has at no time been a demand in Scotland for relief from the growing local burdens. No doubt, their pressure is felt more in England, because they fall in the first instance on the occupier, while in Scotland they are divided between occupier and owner. But I remember the time when I stood almost alone, as a Liberal County Member, in this House in voting against proposals to relieve local burdens at the expense of the Exchequer. Strong pressure was put upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the old House of Commons to relieve the local rates. I think the present situation has arisen largely out of the difference between England and Scotland. There was not the strong demand in Scotland for relief of the local rates, and when money was coming to us the ratepayers were open to receive proposals for freeing education, and there was almost unanimity in their desire to have the money applied in that way. I ask the right hon. Member for Bridgeton whether the expressions with regard to applying the money were equally strong in his mind in former years when the question arose as to free education? Because precisely the same argument applies. I believe there is in Scotland to-day a strong desire that this money should go, not to relieve the rates, but for the relief of free education, which is in all countries largely helped either by the Municipalities or by the Government. And the organisations that should go along with it might, if we had time to consider it, be fully elaborated ; but this is a Bill containing so many other matters, and devoted so largely to the relief of rates, one can hardly expect that the time of Parliament can be devoted to it. But I am glad to say that we have had it very clearly defined, and we also had it from the First Lord of the Treasury when he yesterday, answering a deputation that waited upon him, intimated that a considerable part of the money would go to secondary education, and be spread over the country at large in order to restore the old state of things in schools, in which most boys were able, near their own homes, to obtain assistance for higher education. Some of the money proposed to be devoted would strengthen the staff in a large number of smaller parish schools, and with that staff so strengthened, I believe you might accomplish the objects of elementary education, and give a better education to pupil teachers and carry on continuation schools in the evening. You will have two trained masters instead of one, and you will also have pupil teachers very much better, while in addition you would have what an hon. Member asked for upon the other side, a fusion of schools better conducted in the country, because a staff of two masters would be very much better able to give instruction than one. On the other hand, there is a very difficult question, and one which should not be altogether left to the Education Department—to determine how the money for secondary education should be distributed. I am inclined to think that the best way would be to have recourse to the County Councils to say where these schools should be established. It is familiar to many Members that the endowments of Scotland, where they exist, cannot be counted upon, as the funds throughout Scotland are strictly localised. Public opinion would not tolerate them being taken away. I think County Councils should have charge of the new funds in order that they may work together, in order to set up a system of secondary education throughout Scotland. My own feeling is that the Government, in the difficult situation, has not been altogether unwise. I do not for a moment impute Party motives, but to take neither of the extreme views, that of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Stirling Burghs nor that of the right hon. Member for Bridgeton. I think that in the small relief given to this country there should have been a larger portion devoted to education; but at all events, seeing the pressure that has been in force, I think it is not a matter of surprise that they should have come to a compromise, and have divided the money.

*(8.40.) DR. CHARLES CAMERON (Glasgow, College): This Bill has been spoken of by hon. Members who have addressed the House on the subject as a boon to Scotland. I do not regard it as a boon to Scotland in any respect. According to hypothesis, the amount of taxation which Scotland has contributed towards Imperial funds, towards that portion of the funds out of which the proposed grant is given, is £265,000, plus the expenses of collecting and distributing that money; and what does she get back? We are to get £265,000 more, and the cost of collecting and distributing are to be defrayed in the process; therefore, Scotland is by so much the poorer. But of the £265,000 which has been raised in Scotland by taxation, the poorer classes, who paid about half the Imperial taxation, have paid £137,500, and the richer classes £137,500. But the burden of local taxation falls differently upon the community. The richer classes pay at least three-fourths of the local burden, and the poorer classes not one-fourth. Now, I know that the hon. Member for Aberdeen will put the difference much higher, but I am well within the mark when I say that the richer classes pay at least three-fourths of the local taxation and the poorer classes not one-fourth. What is the position in which the poorer ratepayer will find himself under this Bill? He has, as I have said, contributed £137,500; and out of that he receives back, in the shape of remission of rates, one-fourth, or, say, £44,000. And what is the benefit he gets from secondary education? Now, I doubt whether the poorer classes will reap a benefit out of the £60,000 grant for secondary education to the extent of £10,000. But I am willing, for the sake of argument, to admit that they will derive a benefit of about one-third of the grant, or, say, £20,000; that will make £64,000—the reduction of rates, £44,000, and secondary education, £20,000, or £64,000 in all—which the poor ratepayer will receive in the shape of this boon for the payment of which he had himself contributed £137,500. In other words, he will find himself minus £73,500 through the operation of the boon. What will be the position of the richer classes of the community? If they pay about three-fourths of the rates, they will receive a sum in relief of the rates of £129,000, and that is the total that all of them will get who have not got sons and daughters whom they wish to give secondary education to, or send to the Universities. That is all they will get, and they will find themselves a good many thousand pounds short. I entirely disagree with the principle of these Grants in Aid, and entirely dissent from the statement that this is a boon. There can be no more vicious system than the system of giving grants from the Imperial Exchequer in relief of local taxation; and one of my objects in desiring to see this Bill passed in a shape as analogous as possible to that passed several years ago in the case of England is that it may put an end to this see-saw, and set aside once and for ever this system of resorting to Grants in Aid. As regards secondary education, I have always considered that the duty of the State is entirely different from its duty in the matter of primary education. Where primary education is compulsory, I have always inclined to the principle that it should be free. If the State thought fit to enact that education should be compulsory, it did so, I take it, on the ground that an uneducated man, so far as the three R's are concerned, was a dangerous member of society, and it decided that he should receive a primary education for the purpose of putting him on an equal footing with the general population, and that being so, it appears to me clearly to be the duty of the State to provide for him, without cost to him, the education that was forced upon him. But the State does not appear to me to owe any such duty in the case of secondary education. That is a luxury. I should like to know what secondary education is, for there appears to me to be the greatest fog hanging over the House to-night as to what is secondary education. The Lord Advocate, when asked whether secondary education included technical education, said he could not say. The whole thing has been left over to a Minute of the Education Department. My hon. Friend the Member for Perth said that one-half of the grant to be given for secondary education should be devoted to doubling the teaching staffs in country schools. Is that secondary education? Why, I should have thought it was strengthening primary education. Certainly, if it would be called secondary education in the counties, it should be called primary education in the towns. Now, I ask, what is secondary education? Does it mean Latin and Greek? ["No."] Well, then, what does it mean? If it mean Latin and Greek, I entirely object to the public money being spent upon teaching Latin and Greek free of cost, for it appears to me that we have too much Latin and Greek already; it appears to me that that is especially true at a time when we find the greatest Greek scholars in the Universities proposing that Greek as a compulsory subject should be altogether done away with. We have been told that the traditions of Scotland are different from those of England, and that secondary education is no longer on the same footing as in oiden times. Why is it not? If Latin and Greek, French and German, mathematics, light and heat, electricity, &c., constitute secondary education, as I think they must be held to do, provision is already made for teaching them in the ordinary public school curriculum. I have the Report of the School Boards of Scotland in my hand, and I find that a very large number of children were presented on such subjects. It appears to me that if you wish to teach them more than the most wretched smattering of education, what you have got to do is to improve your Code. What is wrong with the Code provisions for secondary education is that the grants are so distributed as to tempt boys to pass through a standard in which they learn something by a little easy cramming without giving them any useful knowledge of the subjects that are taught. Before the passing of the Primary Education Act, and for a considerable time afterwards, there was a very large number of educational endowments in Scotland available for the purposes of primary education. And after the Education Act had been passed, before the fees had been done away with, and when the expenses of education had been largely thrown upon the rates, a Commission was appointed, and it was enacted that endowments for the payment of fees and primary education were not to be applied to the relief of the ratepayer, but that they should be made available for the purpose of secondary education. These endowments for the purposes of primary education, for the payment of fees at the time they were exigible, were appropriated for the purposes of secondary education; the result is that in Scotland there is a sum of £191,000 available for that purpose, and that does not include the sum of £23,000 belonging to the City of Glasgow, and which would raise the figure to over £214,000. In many parts of Scotland there may be a want of secondary education in the counties, and certainly I do not desire that the counties should not have their wishes gratified in that respect; but there is no want in the large towns. In Glasgow they have more money than they know what to do with; in Edinburgh they are still better provided for; and I am told that in Aberdeen it is the same thing. ("No.") I do not hold that the hon. Member for Aberdeen can be held to represent the views of his constituents in this matter. But at all events the members of the Glasgow Town Council, and it is stated the Parochial Boards of Glasgow, are all united in giving expression to this view; and at the deputation to the First Lord of the Treasury the other day one of the speakers was the Lord Provost of Aberdeen, and that gentleman said that notwithstanding the valuable services rendered by the hon. Member and his hon. Colleagues in urging upon the inhabitants of Aberdeen the claims of secondary education, notwithstanding that a Municipal Election had taken place, the Town Councillors were unanimous in favour of this fund being allocated not to secondary education, or not even in part to secondary education, but entirely to the relief of the Municipal and County Council rates. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Stirling said, and said truly, that there was no demand from the Scotch ratepayers, or the Scotch rating authorities for grants in aid for Scotland; and he was perfectly right. But, of course, if you go and dangle a sum of nearly a quarter of a million before the eyes of a nation, you cannot expect but that there would be some claimants for the money. Why, in the language of the most popular lyrical poet of the day,

"If you want to move the lot,
Put a penny in the slot."

And certainly, when the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer put his penny in the slot, he succeeded in arousing any number of claimants. One Gentleman wishes it in order to have improvements in fisheries carried out; another wishes it for piers and harbours; another for old age pensions. The secondary educationists have considerable organisation, and they, of course, make their claim; and the Universities make their claim. Although I would rather see the money restored to the source from which it came, the practical question is, what are we to do with it? The ratepayer has been regarded by some person as hostis humani generis. I entirely dissent from this view of the ratepayer. He bears certain burdens of the State, and the next best thing to putting that money back into the pockets from which you took it is to give it to the ratepayers. That is preferable to anything else I have heard proposed. I am glad the right hon. Gentleman the Lord Advocate has indicated that the sum dealt with in the Bill is not a fixed sum, but that it will be capable of being expanded in the proportion in which the English grant is expanded. The explanation of the Lord Advocate on that point is perfectly satisfactory. As to the suggestion of the Member for North-East Lanark (Mr. Donald Crawford) to the effect that County Councils should have power to accumulate the grant and make it into a Common Good that I would strongly deprecate. So far as the towns are concerned the Common Good is a fund out of which everything that will not bear criticism by the ratepayers is paid. In Glasgow, when there was starvation existing, a deputation waited on the Corporation and asked for employment to be provided and paid for out of the Common Good. They were told "No, that was quite impossible; that the wants of starving men could be met out of the Common Good;" but when it was desired to find £500 for a banquet there was no difficulty whatever in getting it out of the Common Good. That being so it is not a desirable thing that the County

Councils should imitate the Town Councils in this matter. It has been suggested that it is wrong to give any money simply in relief of rates, and that if any money is to be given it should be ear-marked for a special purpose. I entirely dissent from that view. I do not believe in ear-marking. When the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed to ear-mark certain taxes there was nobody more ready to denounce that than the colleagues of the right hon. Gentleman on the Front Bench. If you want to give money for purposes for which Local Authorities are not at present empowered to levy rates, let the Local Authorities be invested with the necessary power to rate the inhabitants for such a purpose; but do not cripple the powers of Local Authorities. Local Authorities are much more sharply looked after than the Central Authorities, and manage their own affairs more in accordance with popular feeling and with greater economy. But, if you want to give money for a distinct and specific object, I would say, do not give any grants except in those cases in which your conditions are complied with, and unless you saw that you were getting value for the money. That was the mistake which was made in connection with free education. Grants were given to schools in which free education was not supplied. But if secondary education is to be provided by any Authority, School Board, or County Council, give no grant unless they carry out your policy, and then you can rely upon getting at least some value for your money. There is another point I would like to mention. I notice that the £110,000 for the half of the current year is dealt with in the Bill, and is also included in a Supplementary Estimate.

THE LORD ADVOCATE: It is dealt with by a clause in the Bill.

DR. CAMERON: If dealt with by a clause in the Bill, is there any object in having a Supplementary Estimate? Would it not be better since you have the Supplementary Estimate to take the Supplementary Estimate and vote the money at once. Then as to the permanent allocation. I do not see, from a practical point of view, how you can deal with it otherwise than by Bill. If the £110,000 were now voted the Government would be in a position in which they would not be obliged to hurry forward the Bill in order to get it through by the 31st March, and the Scotch people would be allowed time for its consideration. I shall certainly not, Sir, follow the unusual course of opposing the First Reading of the Bill.

MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): Our friends have come here with practical unanimity, and have spoken as if Glasgow represented the whole of Scotland. They make no recognition of the smaller towns, and speak as if Glasgow represents the condition and mind of Scotland as a whole. Now, Sir, the people of Glasgow are in the fortunate position of having very rich endowments available for the purposes of education, and they have urged that it is the duty of the Government to listen to the voice of the Parochial Boards and Town Council, and to exclude the whole of the rest of Scotland from this Bill. That has been the attitude of the Representatives of Glasgow all through. Sir, it seems to me that there now arises under this Bill an opportunity which will not occur again in a generation, of putting higher schools, secondary, continuations, and technical schools, on a footing which has been impossible in the past, and may be impossible in the future, unless this golden opportunity be seized. I recognise with gratitude, what the right hon. Gentleman says. He put his finger on the sore when he said that in continuation schools in rural districts, where there is a large population, the difficulty is for the people to get for their children education within reach of their own homes. These people cannot afford to board their children out, cannot afford to send them to Glasgow or Edinburgh, or Aberdeen; and, therefore, I would impress upon the Lord Advocate the importance of these evening schools, and the necessity for disseminating them throughout the country districts. Although there are already educated persons there who would supply the teaching power, they have not the necessary laboratories, mechanical and other appliances, to put technical education in motion, neither have they

the money wherewith to meet such an expenditure. What is of more importance to three-fourths of the population than day schools is evening schools. Do what you like, the fact remains that at 14 years of age the children are obliged to take service somewhere in the towns or villages or agricultural districts. Education is practically lost to them before they have reached the age of 21. If you establish these technical schools I will not say that everybody will go to them, but there are certainly many tradespeople and others who will do their best to avail themselves of these evening schools. Our country parishes are in a worse position than they were before the Education Act. Thanks to the good quality of many of the teachers in the parochial schools, there were always a number who took a great interest in promising scholars and brought them on to the University. But since the pressure of the Act of 1872 came the teachers have not been encouraged, and less has been done for higher education in the rural districts than was done before the passing of the Scotch Education Act. Now there is in this £265,000 great opportunity for providing well equipped evening schools, and I most earnestly press the Government not to be stinted in giving money for such a purpose. £60,000 out of £270,000 is a despicable sum to apply for such a purpose as that which I have mentioned. It is all very well to depreciate a smattering of higher education, but the more you get of the beginning of it the more you will get of the continuation of it, and the greater the number of scholars who spend a year at the secondary schools or at the Universities the better will it be for the country. I do not think that in this matter the voice of the counties has been sufficiently heard. I do not think the Government would listen to Glasgow, which is seated in its wealth, for the purposes of secondary education. Let them rather listen to the voice of the people of Scotland. We have been twitted with the difference of opinion which has been disclosed on our Front Bench; but I think that the Member for Midlothian has been drawn into the vortex of Glasgow. Perhaps, not being a Scotchman, and not having the national instincts, he cannot so well appreciate rural Scotch education. Sir, the Parochial Boards cannot be said to be representative so long as the plural property vote exists, and I think this money should rather be given to the Town and County Councils, who are elected on a popular vote. If you distribute it in relief of rates you save them from the criticism of their own constituents. If you do not bind them down to that there will be a power over the popularly elected bodies which will make them consider whether they have been right or whether they have been wrong. My hon. Friend beside me (Mr. Hunter) will speak for the City, I speak for the County of Aberdeen, who have not, in my opinion, been sufficiently considered in this matter. Sir, these are the main considerations which I have to submit to the House. In the first place, you must take into consideration the great difference between the rural districts and small towns and the larger towns and cities. In the second place, this is the grandest opportunity that we shall ever see of completing secondary and higher education in Scotland, and I plead to the Government not to fix their minds too closely on the specific sum, because I believe it will be shown that £60,000 is far too little and far less than ought to be given for educational purposes. In the third place, I say that to whatever purpose you apply this money, so far as the counties are concerned, the very last purpose you should devote it to is the relief of the Parochial Boards. If you give it to them it will be an unqualified and unadulterated present to the landlords.

(9.30.) MR. W. A. HUNTER (North, Aberdeen): In the Bill now before the House the Government have made provision for the Universities; they have made provision for the middle class who are interested in secondary education; they have made ample provision for the landlord; but what have they done for a person not altogether to be ignored or despised—I mean the working man? Working men represent at least three out of the four millions of the people of Scotland; and I ask myself what provision is made in this Bill for the working men?

What good is it going to do them? The sum at the disposal of the Government in the present year is not less than £265,000. Out of that sum, the total, so far as I can see, which can ever reach the pockets of the working man, is £30,000. £235,000 is given to what I may call the upper ten per cent. of the ratepayers—the landowners; but as for three quarters of the population of Scotland, I will defy the Government to show that a single penny will be given to the working man beyond the paltry sum of £30,000 a year. Who found this money? Hon. Members opposite talk as if this money were manna rained from Heaven. I will not ask the House to rely upon my authority alone on a question of this financial character, but I may appeal to the authority of a gentleman who stands very high in the estimation of a Tory Government—I mean the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham. That right hon. Gentleman, among the opinions which, I believe, he has never recanted, has long ago expressed the opinion that the working class pay at least one-half of the Imperial taxation. We know that in Scotland 70 per cent. of the whole of the Imperial taxation comes, not from property, but from the taxes on commodities which are consumed by all classes of the community. We have got £265,000 a year, of which £140,000, as near as possible, is presumably due to the working classes in Scotland. It is taken out of their pockets, and you give them back £30,000. To the working man, therefore, this Bill means a net loss of £100,000 or £110,000 a year. In fact, the whole of this system of financial legislation inaugurated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer is nothing more nor less than a fraudulent device by which money is taken out of the pockets of the working classes and put into the pockets of landowners and the richer classes of the community. This scheme of raising money by Imperial taxation and giving it to local rates is the grossest and most impudent fraud that can possibly be attempted on the working man. Let anyone consider the different position in which the working man stands with regard to Imperial taxation and local rates. I will take only one article—tobacco; and I will assume that a working man consumes only two ounces of tobacco in the week. That will be admitted to be the consumption of a moderate smoker. The duty which the working man pays upon two ounces of tobacco a week is equivalent to a poor rate in Scotland of 8s. in the pound on the average rent of the working man in Aberdeen. Consequently, a more ingenious, a more subtle device for robbing the poor and enriching the rich has never been devised than this most ingenious plan of raining gifts from heaven on the people of Scotland in the shape of relief of rates. Even in regard to the one part of the Government scheme which is not absolutely and wholly indefensible—I mean the provision they make with regard to education—the Government have carefully abstained from doing anything which will be of the slightest use to the working man in Scotland, and have skilfully drafted all their provisions for the exclusive benefit of the landlord class. There are still some elementary schools in Scotland in which fees are charged. Nothing is done by the Government to abolish this iniquitous impost. The most crying and urgent want of an educational system in Scotland is the want of evening continuation schools. Unfortunately, the exigencies of life compel working men to withdraw their children from school at a period at which their minds have not matured and the lessons they have received have not sunk deep into their minds, and it is of the utmost importance to the cause of education that these boys, when they leave school to commence work, should be taken up in the evening classes. What does this Bill do for evening classes? Not a word—not a whisper! Because these evening classes are intended for working men, and the Government have entirely forgotten the existence of the working man in Scotland. A question was put to the Lord Advocate as to what he meant by secondary education. No one could suppose it was possible for any Government to talk of secondary education as meaning anything which did not include technical education. But the Lord

dvocate said he did not think that secondary education included technical education. I will not enlarge upon that point, because it is too absurd a position to take up. It is absolutely necessary, whatever money is spent on secondary education, that technical education shall hold the first place. I agree so far with my hon. friend the Member for the College Division that secondary education, per se, has not any claim or right to be maintained at the public expense. If there were a question purely of providing more than an elementary education, I doubt if you could make out a good claim upon the rates; but I think you can make out a good claim upon the rates if you so provide secondary education that every boy of real ability who ought to be educated shall, notwithstanding the poverty of his parents, have an opportunity of being educated. And I have always held that provision for secondary education in Scotland must be associated with a system of private bursaries or scholarships, by which the clever boys in the elementary schools shall be able to obtain that secondary education. There is a genuine public interest which shall justify expenditure out of the rates on secondary education. But in every provision made by the Government with regard to secondary education they entirely ignore the necessities and the wants of the working classes. The only thing they are thinking of is the wants of the middle and upper classes. I must say a word as to this high financial crime of taking money out of the pockets of the working men—out of their tobacco, whiskey, and tea—to enrich the landlords. I adhere strongly to the view of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, that on the whole the working classes do pay one-half of the imperial taxation. Now, how much are the working classes going to get out of a reduction of the rates? Two years ago, when the Chancellor of the Exchequer tried this iniquitous device of robbing the working man, we defeated him by bringing forward an alternative scheme—namely, free education. And having an eye to the future, and being anxious to prevent any repetition, or attempted repetition, of similar crimes, I moved in August, 1890, for a Return showing who were the persons who paid the rates in Scotland. That Return was to distinguish between dwelling houses, farms, and other property, and it would have given the most absolutely precise answer to the question—who is to get the money if you relieve the rates? In August, 1890, it was agreed that such a Return should be made, and the particular form of the Return was agreed to between the Government and myself. But I did not expect the Government would make the Return in the form proposed. I thought if I allowed three months for getting the information it was a reasonable time. Then I thought that if I allowed three months more, that would be sufficient for the delay in the Scotch Office. After more than that delay I received a communication from the Scotch Office asking me to agree to some slight modification of the Return, and of course I agreed. Then, later, an Order of this House was made for a Return of certain particulars, particulars which ought to have been returned. From the month of August down to the present time no such Return has been made, nor have I had any communication that such a Return is going to be made. And I am not going to deny that I do draw the inference that the Government are purposely keeping back that Return. And why? Because the moment that Return is made, it will be utterly impossible for any Government to propose to the people of Scotland to relieve the rates out of Imperial taxation, for, fortunately, although I have not got that Return, I have got figures which, for all practical purposes, serve the same end. I have got precise figures for Aberdeen; I have accurate figures for Glasgow, and equally accurate figures for Dundee. How does it stand for Aberdeen? It stands in this way with regard to the poor rate and the education rate: that three-fourths—that is, three out of four of the ratepayers—pay only one-eighth part of the gross rates. The result is, that if you give money to relieve the poor rate, three-fourths of the people of Aberdeen will only get one-eighth of that money. Now, with regard to the municipal rates, there is a difference between them and the poor and the education rates. In the latter, half of the rate is paid by the owner, and that makes a material difference between the case of Scotland and that of England. In the case of the municipal rates, the owner in Aberdeen pays only about one-fourth; but it still remains that even with regard to these rates, three-fourths—that is to say, 18,000 out of 24,000—pay only one-fifth, or 18 per cent. of the municipal rates. Now, how does it stand in Glasgow? I was surprised that my right hon. Friend the Member for the Bridgeton Division (Sir G. Trevelyan) did not give us any information as to Glasgow; but I can give the information which he might have given, and which would have been exceedingly valuable and instructive to the House. Glasgow is a town where a very peculiar rule prevails—I believe it is the only town in Scotland where it does prevail—namely, that for the police rate persons who live in houses rented under £10 are charged only half the rate. It is the only town in Scotland where a graduated rate is introduced. Now, what is the result in Glasgow? I find, according to the figures I last got, that 85,000 ratepayers in Glasgow pay £37,000, in round numbers, out of a total rate of £381,000—that is to say, 85,000 of the ratepayers in Glasgow pay less than one-tenth of the municipal rates. Well, how many pay the rest? Thirty-four thousand pay the balance of these rates. Now, what is the result of giving £100,000 to the Municipal Authorities in Scotland so far as Glasgow is concerned? I will take the case of the 85,000 who, roughly speaking, may be called the working classes in Glasgow. The total sum that I suppose Glasgow would get will be about £14,000—perhaps a trifle more. Out of that sum, those who are paying under £5 of rent would receive 2½d. per annum; those who pay over £5 and under £8 would receive 4d. per annum; those who pay between £10 and £8 would receive 5½d. per annum—that is to say, 85,000 people in Glasgow would receive an average benefit under the Bill of 4d. in the year. This relief then of rates, which my right hon. Friend commends to us as so noble an achievement, with his English notions—this ridiculous relief of rates to 85,000 people in Glasgow comes to the munificent sum of 4d. a year. But what does it come to for the richer ratepayers? Above the £10 line there are 34,000 ratepayers, and the average they would get would come to the magnificent sum of 5s. 8d. per annum. Just imagine the great merchants of Glasgow appreciating a gift like that. Now, these figures are absolutely exact. The proportion of rates paid by the great bulk of the people of Scotland is only one-tenth of the whole; and of course the necessary consequence follows. Now, Sir, it has been cast up to us that the Lord Provost of Aberdeen appeared before the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury to advocate this odious and criminal abuse of public money—the application of money for relief of rates. Well, that is a fact that is naturally very impressive to right hon. Gentlemen like my Friend the Member for Bridgeton Division, who do not know Scotland: but those of us who have been born North of the Tweed put the proper valuation on facts of that kind. Why, everybody knows that in the Town Councils of Scotland it is absolutely impossible for a working man to be elected, except, of course, in the rarest possible cases. In my own constituency, although by far the larger number are working men, it is almost impossible. Working men cannot give up their employment and attend Town Council meetings in the middle of the day; and, consequently, the Town Council is almost invariably composed of the upper ten of the ratepayers. But there is another circumstance that my right hon. Friend may not know, and that is that, in Aberdeen at all events, members of the Town Council are not elected for political reasons. The present Lord Provost is what I believe they call a Liberal Unionist; and Tory Lord Provosts are very common in Aberdeen. A considerable number of our Town Councillors are of a political complexion wholly different from that of the constituency; and nothing could be more erroneous or foolish than to assume that the views of a Town Council on political questions at all harmonise with the views the constituency. I will tell you it the working men of Aberdeen of the subject, and that is much more important than the view of the Council. It was resolved at a meeting of the Trades Council of Aberdeen—

That this Council petition the Members of North and South Aberdeen asking them to use their influence to get the equivalent grant for some purpose—“anything, in fact, more beneficial to the working classes than of reducing the local rates.”

We also had the opportunity of discussing this question with my constituents, and I know perfectly well if any person should be so ill-informed as to come down to North Aberdeen and oppose me for protecting the interests of the working men against this disgraceful spoliation, he would show a very bad result at the election. I now come to the last point of my action, which is to the manner in which the Government propose to deal with this question. I say that it is perfectly monstrous that a doomed Government, a Government that has already forfeited the respect and the confidence of the country, a doomed Government in a dying Parliament, should use a Tory English majority to rule upon the people of Scotland, and against the wishes of the Scotch Members, an abuse of their money totally antagonistic to their desires and to their interests. I say—with the greatest respect—that this House has no right to dispose of this money beyond its own. The days, I hope, are few when shall all be sent to our constituents, when we come back from our constituents right hon. Gentlemen will be sitting there; and, therefore, it is perfectly monstrous that they should support the Tory majority which they have at the present moment in order to force the people of Scotland a use of the money which is not supported and which will not be supported by the majority of the Scottish Members. It may be said that on a former occasion Parliament did deal with the Scottish distribution by means of a Bill—I mean the Local Government Bill of 1889. It is perfectly true, but on that occasion Scotch opinion was perfectly unanimous. That was the Bill which established free education; and although

I always felt that it was a wrong thing in principle to fix the future distribution of money which had not yet been raised by the taxpayer by Act of Parliament, nevertheless on that occasion, when we were perfectly unanimous and there was no likelihood of our decision being reversed at a General Election, it would have been almost pedantic to have raised the objection at that time. But this is a different thing altogether. The First Lord of the Treasury is here taking money which is coming in the main out of the pockets of working men. He is giving it, to the amount of £60,000 at least, direct to the pockets of the landlords. As regards the bulk of the remainder, he is giving it to a very small section of the ratepayers. If this scheme is carried out in the form of a Bill, it could not be altered without the consent of the House of Lords, and it is perfectly monstrous that the people shall not, in the year after next, be able to dispose of their own money without the consent of the House of Lords. What is so objectionable is not only the wickedness of these proposals, but their absolute futility. If you give the £200,000 a year in aid of the rates, the sum which will reach the pocket of the ratepayer is absolutely insignificant. It would not give three-fourths of the people more than 10d. a head per annum, and the richer class would not get more than 10s. or 11s. a head. When once money has been raised by taxation, it is a thousand pities to fritter it away in those petty and almost inappreciable sums, and I should like to see this money employed on some large object. At present there does not exist sufficient unanimity amongst Scotch Members to justify us in asking the Government permanently to appropriate this money for any particular purpose. Suggestions have been made for providing for the unemployed and for artizans' dwellings, and there is also the important subject of making some better provision for old age than the workhouse, by pensions or annuities. The Sub-Committee—of which the Member for West Birmingham is the most conspicuous Member—appointed last year to consider that matter, is approaching the conclusion of its labours, and in two or three weeks will have a definite scheme before it. The money the Government now spend on rates is amply sufficient to start a liberal scheme of pensions for old age, and I trust they will give up this unjustifiable intention, for if they persist in dealing with this matter by Act of Parliament, we shall be obliged to exhaust every Parliamentary resource to secure its defeat. On the other hand, if they bring forward their proposals in connection with the Estimates, they will only affect a year or a year and a half, and will not require the prolonged attention of Parliament.

(10.8.) MR. SHAW STEWART (Renfrew, East): I should not have taken part in this Debate if I did not see it to be thought there was no answer on this side of the House to the remarks of the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down. The hon. Gentleman has the reputation of being somewhat in advance of his time, and he seems to have imagined to-night that the Dissolution had already taken place, and he was addressing meetings of his constituents during the heat of the election. I took down one or two of the epithets he applied to the Government scheme, which he has called a "criminal abuse, an iniquitous device, a disgraceful spoliation, and a financial crime." I think such objections should have been applied, if at all, to England. We have only to deal with the equivalent sum, and those arguments come too late. The hon. Member took no account of the Probate Duty, which forms a considerable bulk of the amount with which we are dealing. He fell foul of the right hon. Member for Bridgeton and spoke of him as an Englishman who favoured this allocation of the money in aid of the rates. As a Scotchman, I am a little surprised to find a Scotchman rebuking an Englishman for advising us to take advantage of a sum of money placed at our disposal, and I think on this occasion the Member for Bridgeton accurately represents the great preponderance of opinion amongst Scotch Members. We should be failing in our national characteristics if we were not to take advantage of this money, and apply it chiefly in relief of the rates. As to the scheme of pensions for old age, to which reference has been made, it should be dealt with, not in connection with the grant for Scotland, but as an Imperial measure affecting the whole of the three Kingdoms.

(10.13.) MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): I think the Debate must have convinced the Government that it is unwise to proceed by Bill in this matter, as it would be opposed by almost every Scotch Member, and by means of every form of the House. On the other hand, if the Government proceed by way of Supplementary Vote, I do not think there would be any great opposition to the money going to the ratepayers, so far as the currents of the next year are concerned, provided the whole question is left open to be determined by a future Parliament. I object distinctly to the allocation of the Scotch money upon the principle of 11 per cent. for Scotland, 80 per cent. for England, and 9 per cent. for Ireland. The Probate Duty was allocated in the proportions in which it was collected from the three countries; but there is no analogy between this case and that of the Probate Duty, and Scotland ought to get her share of an education grant as part of the United Kingdom. In the English Acts, the amount is 10s. per child, and Scotland and Ireland are entitled to receive the same amount. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has got the Government into this difficulty owing to the fact that, for the first time in the history of the United Kingdom, he has opened separate accounts for the three separate nationalities. It is a strange irony of fate that the Chancellor of the Exchequer of a Unionist Government has actually been the first to divide the Imperial accounts into national accounts, and has attempted to treat Scotland, not as part and parcel of the United Kingdom, but simply as partners in Imperial concerns with regard to certain specified financial interests. The Chancellor of the Exchequer would not have got himself into a difficulty if he had dealt with the amount as coming from the Imperial purse; he might then have said that the policy was one and the same for the whole kingdom, and have applied it equally to all parts. But when he introduced the principle that it was Scotch money, be admitted that it belonged to the Scotch people, and they ask that it shall be used according to their wishes, apart from Imperial policy. There is, of course, the greatest good feeling towards the Scotch Universities, but it must never be forgotten that according to the Treaty of Union the care and responsibility of the Universities was placed as a burden on the Imperial Exchequer. Attempts by Government to get rid of the obligation have been again and again defeated, and the Universities Bill was resisted until the Finality Clause was taken out of it. We object to recognise in any way the principle of the ratepayers having any responsibility whatever with regard to the up-keep of the Universities. Therefore, in resisting the grant of £30,000, we are not resisting the Universities having ample money for their work, but are resisting the suggestion that the burden should be put on the ratepayers instead of the Imperial Exchequer. In regard to the £60,000 for secondary education, it has been overlooked that in Scotland there is no such thing as elementary schools ; the word "elementary" does not occur in the Scotch Education Act. On the contrary, there is a special clause providing that the standard of the old parochial schools shall not be lowered. The parochial school in Scotland is the feeder of the Universities, and, therefore, we maintain that secondary education qualifying for the Universities is part and parcel of the School Board education of Scotland, and that was in operation before the passing of the Education Act. Why has education in Scotland been lowered ? It is because the Scotch Education Department gives the very same grant for the higher subjects that it does for the lower ones. The result was, that the teacher found it was more profitable to cultivate the lower specific subjects than to waste time on one or two higher subjects—as Greek, and Higher Mathematics — probably bringing in about 2s. a year per child. The result is, that the higher subjects have been driven from the parochial schools. The Scotch Education Department has done this evil, and they have the remedy in their own hands. By a slight alteration of the Code they can give lower grants to the lower specific subjects and higher grants to the higher subjects. This would stimulate higher education. Another reason why the education has gone down is that the Department has done all it can to get everyone into the Board Schools, which have competed with the private schools to such an extent that the latter have been driven almost entirely out of existence, and those that are left are in a most crippled condition. Any attempt to bring secondary education into Scotland must be by reverting to the old process of the parish school, having secondary education as its final end. If you do that, your elementary education will be better also. It was the enthusiasm of the teacher which selected the brighter boys in the parochial school and sent them up to the Universities ; but since this large sum of money has been given for education in Scotland, secondary education and the attendance at the Universities have both gone down rapidly. As an alteration of the Code would encourage secondary education ; this grant of £60,000 is quite unnecessary for the purpose. By your past legislation and the proposals of this Bill you give the Parochial Board ratepayer about £100,000 a year. The Parochial Board ratepayer is the very man who pays the school rate. If by an alteration of the Code you ordered that every school in Scotland shall be free as regards elementary education up to any standard you like, the effect would be that you would put a burden on the ratepayers of £20,000 or £30,000 a year. But then you have given him, on the other hand, £100,000 a year by your grants ; so that if you give all this money to the ratepayer, you give him relief from taxation, and you can couple with the gift the condition that the School Boards shall free elementary education throughout Scotland. If you give the whole of the money to the ratepayer, and then make the School Boards give free education, you are practically doing the same thing as far as dividing the money between Parochial Boards and School Boards is concerned. But in matters of this kind it is impossible to proceed by way of a Bill. You will have to fight the application of the money clause, and you will have to fight the question of the permanency, and there would not be enough time for the House to go into a Bill of such contentious nature. If, however, they are willing to proceed by estimate, there is no reason why the Vote for this year should not be granted within a couple of hours, and no reason why the permanency should not be passed in about the same period of time; and there is evidently no other specific scheme; but to give the money to the ratepayers in the meantime is a matter on which all the Scotch Members will unite.

*(10.32.) MR. S. WILLIAMSON (Kilmarnock, &c.): I think, Sir, that Grants-in-aid, both on the ground of principle and of political inconvenience, are wrong. But we are not responsible for proposals of this character. A certain sum of money falls in equity to the share of Scotland corresponding to that given to England, and it is quite fair that we should get it, and reasonable that we should take it. The Government are responsible for creating a great thirst in Scotland for this money, and they have now the obligation resting on them of trying to satisfy it. I hope they will do so by Estimate and not by Bill. The demands of the Parochial Boards appear to me to be popular demands, and as I see no proposals before the House of an alternative character, I am prepared to say that, as far as the grants to County Councils and Parochial Boards are concerned, they are fair and reasonable proposals. The allocation to the Parochial Boards must be somewhat definite, but I hope there may be a larger share of liberty given to the Town and County Councils. I trust the Government will see the advantage of proceeding by estimate. We all have our schemes for the distribution of the money. There is the plan of the hon. Member for North Aberdeen, who has a scheme for national pensions; and though it may not at present be in a form to come before the House, we should not shut the door against it next year or the year after that. I should like to have a large slice of this money for fishery harbours. There is a splendid opportunity of doing a great deal of good—providing cheap food, helping the fishermen, and providing for manning the Navy in time of need. I hope the Government may yet see the desirability of devoting some part of this money to the improvement of fishery harbours.

*(10.35.) SIR C. J. PEARSON: I do not propose in the few remarks I have to make to range over the whole of this discussion, because I think it would not be well if I were to do more than refer to those considerations which touch the question whether the Bill should be introduced or not. I do not propose to say anything as to the mode in which the amount of the grant is fixed, or as to the policy which Parliament has endorsed as to the Local Taxation (Scotland) Account. Nor do I propose to solve the doubts which have been raised, especially on the Front Bench opposite, whether, and how far, the representatives of the people in various bodies represent their constituents in this matter. There has been disclosed an interesting divergence of opinion on this subject, and I leave right hon. Gentlemen to settle it among themselves. I should have thought that the ordinary mode in which an opinion is expressed in such matters had been sufficiently followed to the knowledge of hon. Members to make it clear to them that there is a considerable body of united opinion on the question of whether some substantial part of this sum should not be devoted to the relief of local rates. But it seems to be doubtful in the minds of some hon. Gentlemen opposite whether representative institutions fulfil their functions in this matter, and whether hon. Members themselves, on the eve of what has been termed a dying Parliament, have a sufficient mandate from their constituents to safely express an opinion on this question. Nor do I propose to enter upon the larger question which has been dangled before the House without any attempt to pit it against the Government proposals—I mean the large national question that has been shadowed forth I shall therefore address myself, and I shall do so very briefly, to one or two of the more practical questions which have been mooted with regard to the proposals which the Government make in the Bill. In the first place, let me say that with regard to the £110,000 there could not be a greater mistake than to say, as has been said by the right

1. Member for Stirling Burghs, that any way whatever the House of Commons was compromised by the action of the Government in that question. The truth of the matter is this. When my right hon. Predecessor asked in the House of Commons whether the amount accruing during this financial year should be distributed according to one principle or another, it was conceded on all hands that a large portion of the total amount should be devoted to the relief of local rates; and inasmuch as that was conceded—and no word was raised in the House when that statement was made—inasmuch as it was conceded that a large portion of the amount should be so devoted, it was proposed, I reasonably and properly proposed, that the whole of that smaller sum which was raised during the current financial year should be devoted in that way, in order to avoid the double discussion which would be necessitated if it were appropriated upon what I may call a more permanent basis. In reference to the question of grant, I make it clear enough that this amount is to vary in the proportion which I have indicated, as English amount varies, and that surplus, if there be a surplus, the figures which I mentioned to the House, will be contributed to the relief of local rates. With respect to the fact that this Bill makes mention of the relief of the children remaining on elementary education, which has been made an objection to the Bill, I have only to say that it seems to me that the objection has hinged in it that should be considered. I believe that to devote any substantial part of this grant in that direction would operate most unfairly, and that it would affect, not only in an unappreciable benefit where it was so applied, but would necessitate a corresponding amount to those parts of the country which had no need of it, because they had been met by the grant already given. In reference to the suggestion that has been made that the grant proposed for secondary education should not be subject to Minutes of the Department, it should be laid upon the Table of Parliament.

ment, but should be remitted to the Local Bodies and County Councils, the effect of that would be to produce something like dual control in the matter of education. I leave this matter where I have left it at the present stage of the Bill, and I propose upon the Second Reading to lay before the House a scheme shadowing forth what is proposed as regards the distribution of this part of the grant. I hope it will not be understood that, with regard to the grant proposed to the Universities, it is the intention either of myself personally or of the Government to interfere with the position which those Universities undoubtedly hold under the Statute. I do not myself, however, see that this is any reason whatever why the Universities should not obtain the benefits that we propose to confer upon them by this grant. I think there may be a distinction between the maintenance of the Universities and their improvement and extension; but I cannot see how anyone can say that their statutory position is affected by the proposals laid before the House. As to the relief of rates, I do not propose to add anything to what I have said. There is on this point also a most interesting difference of opinion, and so far from my feeling that that difference of opinion is a reason for not submitting the proposals to the House, it seems to me that the proposals we have submitted will be far more likely to command confidence in Scotland, just because the matter we submit has received, as it is receiving, full discussion. It is said by one section that the local Parliaments, as they are called, ought to have the full and free disposal of this money for any purpose they please, from secondary education down to model lodging houses. It strikes me that this is the reductio ad absurdum of the subject. The idea of putting the improvement of secondary education in Scotland on a footing like that seems to me, with great deference to the right hon. Gentleman who suggested it, to show an entire want of appreciation of the necessities of the situation and of what is likely to tend to the improvement of that education as an organised system. It seems to me it would leave the matter to a variety of fluctuating opinions in the bodies that would have to deal with this money, and would, therefore, leave it in a loose and unsatisfactory position. With reference to the special question that has been raised, as to whether the Government has forgotten the existence of the working man—I am sorry the hon. Member is not in his place, or I would remind him—but I would remind the House that the money we are dealing with practically comes, not from Imperial taxation generally, but is the outcome of special taxes which have been assigned towards relieving local taxation; and that being so, it would be necessary, not merely to consider how much the poor man pays for his tobacco and his tea, but how much there is paid in respect of the Probate Duty, and it is quite out of reason to say that the poor man gets no benefit, and is not taken into account. I think I have now dealt with most of the points that have been appropriately raised at this stage.

(10.55.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I have been informed by the highest authority in the House that there exists the gravest doubt as to whether the Bill which my right hon. Friend has introduced ought not to be introduced in Committee. In order, therefore, that the House may not come to a decision which may possibly turn out to be nugatory, I beg to move that the Debate be adjourned until it is ascertained what is the proper course to pursue.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. A. J. Balfour.)

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I think the course proposed by the right hon. Gentleman is the right one, and would be the more convenient.

DR. CAMERON: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman when it is proposed that the Second Reading should take place?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If the doubt which I have stated to the House as existing prove to be well founded, of course it will have to be introduced in Committee.

Sir C. J. Pearson

DR. CAMERON: But that would take no time.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: We shall not be able to take the Second Reading for some time, as we have other Second Readings. Besides, I think it is only fair that the Bill should be considered by the people of Scotland.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I hope this will be a lesson to the right hon. Gentleman, who is now the Leader of the House, not in future to waste time, but to consult with the authority of the House before introducing Bills.

MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the Bill will be printed before the Estimates are brought in, as the Bill bears upon the Votes?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If it is to be taken as an honourable understanding that there is to be no debate the Bill would be brought in before the Estimates.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I do not think the right hon Gentleman should imply that there has been waste of time already. The discussion which has taken place, which I admit has been lengthened, is still not surprising, considering the importance of the question. I assure the right hon. Gentleman that there was no desire to prolong the debate unduly.

MR. SOMERVELL (Ayr, &c.): I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury as to the £110,000; how it is to be applied; whether by Resolution or embodied in a clause in the Bill? If the Bill is not passed by the 31st March I understand we will lose it.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have to say in answer to the hon. Member that the grant he refers to will be embodied in a Bill, but I hope none of the serious results he has anticipated will ensue.

Motion agreed to.

Debate adjourned till to-morrow.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [22nd February], "That leave be given to bring in a Bill to improve National Education in Ireland."

re resumed.

MR. M. J. KENNY (Mid) : I beg to move the adjournment of the Debate. It will be remembered that this discussion was at a very late hour on last day, and the discussion lasted it an hour and a-half in the course of my hon. Friend the Member for West Belfast and some other Friends ; and the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, in Question time this evening, gave his assent to my hon. Friend the Member for West Belfast that the discussion of this Bill would be taken after half past 10 o'clock. At 11 o'clock, and, therefore, I move the Adjournment of the Adjourned, and Question proposed, the Debate be now adjourned." (M. J. Kenny.)

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR ENGLAND (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds) : After the observations of the Gentleman as to the absence of a Member for West Belfast, or the undertaking given in my part of the evening, of course, shall agree to the Motion that the Debate be adjourned.

I agreed to.

Moved in Committee.

CLASS I.

£35, Supplementary, Houses of Parliament Buildings.

CLASS II.

5. £1,690, Supplementary, Public Works Office, Ireland.

CLASS III.

6. £2,000, Supplementary, Law Charges.

7. Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a Supplementary sum, not exceeding £100, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1892, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Police Courts of London and Sheerness."

(11.8.) MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton) : I do not want to go over the arguments in regard to the scandalous character of this particular Vote, but it is well known that almost every Gentleman on this side of the House who does not happen to be a London Member is of opinion that any charge for the Police Courts of London ought to be thrown upon London itself. We are obliged to pay a sum towards the Bow Street Court because some extradition cases are tried there ; but we on this side of the House do not see why we should be obliged to pay for Police Courts at Sheerness and Wandsworth and other places in the vicinity of London. Though really anxious as I am to expedite Public Business—

THE CHAIRMAN (Mr. COURTNEY, Cornwall, Bodmin) : The hon. Gentleman is not to enter into the subject of the original Vote, except so far as it is necessary to illustrate the present Vote.

MR. LABOUCHERE : I merely wish to point out how monstrous and excessive the original Vote was, and how super-monstrous it is to ask us to pay £100 more. I certainly shall divide on this Vote.

(11.10.) DR. CLARK (Caithness) : It certainly happens in our country that we have to pay all these charges out of local rates ; and when we clean our Courts and have these medical witnesses we pay for, it is not out of the Imperial Exchequer, but from the local rates ; and I think it is right that the people of London should be in the same position as all the people in the provinces, and that they should put their hands in their pockets and pay for the cleaning of their Courts, and not ask the poorer parts of the country, such as Caithness, to pay for it. I join with my hon. Friend in protesting against this Vote.

(11.12.) MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I certainly objected last Session to pay these expenses out of Imperial Funds, whereas the expenses for other Courts outside London have to be paid by the constituencies themselves. I join in the objection to this Vote for £100; and I think we ought to have some explanation from the right hon. Gentleman why he wants more than was voted last year. I am not aware of any reason why the Courts should want more cleaning this year than the year before, or why they should want more cleaning than was estimated during the last Session. I object to this Vote, therefore, on two grounds—the one is, that we ought not to be called upon to vote this sum out of the Imperial Funds at all; and the other is, that we have had no explanation from the right hon. Gentleman at all as to the reasons for asking these supplementary sums.

*(12.15.) THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. STUART-WORTLEY, Sheffield, Hallam): The explanation of the necessity for the sum stated in the Supplementary Estimates for which we have had to apply is this. The House will remember that a Committee was appointed under the presidency of Mr. Justice Wills for the purpose of seeing what improvements were necessary to be made in certain of the Police Courts for the better accommodation of untried prisoners. The recommendations of this Committee have led to a very considerable enlargement of some of the Courts and an increase in the number of cells, and further improvements. That necessitated considerably increased labour for cleaning. These improvements proceeded gradually step by step, and some of the expense has fallen outside the time in which the ordinary Estimates could be presented to Parliament.

(12.18.) MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): When we ask for money for improving the Courts in Green Street, in Dublin, as we have done over and over again, not one single sixpence can be screwed out of the English Treasury, and we have been met practically with a stern refusal unless the Corporation pays a certain amount. But the moment Mr. Justice Wills says he is not quite comfortable because there is a draught on his poll, there is an Estimate for better accommodation presented to Parliament. The explanation of the hon. Gentleman is quite acceptable, and we shall know how to turn it to account at the proper moment.

MR. MORTON: The hon. Gentleman did not explain as regards the medical fees. I know there were very many complaints, especially during last August, of the want of medical attendance. In one case a prisoner died who was said to be drunk, and I think there should be more attention paid to these police cases by the medical officers. I should like to have a little explanation of this item.

*MR. STUART-WORTLEY: The amount for the medical witnesses' fees fluctuates very much, and is an item extremely difficult to estimate; but it forms a very small portion of the Estimate which is applied for.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 125; Noes 90.—(Div. List, No. 7.)

Resolutions to be reported.

CLASS V.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a Supplementary sum, not exceeding £22,600, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st of March 1892, for the Expenses of Her Majesty's Embassies and Missions Abroad."

MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I see in this Vote a sum of £5,000 for telegrams "consequent on the state of affairs in America and China." The only information we have on these matters is contained in the daily papers. No right hon. or hon. Gentleman has given us any information. I gather from the daily papers that there have been difficulties in China with regard to the missionaries, and that, no doubt, put the Government to extra expense. I am still in some difficulty with regard to America. An hon. Gentleman besides me says he does not know where America

I am glad we adopted free education last year, for in the future people will get to know where America is. Sir, I have not been able to gather in the newspapers any information to any extraordinary condition of ours in America. I do not know whether the extra expenditure arises in connection with the election of the President. Three years ago we tried to interfere. Whether that is the way this money has been expended I do not say. I trust we shall have information.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. J. W. LOWTHER, Cumberland, M.P.): I hope to be able to satisfy the hon. Member by saying, shortly, as aid in the Debate on the Address, that with regard to China, Papers have been in an active state of preparation and will shortly be laid upon the Table. Considerable apprehension was excited in the autumn of last year in reference to the anti-foreign riots that took place in various parts of China. It became necessary to enter into telegraphic communication with Her Majesty's representative at Pekin, which, as the hon. Gentleman is aware, is a considerable distance from London, and the cost of telegrams to Pekin and back is very considerable. With regard to America, the telegrams which have passed between Her Majesty's Government and Her Majesty's Representative at Washington were due to the protracted negotiations which have been in course of progress during the autumn. In reference to Behring Sea, America also comprises South America, as the hon. Member is probably aware, there was a revolution in Chili in the autumn, by which British interests were considerably affected and angered, and it became necessary to communicate very frequently by telegram with Her Majesty's Representative in that country. Papers on that subject are being prepared, and I hope to lay them on the Table next week.

MR. MORTON: Can you say what portion of this extra expenditure is applicable to Chili, and what is applicable to America?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER: I am afraid I cannot answer that question straight

MR. MORTON: I think the hon. Gentleman has made out my case, and I think I may appeal to the First Lord of the Treasury to have this Vote postponed. We ought to have the Blue Book promised by the hon. Gentleman before voting this money, and with regard to America we should have more information.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Government have no desire to take any controversial Votes to-night, and I do not think this is a controversial Vote. The extra expenditure was owing to the telegrams rendered necessary by the peculiar state of things in America and China, and on the ordinary Estimates the hon. Gentleman will have ample opportunity of discussing the policy of the Government in these matters. The question of policy does not now arise. I hope the Vote may now be taken.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Nobody admires more than I do the strenuous exertions in the interests of economy of my hon. Friend third behind me (Mr. Morton), but at the same time I think he is now going a little too far. There were difficulties in China, and whether Her Majesty's Government conducted the negotiations properly or not, telegrams had to be exchanged. There was a mistake about the Behring Sea dispute, and about that it was also necessary that telegrams should be exchanged. I should be sorry if by any premature vote my hon. Friend abridged our opportunities of going fully into these matters hereafter.

MR. MORTON: I do not object to my hon. Friend intervening. I do not object to these telegrams. I said I knew there were troubles in China; but I said that as a matter of principle we ought to have this information before voting this money. I move that Item E. be reduced by £200.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Item E (Telegrams), be reduced by £200."—(Mr. Morton.)

MR. T. M. HEALY: I should like to know when the Chilean Papers will be produced. We do not condemn the action of Her Majesty's Consul there; but we have some observations to make with regard to some other Representative of Her Majesty's Government there. We are anxious to see the instructions given to Her Majesty's Minister. I think Her Majesty's Government acted very properly, but I should like to see the exact instructions they gave.

(11.40.) MR. D. CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E.): I quite agree with the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere). I do not think that an item for telegrams is a very suitable occasion for opposition on our part. We may think, and I suppose we do think, that the administration of these matters might be placed in other hands when the administration would better command the confidence of the country; but so long as the country leaves the present Government with power, I think it is unworthy of the Liberal Party to take a Division on this Vote of £5,000 for telegrams. I have perfect confidence that the right hon. Gentleman opposite has formed a just and proper decision as to the expenditure of such a sum as this. I do not think we ought to make this a subject for division; we have much more important subjects than this, upon which we shall have to join issue with the Government.

(11.41.) MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I do not agree with the hon. Member for Lanark (Mr. Crawford); I think this is an unprecedented—a monstrous—sum to ask for telegrams in a Supplementary Estimate. Look at the original sum asked for last year—£14,000—and here we are asked to vote £5,000 in addition without any explanation of the causes requiring this enormous expenditure. I think we might be told what portion of the expense is due to affairs in China, and what portion to America or to Chili. For my part, I confess I think if the Government had abstained from interference in Chilian affairs and had sent fewer telegrams there, it would have been better. I think that most of the troubles arose in Chili, if not from the interference of the British Government, yet from the attitude of British subjects there. That, however, is a matter of opinion. In the first place, I object to the Vote because it is too large; and, in the second place, we have not the information to justify us in voting so large a sum; and I think these Estimates are prepared in a way that seems to me disrespectful to the Committee. We have not definite information. Part of the amount is debited to the negotiations in reference to the Behring Sea Fisheries, but it will be observed that the next item is one of £7,000 for the Behring Sea Commission, and I do not see why the cost for telegrams in this connection should not be charged to the expenses of that Commission. I should like also, before the Vote is passed, to have some assurance that we shall have, during the Session, an opportunity to discuss, with due information before us, the policy of the Government in reference to their interference in the affairs of Chili.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR assented.

(11.44.) DR. TANNER (Cork Co. Mid.): Of course I fully recognise the argument of the hon. Member for North-East Lanark (Mr. Crawford), but, at the same time, I think hon. Members will recognise the fact that upon many of these apparently trivial items, even on such an item as this for telegrams, very great points of policy have frequently been threshed out in Committee of Supply. There can be no doubt, from the various remarks which have been made in the course of the last few minutes, that this question of telegrams does attach itself in an intimate degree with the state of affairs in Chili, in China, and other places. I do not wish to go into details upon these matters, but it strikes me as a matter of convenience and common-sense after having heard the speech of the hon. Gentleman who is new to his office as Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, and we having also another neophyte in the position of Secretary to the Treasury, it does seem to me that these gentlemen are not really in a position to give us that full information to which we are entitled when dealing with these matters. I do not wish to raise any captious controversy, or put any foolish questions, but here is a large sum charged—large for the purpose—and it is our business to know how, and why, the money is spent. For this reason I support my hon. Friend (Mr. Morton). In a somewhat diffident way the Under Secretary has expressed himself, and we are promised Blue Books which, I think, ought to be in our hands when we are asked to vote this money. Under the circumstances, I do think that the First Lord of the Treasury, whose ability we recognise, would do well to postpone the Vote now, giving to his two neophytes the opportunity to make themselves acquainted with all the facts, and so we shall dispose of the Vote with full information before us.

(11.47.) Mr. WOOTTON ISAACSON (Tower Hamlets, Stepney) rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put;" but the CHAIRMAN withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.

Debate resumed.

(11.47.) MR. T. M. HEALY: Will the hon. Gentleman say when we shall have the Blue Books he has mentioned?

*(11.47.) MR. J. W. LOWTHER: I cannot say definitely. I had hoped they would have been circulated before now. I will inquire, and will push forward the work as rapidly as possible.

(11.48.) MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): When reference is made to Chili, we cannot but be aware of certain very suspicious circumstances in connection with British interests there, so that I certainly think we ought to have Papers on the subject. I do not wish to interpose any undue delay in the proceedings of the Committee, but somehow of late years a bad custom has grown up—a double-barrelled, bad custom. I might say, first of all, the ordinary Votes are taken so late that we have not time to discuss them, and then, on the other hand, when we approach these Votes early in the session we are told discussion is premature. Are we premature in seeking a discussion on this the proper opportunity, and why should we wait until the autumn? As regards affairs in Chili, distinctly I am of opinion, and it is an opinion I think will be shared by all Members who are interested in the comity of nations, that we should have full information before we vote this large sum, part of which is due to negotiations arising out of suspicious circumstances in relation to the revolutionary movement in that country.

(11.49.) DR. CLARK (Caithness): I would appeal to my hon. Friend to withdraw his Motion for the reduction of the Vote. I do not see that he has given sufficient ground for it. I am quite willing to debate the question as one of expenditure on telegrams; but as a matter of the policy of the Government in Chili or in China, we shall have better opportunity for discussion on the Foreign Office Vote, and on the Admiralty Vote will arise the question of the conveyance of specie. There is no question of policy indirectly arising on this Vote for telegrams that could not better be discussed on the Foreign Office Vote.

(11.49.) MR. MORTON: I trust that even now the Government will consent to postpone this Vote. Personally, I do not wish to take a Division. I do not oppose the item, for, indeed, I do not know the particulars, nor does any Member of the Committee. Possibly, the Government may feel stronger, being reinforced by the assistance of the hon. Members for Northampton, North-East Lanark, and Caithness, but what they have said does not alter my opinion as to the facts of the case. There was one point particularly mentioned by the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon), who pointed out that while the total sum asked for last year was £14,000, we are now asked to vote a supplementary sum nearly a third of the original sum, and yet not the slightest information is given as to the expenditure of the money. We are told that in a day or two Blue Books will be laid on the Table, but, apparently, the Under Secretary cannot give us any information now. Well, then, there is a sufficient reason for postponing the Vote. I find it stated that part of the amount is consequent upon the state of affairs in America, and I am reminded that this may include South America, but our information does not say so. In answer to the question from myself the Under Secretary frankly owned he could not tell us how much of the money was spent in relation to Chili, and how much in relation to the United States. With this absence of information it is absurd to ask us to take the Vote tonight. I make no charge of improper expenditure, but, as a matter of principle, I say before we pass the Vote we are entitled to require information about it. I am sorry the Government do not see this. It can make no difference to them if the Vote is postponed for a day or two. If they had acquiesced in the suggestion they would have saved time, and by now we might have passed a number of other Votes. As it is, I do not see my way to withdraw my Motion for a reduction, although I should be sorry to take a Division. I should be much better pleased if the Government would consent to postpone the Vote until they could give us the required information. As I have said, this is a matter of principle, and I emphasise the point because it refers, perhaps, to hundreds of Votes on the Estimates. We are entitled to have the fullest possible information when we take the Votes, and not afterwards. It is ridiculous to ask for the Vote and say we shall have the information at some future time. Another point has been raised by the hon. Member who mentioned the Behring Sea Fisheries Commission; and, certainly, I think that if any of this expenditure is due to that account, it should be included in Item "M." I quite understand why this should be a separate item, but it does not represent the expenses of the Commission if the telegraphic expenses are not included.

(11.58.) MR. SYDNEY GEDGE (Stockport) rose in his place and claimed to move "That the Question be now put;" but the Chairman withheld his assent, and declined then to put that question.

MR. MORTON continued: I do trust the right hon. Gentleman will consent to postpone the Vote. I am anxious not to take a Division, but to obtain information which we have a right to demand with the Vote before us. It is very well for the Leader of the House to tell us that opportunities for discussion will arise later in the Session; but I am sorry to say that, so far as my limited experience goes, we do not get those opportunities. If we leave matters over until the regular Estimates for the year are before us, we shall find ourselves in exactly the position we were in last year at the end of the Session, when Votes for millions of money were forced through at late hours of the night when public discussion was impossible. It is absurd to tell us to take our chance of another opportunity; we shall never get our opportunity unless we make it. I have made up my mind that we can only hope for discussion early in the Session, and whenever matters require it I shall endeavour to raise discussion on Supplementary Estimates and Votes on Account. So far as I have been able to read the newspapers, and that is the only source of information in regard to this expenditure—and I admit that hon. Members have a right to laugh, for it is ridiculous that Members of the British House of Commons should have to go to the daily Press for information they ought to obtain here—the greater part of this expenditure arises upon a subject fairly open to our discussion—the foreign policy of the Government.

It being Midnight, the Chairman left the Chair to make his report to the House.

Resolutions to be reported to-morrow.

Committee also report Progress; to sit again to-morrow.

MILBANK PRISON BILL.—(No. 140)

Considered in Committee.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Clause 1 stand part of the Bill."

(12.2.) MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): Yesterday, at an hour equivalent to this, when we had a Bill before us to which no opposition was expected, the Municipal Franchises (Ireland) Bill, the First Lord of the Treasury, in a manner as offensive to Irish Members as he could make it, refused to allow progress to be made with the Bill. I therefore now move that you report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again," put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again to-morrow.

LOCAL AUTHORITIES (ACQUISITION OF LAND) BILL.—(No. 139.)*SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Knowles.)

(12.4.) MR. M. J. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid) : This is rather a technical Bill ; may I suggest that the hon. Gentleman should give us some explanation of it ?

(12.4.) MR. KNOWLES (Salford, W.) : A memorandum on the back of the Bill sets out in concise and clear terms the object of the Bill, and I do not know that I can give an explanation in a better form, and so I will read the memorandum as follows :—

"Assurances by deed of land for the purposes of a public park, a schoolhouse, an elementary school, or a public museum, or for the purpose of providing dwellings for the working classes in any populous place, are already exempted from the operation of Parts I. and II. of the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1888. It is proposed by this Bill to extend that exemption to all assurances by deed of land to Local Authorities for any purpose for which such authorities are authorised to acquire land. The restrictions on the assurances of land which it is proposed to remove occasionally create very great local inconvenience. For instance, if a landowner wishes to grant a plot of land, however small, to a local authority for any public purpose, other than one of those specially exempted from the operation of Parts I. and II. of the above-mentioned Act, 'without full and valuable consideration,' the deed must within six months of its execution be enrolled in the central office of the Supreme Court of Judicature, and if the grantor dies within twelve months of the execution of the deed, the grant is void."

I may add that I noticed in yesterday's papers the case of a grant of land to which the Bill would apply. Supposing the grantor should die within 12 months, then the grant would be void.

(12.6.) MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.) : Are we to assume from the silence of the Government that they approve of the Bill ?

(12.6.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER, Isle of Wight) : The principle is one which I think may be conceded, but I do not pledge myself to the details.

(12.6.) MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) : Will the hon. Gentleman say is it the same Bill which was read a second time last year ? Does it apply to Ireland ?

(12.6.) MR. KNOWLES : The same Bill, and it does not apply to Ireland.

(12.6.) MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.) : Does it apply to Scotland.

MR. KNOWLES : No.

Objection being taken to further proceeding, Debate adjourned till tomorrow.

BELFAST CORPORATION (LUNATIC ASYLUMS, &c.) BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That the Bill be now read a second time.”

(3.10.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): This Bill has two objects, both of which I conceive ought to be dealt with, not by means of a Private Bill, but by the Local Government Bill before the House at the present time. One of these objects relates to the contributions of the City of Belfast for the maintenance of Reformatories and Industrial Schools. The City of Belfast at present contributes in this respect with the Counties of Down and Antrim. By the Local Government Bill the Corporation of Belfast will become an Urban County Council, and will acquire the fiscal powers now exercised by the Grand Juries of the counties. It is evident, therefore, that the purpose intended by this portion of the Bill will be more effectually attained under the general law, and this portion of the Bill ought not to be entertained by the House. But my main objection to the Bill concerns the Lunatic Asylum at Belfast, and the extent of the asylum district. At present the Antrim district is included with the City of Belfast, and the asylum is governed by a Board of Governors, nominated partly by the local contributors and partly by the Lord Lieutenant. Some time ago the Board of Control, a State Department instituted by Parliament for the government of Lunatic Asylums in Ireland, agreed to the erection of a second lunatic asylum in the County of Antrim, to meet the requirements for further accommodation ; and for convenience and the health of patients it was arranged that transfers should be made from the one to the other. The Board of Governors of the existing asylum at first approved of the project, and the promoters of this Bill have circulated a statement for the information of the House, which I cannot but characterise as extremely misleading, and one which, in my experience, is unprecedented in its recklessness ; for they state that the Board of Governors are in favour of this scheme, whereas the fact is, that although the Board of Governors a long time since—I think in 1890—at a small meeting passed what may be described as a snatch resolution in favour of a scheme of which they had not then had a clear view, this statement entirely suppresses the fact that within the last few weeks the existing Board passed a resolution adverse to the scheme. I see no Representative of the Irish Government present, or I should like to ask for an explanation of what effect was produced on the mind of the Lord Lieutenant by this change of mind on the part of the Board of Governors. Does the Lord Lieutenant think, does the Board of Control think, that this is a scheme that ought to be carried out? The intention of Parliament, by the Lunatic Asylums Act, manifestly and indisputably was, that changes of this kind should be carried out, if at all, under the authority of the public law by the constituted Department, and not by means of a Private Bill. What is the proposal? The proposal is, not that there shall be two asylums in one district governed by one Board, but that there shall be two Boards constituted for separate management, although it is intended that patients may be transferred from the one to the other. Upon this I may say at once, that to institute two Boards for the two asylums will mean that both the County of Antrim and the City of Belfast will be heavily imputed. Two staffs of high officials, two staffs of assistants, two sets of contractors, with the certainty that higher prices will be paid for two sets of supplies purchased in smaller quantities, two sets of advertisements, and two sets of machinery for the transaction of business generally. On its merits, I say the scheme is one that the House ought not to entertain. But I do not lean most upon that. I rely on the principle that Parliament by Public Statute has created a Department for dealing with questions of this class, and if circumstances require that these matters should be revised or reviewed, then that should be done by Public Act, and not by means of a Private Bill. The Lord Lieutenant and the Board of Control have power to separate, extend, contract, or alter any County Lunatic Asylum District, and they have so separated the Counties of Down and Antrim. I am told that the Lord Lieutenant cannot separate a city from a county, and, if so, it is manifest, I think, that if a difficulty presents itself in this respect it should not be solved by a Private Bill; and, since we have a Local Government Bill before Parliament, why not insert, as a matter of general law, a provision which shall give the Lord Lieutenant power to separate a city from a county? This Bill proposes that the City of Belfast shall be a district in itself—an unprecedented proposition; there is nothing of the kind in Ireland—and that control shall be vested in the Corporation. Now, I fail to discover any argument why an institution supported in one moiety of the cost by the State should be vested in a Local Body. It is proposed to give the Corporation absolute control of the asylum, and on that I have to make two remarks. In the first place, as I have said before in the House, though it led to no practical result, that although one-third of the population of Belfast is Catholic, some three or four score thousands, such has been the jerrymandering of the wards in past times—some 50 years since, when Belfast was a small place—that Catholics are unable to return a single member to the Corporation. There are 80,000 Catholics in the town, yet out of 40 members of the Corporation there is not a solitary Catholic. Now, the proposal is that in regard to the Governing Body of this asylum, in which Catholics have so much interest, the Corporation shall have the power to nominate 12 of the 18 Governors, giving them simply absolute control, and this is in direct contravention of Clause 15 of the Local Government Bill, which provides that the Lord Lieutenant shall nominate half of the Governing Body, upon the principle that as the funds are provided in moieties the representation shall be equal. But the Corporation of Belfast, ignoring this rule, wish to appropriate two-thirds of the representation. It is evident, I think, that the House cannot for a moment entertain the idea of giving ension of power to apply by means of a Private Bill, instead of a Bill by which Government propose to establish a rule of law in regard to a new Department. I say, also, it is intended that patients transferred from the one to the other for the sake of their health, will not be expedient to have two Governors subject to the of establishing two asylums unity. The establishment of this will certainly not contribute to the many of management. Therefore, Bill elaborate, I may say so, provisions for the settlement of disputes between the Board of Health in Belfast and in the county, accommodation of patients, changes to be made. I must institution of two Boards bring with it a conflict of

I submit, that if the public spect to the administration to be amended, as to which no has been shown, this should be public enactment, and not by Bill for one city. I submit, there are matters of account agreements to be adjusted in this between the city and the consequent upon Belfast being under an Urban County Council; yet, I submit it is extremely difficult and inexpedient that the Commons should promote sectional, piecemeal legislation to one city on a question as it does the whole nation, unquestionably a matter of national. If the House entertain this suggestion and, still more, if it becomes law, what will be the effect of the Local Government Bill? That is overladen with Amendments particular legislation for every Ireland. We shall have to amend an Amendment in respect to the Dublin, vesting the asylum there corporation of that city, and Corporation of that city two representation on the Government and providing for two asylums; have to present Amendments alteration of the various districts, and for the increase of the local contributory bodies. of principle, and in point of expediency, the House should decline to entertain, in a Private Bill, these proposals touching a matter of public law. Therefore, I ask the right hon. Gentleman who now represents the Government (Mr. Ritchie), and in whom I have every confidence, though this is a matter more concerning the Irish Minister, to assent to the proposal I make, that the Bill should either be rejected to-day, or that, at any rate, it should be postponed until the mind of Parliament is ascertained in regard to the principle, and even the details, of the Local Government Bill. If the Bill is now persisted with, we must meet it with determined opposition at every stage.

*(3.25.) SIR EDWARD HARLAND (Belfast, N.): I quite hoped that the hon. Member for West Belfast would have given us hearty support rather than have put opposition in the way of the Bill, though I am glad he has adopted the latter course in a rather mild, and I may say rather a good-hearted spirit. It is well known in the neighbourhood of Belfast that such has been the rapid and enormous growth of the city that the Lunatic Asylum which has served for all the patients in Belfast and Antrim has become totally unfit for its purposes; and when I had the honour of a seat as one of the Governors, three or four years ago, the question was continually before the Board of Governors, and the point was raised how the Asylum could be enlarged and made suitable for the increasing requirements. Structural enlargement was deemed impossible, and at that time it was determined that the building should be offered for sale to the War Office, to be used as a barrack. This will give an idea of the extent to which the Governors had at that time gone towards the conclusion that the building was quite unfitted for its purpose. Since then Belfast has still more rapidly increased, until at last it has been found impossible to arrange matters so as to accommodate the whole of the patients from Belfast and Antrim, many of whom have had to be sent to Ballymena and other unions in Down and Antrim. The necessity for an extension of the asylum having been shown, very grave consideration was given to the problem, and in the result we have this Bill, which we submit to the House for Second Reading. The objections the hon. Member has raised should be looked upon rather as minor points which can readily be adjusted by a Committee upstairs, should the House give the Bill a Second Reading. Since the Bill was printed we have had before us the Local Government Bill, some of the minor clauses of which would undoubtedly to some extent affect this Bill, but the promoters, the Corporation of Belfast, are perfectly willing on these points to alter the Bill in Committee. But what we broadly urge on the consideration of the House is that, the necessity for some such change being shown, we were bound to carry it through, and with the object of getting authority for the transfer we submit our proposals to the House. Further, I say the Board of Control in Dublin, having had the matter thoroughly laid before them, came to the conclusion that this was the best course to take, expressed regret that they had not the power to carry it through, and urged proceeding with a Private Bill. County Antrim will erect an asylum for county patients, and the present building will be sold to the Corporation.

MR. SEXTON: Will the hon. Gentleman allow me to ask him one question? Has the mind of the Lord Lieutenant and has the opinion of the Board of Control been ascertained since the Board of Governors rescinded their resolution in favour of the scheme?

*SIR E. HARLAND: With reference to that, I may say distinctly that the Board of Governors came to a definite and decisive resolution in the year 1890 to make this transfer; the Grand Jury of County Antrim approved and raised no objection to it, and it is only within the last two or three weeks that the Board of Governors again reviewed the matter, and it seems to me that it is an unbusiness-like proceeding to raise objections at the last moment, when the Bill had been entered upon, and it was ascertained that the Grand Jury of Antrim raised no objection, and when the points of difference can be adjusted after consideration of all interests by the Committee upstairs. All this was shown to the County Authorities; they waived their objections on minor points, and the County Members are here to support the Second Reading of the Bill, if necessary. It can be shown, I think, that the supposed rescinding of the resolution was a momentary thought, and should not stand in the way of a large transaction of this kind, to which serious consideration has been given for years. If at the last moment a momentary change of opinion should be allowed such weight as to change a course of policy deliberately entered upon, what progress can be made in any important public undertaking? The promoters of this Bill are business men; they have come after serious consideration to the opinion that this change is necessary, and I beg the House to view the proposal of the Belfast Corporation in a favourable light by giving the Bill a Second Reading, leaving points of detail to be fairly and fully discussed before a Committee.

*(3.29.) SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA (Monaghan, S.): The hon. Baronet has not in the slightest degree removed the main objection—that being, that principle and expediency are opposed to such an attempt to deal piecemeal with Local Government administration in one of its most important details, the management of lunatic asylums. The hon. Member for West Belfast has so forcibly, and lucidly, and so unanswerably stated the objections, that I certainly will not attempt to go over them again. I appeal to the Chief Secretary not to allow this Bill to pass, for it conflicts with certain principles in the Local Government Bill for Ireland introduced by the Leader of the House within the last few days. I shall give my most emphatic opposition to the Bill in the shape in which it now appears, and I am sure that if it passes it will be the cause of many objections and amendments being raised to the Local Government Bill.

(3.30.) MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): I do not think there is any dispute as to the necessity for making provision for lunatics in the district. The hon. Member for West Belfast has objected to details in the Bill.

Sir Edward Harland

MR. SEXTON: The establishment of a second asylum has nothing to do with the Bill, that is determined; the main point is, the division of the governorship of the two asylums.

MR. MACARTNEY: One of the objections of the hon. Member was on the score of expense; but I think he must see that if two asylums are established it is impossible that the same staff can be duty in both. The Governors are unpaid, so that the establishment of two Boards will add nothing to the expenses imposed on county or city. Then the hon. Member objected to the clause dealing with the transfer of patients. Now, I am not so locally connected with the city as with the county; but I have authority from the promoters to say that this clause was introduced at the direct suggestion of the Board of Control.

MR. SEXTON: The hon. Member entirely misapprehends me. I do not object to the transfers. I approve of them, they are excellent; but I object to having the control of these transfers of patients under two Boards of Governors.

MR. MACARTNEY: I am dealing with the hon. Member's objections generally, and I wish to explain that this clause did not originate in any deep design or sinister intention of the Corporation of Belfast; but it was introduced at the instigation of the Board of Control. The Board of Control is responsible for this suggestion in the Bill. Then as to the vesting the asylum in the Corporation, where again I think the hon. Member raised an objection. I have authority to say that the promoters will consent to any clause that the Board of Control desire should be introduced. They do not wish to depart from any clause, they will accept anything the Board of Control think it is necessary to insert. On the general question as to the desirability of delaying this Bill until the passing of the Local Government Bill, I think it is hardly reasonable to ask this from the promoters, the necessity for a Bill of that kind being admitted. If I understand the attitude taken up by the hon. Member and his friends, the passing of the Local Government Bill may not possibly become an accomplished fact within the present Session; and the necessity for dealing with this question being admitted, I hardly think the House will object to the Second Reading. But all the objections of the hon. Member go to the clauses, and on these points of objection the promoters are ready and willing to accept suggestions which may be made by the Board of Control before the Committee upstairs.

(3.35.) MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I did not hear with any satisfaction the declaration from the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir. E. Harland) that this Bill has been drawn by business men. Now, if there is anything I abhor in relation to matters of this kind it is an arrangement entered into by business men, for there is almost sure to be some attempt at fraud at the bottom of it, some attempt to take an advantage of somebody. It is part of the system of business men in these business-like arguments on which they plume themselves upon having a superiority over the rest of creation. I have the most profound distrust of the talk about the arrangements of business men. My hon. Friend the Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton) has taken an attitude which entitles him to the gratitude of the House, and especially of Her Majesty's Government. He has hit the blot in the Bill, and I am amazed that the Irish Secretary should have thought this Bill of so little importance that, until he was urgently sent for by the President of the Local Government Board, he did not think it worth his while to attend this discussion. This business arrangement on the part of the Corporation of Belfast is an attempt to contravene the general law; but contrast the action of Her Majesty's Government with that taken towards the Municipal Franchise Bill which we introduced a week ago. What did the First Lord of the Treasury say no later than Wednesday last week? "We cannot have your Bill," said he, "because it is in contravention of our splendid Local Government scheme," the boon he proposes to cram down our throats. But here, as my hon. Friend has said, is a direct attempt to contravene your Local Government Bill, an attempt by Belfast to secure for itself a specific legislative enactment and facilities above all the rest of that part of the United Kingdom called Ireland. Dublin, Kilkenny, Cork, Limerick, Waterford, all the rest of the Corporations of Ireland, are to be subject to the general law, all but Belfast, because Belfast happens to be a centre of that "loyal" minority where so much harmony exists, except on the 12th July, and is to have special legislation.

MR. MACARTNEY: Will the hon. and learned Member allow me to say that, as I have stated, the Corporation are quite willing to drop the exceptional clauses.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Then there remains no necessity for the Bill. The Local Government Bill can be availed of much more cheaply and without the expenses of counsel, who, I understand, get very fine fees for their arguments upstairs. It can be done more cheaply and expeditiously without the expenses of counsel and solicitors, who benefit so largely from this Private Bill legislation. I am amazed that the Chairman of Committees does not interpose with opposition to this Bill. He had hardly been a week in his office when he took part against us for altering the franchise in a Private Bill. In 1885 Sir Charles Dilke put a Franchise Amendment into the Rathmines Bill. We the following year tried to follow that up, but the Chairman of Committees got our proposal rejected, and the borough franchise has remained ever since. What is this but to alter the franchise and derogate from the general law? Here is the general law of Local Government, that the Lord Lieutenant shall have half the power of nomination. Why does not the Chairman of Committees, why does not the Leader of the House, intervene and say, "You must not alter the franchise simply for the erection of another Board of Governors?" What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander. From our point of view, why should not the Corporations of Clonmel or Waterford have similar powers? Where is the keen anxiety of the Chairman of Committees with regard to the alteration of the franchise, when this very week we have had before us a scheme of Local Government, in which dealing with this very question of lunatics is included? The Government were willing that this Bill should pass sub silentio, and but for the vigilance of my hon. Friend this might have been done. I do not interest myself with proposals dealing with lunatic asylums, especially when they are contained in Private Bills; but here the Government were willing to acquiesce in a proposal in a Private Bill to derogate from the general law as embodied in their own Bill. Fortunately my hon. Friend read the Bill, and was here to challenge it, while the Irish Secretary stayed out of the House until he was twice urgently sent for.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): That is absolutely incorrect.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Did the right hon. Gentleman hear one word of the statement of my hon. Friend the Member for West Belfast?

MR. JACKSON: No; I did not, because I was in attendance upon a deputation, and unable to be present here; but I hurried to my place as soon as I was able to do so.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Very good. Accepting that in full, what was the duty of the Representatives of the Government who were present? Why did not the President of the Local Government Board get up and say, on behalf of the Government, that this was an attempt to derogate from the general law, and that it must be postponed until the Chief Secretary could be in his place? Why was not some action of the kind taken? No, but for the vigilance of my hon. Friend, the Bill would have slipped through, because of this arrangement with business men, to whom the hon. Baronet (Sir E. Harland) has alluded. We have business men on this side of the House. The whole question can be dealt with just as well in the Local Government Bill as it can be in the Bill now before us. I say it can be much better dealt with. Of course, we may be asked, "How on earth does the question of Protestant and Catholic come in on the question of the management of lunatic asylums?" We say we are entitled to a fair proportion of the representation on the Local Bodies, and this, owing to your jerry-mandering of the wards in past years, are now unable to obtain. It often happens that some of the unfortunate inmates of these asylums have their ~~on~~ restored towards the close of days, and we say at these moments the consolation of religion should be offered to them. We are entitled to more than a third of the representation, but we have not a single representative on the Board of Control; have not one representative on the Corporation; we cannot even have a Catholic scavenger in Belfast—there is a Catholic employé of the Corporation of Belfast, from town clerk to scavenger. My hon. Friend (Mr. Tton) represents a third of the population of Belfast, and to say that he is not to be heard by the Chief Secretary upon this Bill, because the right hon. Gentleman is attending a deposition, and that the Bill cannot be postponed, is a little too much. I think time has now come for the Government to be heard. They have their Bill, and if they believe in the uses of that Bill for healing the woes of Ireland, let it have equal application in Belfast. You may amend that Bill to include all these questions, and mainly the stand you have taken in the Municipal Franchise Bill is what we may fairly ask you to adopt in this Bill.

41.) MR. JACKSON: The hon. learned Gentleman might have had a great deal of his warmth, there is not the slightest foundation for any of the suggestions and insinuations he has thrown in regard to my absence from earlier part of this Debate. It is gratifying to me, as one of those who are interested in the Irish Local Government Bill, to find, from expressions the learned Member has used, he has a deep conviction that the Local Government Bill is going to pass this Session.

MR. T. M. HEALY: With your ority and the Closure.

MR. JACKSON: And, therefore, the provision of this asylum will not be undiced or delayed to any great extent, even though this Bill should be rejected. Now, I want just to make the position, so far as the organization of this Bill is concerned. I believe there was, long prior to any knowledge on the part of the Local Authorities of what the Local Government Bill would contain, a general opinion that such proposals as these were necessary. There is no connection between the introduction of this Bill of the City of Belfast and the Local Government Bill, as the hon. Member implies there is. This question has been before the Board of Control on many previous occasions, and it is, I believe, admitted on all hands that there is a necessity for some more adequate accommodation for the insane. That everybody is agreed upon. Then the two Local Bodies have been in consultation and communication, and the question comes before the Government of Ireland in this form, their consent being necessary to enable the Local Authority, the City of Belfast, to promote this Bill. There was, I say, an agreement between the two Bodies—a general agreement—that further accommodation was necessary.

MR. SEXTON: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman, am I not right in saying further accommodation has been provided for by order of the Department in Ireland and has nothing to do with this Bill?

*MR. JACKSON: The insane, of course, had to be provided for; but no detailed provision was made in this manner. With regard to the Governing Body, I understand that both the hon. Member for West Belfast and the hon. Member for Longford complain that under the Bill the representation is not fair. As regards the clauses in this Bill which conflict with the Local Government Bill, the Irish Government, in due course, as soon as they saw the Bill, gave notice to the promoters that these clauses would have to be amended or omitted.

MR. SEXTON: What clauses?

*MR. JACKSON: I am speaking of the clauses in this Private Bill now before us relating to the election of Governors, and to which, I understand, the hon. Member has made objection. In the promotion of the Bill the Government take no part; it is purely a local question, but it seems to me to be a reasonable attempt on the part of the City of Belfast to solve the difficulty and make the provision necessary. Before a Committee upstairs all objections can be urged, and upon the evidence before them it will be for the Committee to decide. So far as I am concerned, I am not prepared to vote against sending the Bill to a Committee to be dealt with.

(3.47.) MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I think the statement of the right hon. Gentleman is far from being satisfactory. Of course, we learn with pleasure that the right hon. Gentleman intends to insist that the clauses relating to the election of Governors are to be withdrawn. That we understand to be definitely settled. I must say that I am surprised that it ever entered into the heads of the promoters to insert these clauses. They appear to think that Belfast is entitled to be placed in a different position to any other community in Ireland. Why, this question of representation on the Board of Control is one upon which there has long been controversy between Irish Members and the Government. What is the position in the City of Cork? The Cork Corporation has not a single member representing it on the Board of Control for Cork Lunatic Asylum. Over and over again the Lord Lieutenant has refused, in a manner calculated to give the greatest offence to the great body of ratepayers in Cork, to permit the Corporation to elect a single member to the Board of Control for Cork Asylum, to the maintenance of which the citizens of Cork largely contribute. Cork being in this position, why is Belfast entitled to this privileged position? In a similar way, four or five years ago a municipal franchise was conferred on Belfast which was refused to the rest of Ireland. The doctrine seems to have gone forth that Belfast is entitled to an exceptional electoral position to which no other town can attain. Now, the right hon. Gentleman assumes that our opposition is based on the idea that the Local Government Bill is certain to pass this Session, but I beg to say that no such absurd hypothesis influences our action. But whether that Bill passes or not, this Bill is equally objectionable. If the Local Government Bill passes, then this Bill confers on Belfast electoral privileges in advance of the Local Government Bill, and if it does not pass the position is worse, for then the City of Belfast, under this Bill, would have the right to elect two-thirds of the Governors of the local lunatic asylum, whereas other communities in Ireland would have no right to elect a single member. I should like to have a frank statement from the promoters; if the clauses relating to the election of Governors are dropped, is there any advantage in their Bill at all? What purpose will it serve? It is admitted that under the existing law provision can be made for the erection of an additional lunatic asylum. The only question, therefore, the Bill deals with, the only clauses which are necessary, the only clauses to change the law, are the clauses regulating the franchise, and if these are dropped, then surely that is the death warrant of the whole Bill, for no advantage will be conferred on Belfast, and no privilege that cannot be gained under the existing law. I presume there are some clauses for rating purposes, but that is all. I beg to move that the Bill be read a second time this day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Maurice Healy.)

(3.51.) MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.): I beg to support the Amendment moved by my hon. Friend. I object equally to every part of this Bill. I object, in the first place, because I think the interests of the Counties of Down and Antrim have been neglected in the way the Bill has been prepared in favour of the clique who manage the municipal affairs of Belfast. As a ratepayer of County Down I personally object to the Bill. But I do not merely object on that ground, which would not be a sufficient ground for opposing the Second Reading of the Bill, inasmuch as it is a detail which could be treated in Committee. I object to the Bill, because it proposes to set up a religious tyranny over the Catholic minority in the City of Belfast. ("Oh, oh!") The hon. and gallant Member for North Down (Colonel Waring) expresses his horror at such an accusation being brought against his friends in that city ; but I wonder why the hon. and gallant Gentleman and his friends in Belfast, instead of expressing horror when the accusation is made, do not use their influence with the promoters of this Bill to introduce a certain amount of clemency towards that minority in regard to the management of the municipal affairs of that city. At the present moment, as I had occasion to remark in discussing another Bill the other night, there is not a single elected Poor Law Guardian, not a single member of the Town Council, not a single Harbour Commissioner in Belfast, who is a Catholic. There are 80,000 Catholics in Belfast who are absolutely refused any representation in the Local Bodies. I ask how, in the case of facts like these, the House can purpose to hand over to a body of this exclusive character the right to control matters which affect in the very closest degree the religion of the people ? Of course, hon. Members may say, " What do the lunatics care about religion ? " But I think anybody who has any knowledge of the treatment of the insane will admit that though men are in a lunatic asylum they may none the less, but rather the more, require the consolations of religion to soothe them in their terrible disorders. I say a lunatic, just as much as a sane man, can be made the subject of religious tyranny. This is not an imaginary danger. For years the Poor Law Guardians in Belfast persistently refused to increase by one farthing the miserable pittance paid to the Catholic chaplain for his ministrations to the Catholic poor in the workhouse, and out of 60 nurses in the workhouse they have only one who is a Catholic. They refused, I say, to increase the miserable pittance paid to the Catholic chaplain, and the Local Government Board had to interfere, and got his salary doubled. But the Local Government Board cannot interfere in these matters if this Bill passes ; the Board will have no power to interfere to insure common and decent fairness in the treatment of the people of Belfast. Not merely does this danger exist in reference to lunatics ; there are other clauses in the Bill to which I entreat to draw attention. There is a clause which proposes to transfer to the Corporation of Belfast all powers in connection with Industrial Schools and Reformatories. Now, everybody knows that Industrial Schools and Reformatories are religious institutions ; they are attached to different denominations and controlled and administered by ministers of different denominations ; therefore, in this respect, almost more than in any other department, there is danger of religious tyranny, and this I can show from experience of the county I represent. Cavan is a Catholic county, but the Grand Jury is Protestant. For 16 years in succession, and in spite of continual protests, the Grand Jury of the County of Cavan gave grants to Protestant Industrial Schools and refused to pay a farthing to Catholic Industrial Schools out of the money contributed mainly by Catholic ratepayers. I leave the hon. Member for South Tyrone and others, who abuse the Catholics of Ireland and say they are not fit for self-government on account of their tendencies towards religious persecution, to deal with facts like these. As a Protestant I say, and I deplore it with sincere regret, that the Corporation of Belfast cannot be trusted to give fair play to those members of the Catholic religion who are seeking under unexampled difficulties to bring up young persons of their own faith in Industrial Schools to lead better lives than their fathers did before them. I ask Members of this House, Conservative and Liberal, to pause before they set up an engine of religious persecution, which will be done if this Bill is passed. I hope this Motion of my hon. Friend will have support from both sides of the House. Of course there is one compromise open, if hon. Members who promote this Bill will assent to a redistribution of the wards at Belfast so as to arrive at a fair arrangement by which there may be Catholic representation upon the Town Council. In that way a compromise might be possible. In the Municipal Corporations Act for England there is a provision for the periodical revision of wards, and the Home Secretary, in whose Department the matter is controlled, knows that the power is frequently used in England. In Ireland there is no such power : the wards of Belfast can only be altered by a Public or Private Act of Parliament. It would be possible to make such a compromise in the Bill and prevent the Bill becoming an engine of persecution against the religious minority in Belfast. I ask the House to pause before it sets up an engine of persecution, as would be done by the Bill. It would be in the interests of religion to throw out the Bill.

(4.3.) MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I regret the opposition of hon. Members below the Gangway. I cannot help thinking that if this Bill had been promoted by any other body than the Corporation of Belfast it would have been treated in an entirely different manner. The complaint is, that under this Bill there will be a chance of the Roman Catholic community of Belfast being unfairly dealt with. This is the head and front of the charge that is made against the Corporation of Belfast in this matter. The complaint is that the Catholics of Belfast have no representation on the Corporation. There is household suffrage in Belfast, and the reason why the Roman Catholics are not represented on the Corporation is that the minority are not strong enough to secure representation. The cumulative vote would have secured Catholic representation on the Corporation, but when the Local Government Bill which sought to confer that privilege was before the House, no one opposed it more strongly than the hon. Member for West Belfast.

MR. SEXTON: There was a difference proposed to be made between the counties.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: The hon. Member opposed the cumulative vote. This is a Private Bill promoted by the Corporation of Belfast, and I do not see why it should not receive the same treatment as any English town would receive. The Bill is right in principle, and hon. Members cannot pretend that it is not. Therefore, if it is a right Bill it should be sent to be dealt with by a Committee dealing with Private Bills, where anything that may be wrong can be rectified.

(4.10.) SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby): I rise merely to ask one question, and my view of the matter will be determined by the answer to it. I understand that there are certain clauses in the Bill to which objection is taken by hon. Members well acquainted with the locality. I understand that these clauses have been withdrawn, and I hear from hon. Members below the Gangway that if this is so there will be no necessity for the Bill at all. If these clauses are withdrawn, and if the residuum of the Bill is not necessary or operative for any useful purpose, why should not the discussion cease and the Bill be dismissed? Why should we go into the differences that exist between the religious bodies of Belfast? There has been a good deal of time unprofitably spent, but if we can come to some understanding as to what remains in the Bill which makes it worth while to pass it when these clauses have been withdrawn it will be very desirable.

*(4.12.) MR. JACKSON: I understand that as to Clause 4, which deals with the appointment of Governors to the asylum, the Corporation have expressed their willingness to either withdraw it or to amend it in Committee in accordance with the wishes of the Committee. When the Bill came before the Irish Office, notice was given to the Corporation that the clause in question could not be allowed to pass in its present form, as it would conflict with the Local Government Bill. The clause merely deals with the nomination of Governors of asylums, and is only a matter of detail to which objection has been taken by the hon. Member for West Belfast. The clause seems to me to be perfectly capable of being made to deal fairly with the nomination of Governors proposed in the Bill. The other portions of the Bill deal with the main question, which is that of the financial adjustment between the City of Belfast and the county of Antrim, and the removal of patients from one to the other. It is quite open to Dublin or any other city to promote a similar Bill.

(4.14.) MR. SEXTON: I think the right hon. Gentleman's knowledge of the Bill must be very recent. I should like to know whether the right hon. Gentleman has looked at Clause 9? That clause proposes to give certain powers to the Corporation in respect of the ation of industrial schools, and the subject is to be dealt with under provisions of the Local Government Bill. We desire that Belfast should be treated like the rest of Ireland, but we do not think that it should occupy the time of the House if the House is about to consider a Bill which deals with the whole question.

I never expected that the extension of household suffrage would give Roman Catholics a representation in the Corporation, or that any franchise would be equal. The city was divided into five wards 50 years ago, and the population was 70,000. No representation has been made since then, though the population at the present time is 280,000. The Roman Catholic population has been deprived of all representation, because they have been divided into certain parts of the city. Before the Bill will be withdrawn or passed until we see what Parliament does with the Local Government

I shall oppose the Bill to the last unless the promoters agree to instruction to the Committee to serve the city so as to give the Roman Catholics some representation on the Corporation. If no such representation is given, and if the Bill is read a second time, I will move that it be referred to a Hybrid Committee, with special powers to divide Belfast in such a manner as to give the Roman Catholics the representation they desire.

17.) MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Minn.): Any appeal based on a wish to secure the better representation of minorities will be received by me with a favorable ear. The question, however, before the House does not turn on such considerations. The House, in my opinion, is in rather an awkward position.

Belfast is proposing a Private Bill, and the Government are proposing a Public Bill, and if the latter becomes law much of the advantages proposed in the Private Bill will become unnecessary. The practical question is, whether Belfast, having presented a Private Bill to the House, shall be prevented from going on because the Government have proposed a Bill which deals with the same subject? There are always uncertainties with regard to Belfast, but I confess I do not see any reason for destroying the ordinary right of Belfast to go on as it proposes to do with a Private Bill. The hon. and learned Member for Longford, in a vein which is common with him, made a speech full of sound and fury, in which he confused two things—the introduction of a Private Bill which is at variance with public law, and the concurrent introduction of a public and private measure which are at variance with one another. The public proposal does not take away the ordinary right of Belfast to go on with their Bill. We have had a good deal of declamation—partly deserved, no doubt—about the bigotry of the Corporation of Belfast, but with respect to the 9th clause it is to be remarked that the commencement runs thus—

"From and after the passing of this Act the Council of the city shall have the same powers that are conferred upon the Town Councils of the boroughs of Dublin, Cork, and Limerick."

MR. SEXTON: By Public Acts.

MR. COURTNEY: That does not affect the question. The real question which deserves consideration at this stage is as to the management of the lunatics. The lunatics of Antrim are going to be separated from those of Belfast. In the interests of the lunatics this may be doubtful equity. This is, however, a question which we cannot decide here, but which may be inquired into by a Select Committee upstairs. The hon. Member for West Belfast wishes that the Bill should be referred to a Hybrid Committee, but I see no reason why it should not take its ordinary course of being read a second time and then referred to such a Committee.

(4.23.) MR. T. M. HEALY: The right hon. Gentleman says that I have made a speech full of sound and fury, but I think he has made one of sound and ignorance. The Bill is a departure from the invariable law which Ireland enjoys. The Chairman of Committees has asked us to support the Bill and allow it to proceed in the ordinary way, but I do not see any good reason he has given for us to adopt that course. The fact that the Government are willing to allow special provisions to be passed for Belfast, and different from those contained in the Local Government Bill, shows that they neither expect nor wish their own Bill to pass. If the Local Government Bill is to be proceeded with, why should the Belfast Bill be proceeded with? There is not a clause in this Bill which cannot be put in the Local Government Bill. If the Belfast Bill goes on, I shall move to insert in it the Assize or "Put-Me-in-the-Dock Clause." I move that the Debate be now adjourned.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."
—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

Mr. SEXTON: Have we not a right to claim from the Government the ordinary courtesy of an expression of opinion? I think they should have time to consider my proposal that the Select Committee should be instructed to reconstruct the wards of the City. For that reason I support the Motion for the Adjournment of the Debate.

*Mr. JACKSON: The question of the re-construction of the wards of the City is one for the promoters of the Bill. The Government have taken no part in the matter. I said that, so far as I was concerned, I should vote for the Second Reading of the Bill, but that statement bound no one else but myself, and I did not, therefore, think there was any need for me to get up and say any more.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 137: Noes 149.—Div. List, No. 8.)

Question again proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

Mr. WILLIAM JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.) rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put;" but Mr. SPEAKER withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.

Debate resumed.

(4.45.) MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): One thing has been noticeable about this Debate, and that is that none of the Gentlemen who support this Bill have offered a single reason why it should be accepted by the House, or shown the slightest acquaintance with any of its clauses. The most interesting portion of the debate, however, was the reason offered by the Chief Secretary why the Bill should pass. He stood up and with the greatest frankness said he thought it ought to pass, because, after all, it was doubtful whether the Local Government Bill would or would not pass.

Mr. JACKSON: I did not say that.

Mr. CHANCE: The right hon. Gentleman's words distinctly conveyed to the House the impression that he had some doubt in his own mind with regard to the Local Government Bill. It was interesting to note that the Gentleman who first repudiated that suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman was the Chairman of Ways and Means, who said the true reason why the Bill should pass was that as a Bill dealing with some of the points had been introduced by the Government, a Private Bill should be brought in pari passu. The position of the right hon. Gentleman seemed to be that a change of the general law was improper in a Private Bill, but he distinguished this case because there was a Public Bill before the House. When he was dealing with the Belfast Main Drainage Bill of 1885, he took exception to the introduction of a Franchise Clause in a Private Bill. I am afraid I fail to find what sound and practical ground exists for the exceedingly subtle distinction in the case of the present Bill. The first question is, what case has been made out for the passage of this admittedly exceptional Bill? The right hon. Gentleman thought it his duty to support the Bill, and argued that it was necessary to provide the necessary extra accommodation for the lunatics of Belfast, and that in some way such accommodation would not exist unless the Bill were passed. In the Preamble of the Bill, so far from that point being taken, it said that an Order had been duly made authorising the erection of additional asylums in the City. The Bill would not in any way facilitate the provision of such accommodation. The Bill resolves itself into two distinct provisions—the franchise branch and the financial branch. I do not intend to labour the franchise portion of the Bill, as the Chief Secretary admitted that the Franchise Clause is bad in principle, and said that it was to be withdrawn, and then modified that by saying it would be amended.

Mr. T. M. Healy

MR. JACKSON: I said distinctly it was amended."

MR. CHANCE: Surely the Government, who properly object to this clause, ought to tell us before they ask us to see the Bill how they desire or expect that clause to be amended. I do not oppose the right hon. Gentleman having an opinion on the subject himself as yet.

MR. JACKSON: I have done so.

MR. CHANCE: Then I am sure the right hon. Gentleman will be good enough to inform the House what that division is. As to the other division of the Bill, we are in the position that not a particle of reason has been alleged by the financial relations at present existing in respect to the accommodation of the lunatics of Belfast should be interfered with. The preamble carefully avoids any statement that the present financial relations on that subject are unjust or oppressive, or that any change is necessary or proper. We have not had a iota of information on the reason why the Government has consented to a division of this district into two. I oppose it on the ground that it will increase the public burdens on the people of Belfast. You will have two asylums Boards and two distinct sets of officers, half of whom might be idle a great part of their time instead of being transferred to the other asylum. The right hon. Gentleman seems to have overlooked the fact that as soon as this Bill was published it was repudiated by the Board of Governors of the present asylum, who are best informed in the matter, and they are prepared to undertake the government of the whole district, and did not desire two sets of offices and officials. Despite of that the House is asked to make an alteration of the general law which the authorities in Belfast have declared to be unnecessary and extravagant. The Bill proposes to create something unique in the country, but its object appears to be to enable Belfast to escape the Local Government Bill, which its three Members following the Government are pledged by their party ties to support against their convictions.

*(4.56.) COLONEL WARING (Down, N.): In my opinion this Debate has gone on long enough, and if hon. Members opposite think so I will sit down. The hon. Gentleman who has just spoken said there would be two sets of officers. As the two asylums are 20 miles apart it is obvious that there must be.

MR. CHANCE: That was my argument for having one instead of two asylums.

COLONEL WARING: But the ground is purchased and the arrangements made for the erection of the second asylum. Is that money to be thrown away? I hardly think that hon. Gentlemen opposite, with their love for economy, would urge that course being taken. The only body it creates which could possibly be dispensed with is the Board of Management, which, however costs nothing. I cannot see what possible reason there can be against the arrangement proposed. I should not have risen but that I was challenged with having neglected the interests of my constituents. Their interests will be looked after by the Committee upstairs, and it is perfectly unnecessary for the details to be discussed in this House. We have been told that Belfast should not be differently treated from other towns in Ireland, but Belfast has placed itself in a different position, and I cannot imagine that the matter is worthy of long discussion, or that the business of the House should be so delayed for an hour and a-half. These proposals do not throw any responsibility or charge upon the Roman Catholics of Belfast, and I am surprised that those statements should be made, that we desire to do anything exceptional in regard to that class of the community. From the remarks of the hon. Member for Cavan, it would appear that the Roman Catholics were trying to bring up their children in reformatory schools. I have no doubt very many of them are very likely to qualify their children for these reformatory schools, and the words are not mine, but those of the hon. Member for Cavan. I must say that had it not been mentioned, such a question is the last I should have introduced. I do sincerely think that the House will be well advised if it will persist in getting to a Division upon this matter at once, and so allow the House to proceed with the Public Business, which is of considerable importance.

(5.5.) MR. JOHN DILLON (Mayo, E.): I cannot understand the hon. Member opposite in his suggestion that there has been a too prolonged Debate, or that waste of time could reasonably be charged against us. The facts, it seems to me, are quite the other way, and the last speaker—

COLONEL WARING: I said that I would sit down if you would take the Division, and as I sat down I asked you to take the Division.

MR. DILLON: I must say, upon my part, and upon the part of those upon these Benches, that we have no desire that a Division should not be taken now, and that I believe the discussion is being carried on for no useful purpose. What seems to me is that the House of Commons is just now engaged in the purest waste of time in carrying on an attempt which ought not to be carried on, and which simply results in nothing but pure waste of Public Business. The Home Secretary seems to be so absolutely indifferent to the convenience of the Members of this House and to the progress of Public Business, that he is just now, I presume, sauntering about some of the rooms of the House; while he saunters into this House and out again, leaving the House unadvised as to its proceedings. We have heard in the course of this Debate no word as to what the course of the Government will be. We are told that the Government are indifferent as to whether this Bill is passed or not. But while that was the statement made by the Minister left to take charge of the conduct of affairs in the House, we have discovered that the two wings were covertly engaged in treating this Division as a Government Division. Are the Government absolutely indifferent to the Business in this House; and, if not, would it not be manifestly for the interest of Public Business, and for the interest of the Government themselves, if they would consent to adjourn this Debate until the general views of the Members on this side of the House and the Members interested in this Bill are more fully ascertained? One thing I think is abundantly manifest, that progress with this Bill will not be facilitated by continued discussion; and therefore I do not propose to occupy the time of the House in replying to the argument of the hon. Member for Down, who complains about the waste of time, as if he would prevent all other Members from taking part in the Debate.

(5.10.) MR. A. BLANE (Armagh, S.): I would wish to point out, in connection with this Bill, that it relates to the expenditure of public money; money which the taxpayers contribute, and yet that money is left to the control of men who are absolutely devoid of authority. These Grand Juries have so little authority, and their past performances have been so much defamed, that the Government themselves have condemned them, and let it be in the recollection of the House they are about to take over their fiscal authority. I ask the House to say, are we to hold that these men, to whom fiscal authority cannot be delegated, who are not worthy of it, are to have the uncontrolled expenditure of thousands of pounds? Why, there is not a man in the County Antrim, irrespective of religion, who would not have something to say in objection to it. There are thousands of people in Belfast, and thousands of people in the County Antrim, who have really nothing to say to the Grand Jury system, or to the management of the Grand Jury in the county. Over and over again I have heard County Antrim men and Belfast men complain that they have nothing to do with the Grand Jury system; with the Grand Jury who strike those rates they have no connection. The Grand Juries raise those rates, and expend them as they like, and no rate payer can interfere; while if any rate payer would interfere, his interference would be scouted as a piece of impudence. So thoroughly are these people imbued with the idea that they are all powerful, that a large amount of public jobbery consequently takes place, to the extent of a vast loss to the ratepayers themselves, arising from an expenditure in which the people themselves have no voice. I say it is monstrous to ask the House to enable, under these circumstances, a Grand Jury to expend the thousands of pounds, knowing as I do

ratepayer in the North of Ulster, that these men represent; that they represent themselves, and that they represent by-the-way, exceedingly correct, there can be no doubt question of accommodation. Now, while in prison, a large number of men brought in from elsewhere were chargeable to the trim; I saw them searched, ed, and measured; and what to know is why you cannot same with your lunatics, removed from one county with convenience, the in which they came being their cost. If this matter works so exceedingly well with prisoners, and under the General Prisons Board, and the Board says it works exceedingly well—why should we not put it elsewhere? The fact of it Bill is, in a great measure, other Irish Bills that pass in this House—it creates a of offices and devours the people. It reminds me of the Bill passed for appointing of Explosives, and in one only man who sold explosives is the Inspector himself. Complaint has been made that others occupy the time of the purely local affairs. In my complaint, I say that you would us to manage our local affairs. [An hon. MEMBER: In this case, supposing you do allow us, doubt we could do it a great than you can. I should interfere in this Debate but that I know the feeling of and I should be inclined to some observations made in of the Debate, that the object of this Bill is not purely a question between Catholic and

There are, as I know, thousands of Protestants in the Island who have no representative, whom this matter does not apply, and who yet are entirely com having a voice in the these affairs. I say that General Prisons Board can manage their affairs so as to be satisfied with themselves, so the affairs dealt with under this Bill could be managed, and I think the Bill should, therefore, be withdrawn.

*(5.18.) MR. JACKSON: The hon. Member for Mayo and the hon. Member for West Belfast made a suggestion that this Bill should be referred to a Hybrid Committee. I would venture to say that there would be no objection to such a Motion if it were made, and I would suggest to hon. Members whether it would not be best to agree to a Second Reading of the Bill at once on the understanding that it will be referred to a Hybrid Committee. That will save the time of the House, and, I think, meet the views of the hon. Members opposite.

(5.20.) MR. T. M. HEALY: Speaking on behalf of my hon. Friends who sit beside me and for myself, I have to say that we are prepared to accept the right hon. Gentleman's suggestion, provided that the Government will undertake that amongst the names suggested on behalf of the Government for the Hybrid Committee the name of my hon. Friend the Member for West Belfast should be one.

*MR. JACKSON: The hon. Member must be aware that I have no power whatever to determine what the names on the Committee shall be. The Government do not desire to be responsible in the matter; but so far as I am concerned, I must say that I should be glad to see the name of the hon. Member for West Belfast upon the Committee.

MR. DILLON: I understand that the Government will support the nomination of the hon. Member for West Belfast to the Committee.

MR. JACKSON: Yes; so far as I am concerned myself, I will support his nomination.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Bill read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Bill be referred to a Hybrid Committee of seven Members, and that the Committee have power to appoint the hon. Member for West Belfast as one of the Members."—

MR. SPEAKER: The proper course is to wait until the Bill is committed. When the Bill is committed, it can then be settled what proportion of Members shall constitute the Hybrid Committee.

MR. CHANCE: Very well, Sir; I withdraw my Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MERSEY AND IRWELL (PREVENTION OF POLLUTION) BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

(5.23.) SIR HENRY JAMES (Bury, Lancashire): I am sorry that I have to interfere in connection with this Bill. It is promoted by the Joint Committee of the County Councils of Lancashire and Cheshire for the purpose of preventing the pollution of the Rivers Mersey and Irwell; but I think it is open to grave objection, inasmuch as the Bill, while conferring powers upon the County Councils for the prevention of pollution of the rivers, also seeks to confer new and extensive powers without taking into account any of the safeguards which are in existence under the Public Act for the Protection of Manufacturers. This Bill seeks not only to enforce powers already existing, but it seeks to enforce new powers for the prevention of the pollution of rivers. That may be right or wrong, and I will not stop to discuss it; but it should not be done by means of a Private Bill. The Bill will throw a very great burden upon both the manufacturers and the ratepayers in the neighbourhood of those rivers, and I feel it due to my constituents to make a protest against the progress of it, believing as I do that, though I should like to carry its objects into effect, this is not the means of doing it.

*(5.25.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): When the Bill first came under my notice, I thought that the provisions contained in it were of a serious character; so serious that I thought that, so far as I am concerned, it would be quite impossible for me to recommend it to the House for Second Reading. In the first place, the Bill proposes to effect a very sweeping alteration in the law with regard to the pollution of rivers. But while I do not wish to lay down the general principle that in no case ought the law to be altered by means of a Private Bill, it seems to me that the provisions of this Bill are so strong and that the proposed alterations are so great that it goes beyond the proper limits. The main proposal in the Bill, and one to which I think serious objection may be taken, is that it sweeps away the whole protection given to manufacturers and others by the general law. The Central Board takes the best means in its power to prevent the pollution of rivers, and in manufacturing districts such protection as it is possible to give within reasonable limits is given by the Central Department. I informed the promoters of the Bill that if the protection given by the general law to manufacturers was swept away, the Local Government Board would oppose the Bill, but that they would forward its passing if the promoters would consent to retain the protection given under the general law by the provision which prevents proceedings from being taken until the consent of the Local Government Board has been obtained. I received an assurance from the promoters that they would assent to this course, and that a clause would be submitted to the Committee which would restore the protection given by the general law to the manufacturers. Still, even with the insertion of such a clause, I think objection may fairly be taken to the Bill in regard to its other provisions, although possibly not of so serious a nature; so that I should be disposed to recommend the House to allow the Bill to be read a second time in order that it may be put before a Select Committee. There is no doubt that the condition of these rivers is very bad, and I am sure all those interested would be very glad if they could by any means be rendered more pure. For these reasons I think the Bill might be sent to a Select Committee.

QUESTIONS.

TELEGRAPHIC LINES TO THE CONTINENT.

HENNIKER HEATON (Can-
) : I beg to ask the Postmaster whether he is now able to give the House the amount of the receipts and expenditure, respectively, for a period of 12 months, in connection with the telegraphic lines to the Continent; and of the original total cost to the British Government incurred on the acquisition of such lines?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL
(Sir JAMES FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): An account could be made of the receipts derived from foreign messages, but some part of them would be applicable to Inland service. The expenditure would be more difficult to define accurately, as the staff is largely employed also on Inland duties. It would be impossible to give the total cost to Her Majesty's Government of the acquisition of the submarine lines, inasmuch as the Dutch lines were not distinguished in the purchase of the whole system of the Electric and International Telegraph Company.

WRECKS ON THE GLAMORGAN- SHIRE COAST.

MR. ARTHUR WILLIAMS
(Glamorgan, S.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that the following shipwrecks have taken place on the Glamorganshire coast, between Sker Point and the Nash Lighthouse; the James Gray on the Tuskar Rock, on 27th January, 1883, when 25 lives were lost; the Mabel on the Nash Sands, on 23rd January, 1885, when eighteen lives were lost; the Malleny on the Tuskar Rock, on 15th October, 1886, when 20 lives were lost; the Berryloe on the Nash Sands, on the same night, when one life was lost, and the rest of the crew narrowly escaped; the Caterina on the Nash Sands, on 16th January, 1887, when 13 lives were lost; whether he is aware that on Saturday, the 6th inst., a telegram from Cardiff reached Porthcawl, stating that a brig was on the breakers west of the Nash buoy; that the Porthcawl lifeboat was out all night, but found no trace of the vessel, which is supposed to have founded;
and that, on Wednesday, the 9th inst.,
a large brigantine was observed from Porthcawl to be on the Nash Sands, with signals of distress flying; and whether, in view of this loss of life and property, steps will be taken to provide telegraphic communication between the Nash Lighthouse and Porthcawl; a rocket apparatus station between Nash and Porthcawl; alarm buoys on the Nash Sands; and to replace the refuge beacon on the Tuskar Rock, which was knocked down by a steamer?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir MICHAEL HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I am aware generally of the circumstances referred to by the hon. Member, but no intimation of a casualty on the 9th instant has yet reached me. The question of stationing a rocket apparatus between Nash and Porthcawl has been under consideration in the past, and I have directed an Inspector of the Board of Trade to make a further Report. The question of telegraphic communication between the Nash Lighthouse and Porthcawl must be considered as part of the general subject. A proposal for improving the lighting of the Bristol Channel in the vicinity of the Nash Sands will be included in the Trinity House Estimates of the year 1892-3.

EPSOM NATIONAL SCHOOLS.

MR. R. WALLACE (Edinburgh, East): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he is aware that, a few days ago, certain children attending Epsom National Schools having had their attendances marked in the school books in the morning, were conducted to the Conservative Club and employed in addressing electioneering circulars for the Rev. E. W. Northey, the manager of the school, who is a candidate for the Surrey County Council, and that the same process was repeated with the afternoon attendance; and, in the event of such things having happened, if he will state whether he will take any and what steps in the matter?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir WILLIAM HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): I am informed that ten boys were so employed without the knowledge of the manager, but although the said boys were, it is stated, beyond the age of compulsory attendance, and their attendances on that occasion were scrupulously cancelled, I cannot help thinking that in the circumstances a very injudicious act was committed, and one that should not be repeated. I can do nothing more than convey this opinion to the manager.

EDINBURGH POST OFFICE.

MR. R. WALLACE (Edinburgh, East): I beg to ask the Postmaster General, with reference to the fact that an officer connected with the sorting department of the Edinburgh Post Office, who, after a service of 49 years, was retired at the end of last year, and was ten days afterwards permitted to resume his duty, if he will state the grounds on which such exceptional treatment was extended to this officer?

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: The retirement of the officer in question was not actually complete when it was found that he was not subject to the operation of the Order in Council of the 15th of August, 1890, and he has accordingly resumed duty.

OFFICIAL AUDITORS.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been called to the fact that in the County of Cumberland and elsewhere some of the official auditors have insisted upon divisional superintendents of police being made accounting officers, and to be therefore saddled with financial duties independently of the Joint Committee and in spite of the Local Authority; and whether this action has been taken by authority of the Local Government Board; and, in the contrary case, if directions will be issued establishing a uniform practice for auditors, and forbidding them to introduce changes in the system of police finance on their own initiative?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I have made inquiry as to the course taken by the auditor referred to. He informs me that in no instance has he insisted or even urged that the County Council should adopt an arrangement which could have the effect of making the police superintendents accounting officers. In the County of Cumberland, which is alluded to in the question, the cheques for police pay and contingent expenses, ent by the county treasurer direct to the superintendents of the several constabularies, and this being the case it is right that the divisional superintendents should account to the auditor of the expenditure of the sums which have thus been received and expended by them. The Local Government Board are not empowered to give any directions which would relieve the constabulary intendents from thus accounting for monies sent to them direct by the county treasurer for payment to other persons, nor would it be right that they should do so, apart from any question of statutory power. If the payments made to the chief constable instead of the divisional superintendents, in the case in some counties, the constable would be required to account for the monies thus received by him, and, under ordinary circumstances, accounts by the divisional constabulary intendents would not be required.

WESTERN PACIFIC ORDERS IN COUNCIL.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., by): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, under the Western Pacific Order in Council (1877), a British subject can legally be tried and condemned by the Judicial Commissioner in without a jury, of murdering her British subject on board a ship vessel?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron de WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): This question is a purely legal one and ought to have been addressed to my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General. It appears to me, however, to be clear from Section 6 of the Pacific Islanders' Protection Act 1875, and Articles 7, 18, 23, and 24 of the Western Pacific Order in Council, 1877, that the answer to the Member's question should be in the affirmative, and that such a case should be triable by a Judicial Commissioner, with assessors.

THE LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL OF CYPRUS.

MR. PICTON (on behalf of Mr. JAMES AND ROBERTSON, Dundee): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether Captain Young's candidature for the Larnaca and Famagusta division in the recent elections for the Legislative Council of Cyprus had the sanction of the Colonial Office; whether he is aware that the decision in the trial of the election petition, by which the Native (Greek) candidates have been unseated, has caused grave dissatisfaction in Cyprus; and whether the Colonial Office will cause inquiry to be made into the action of Captain Young, Commissioner of Famagusta, in reference to this election, and into the allegations of undue influence on the part of the Government officials under him?

BARON H. DE WORMS: Captain Young's candidature was not known to me and had not the sanction of the Colonial Office, such sanction not being technically necessary, but the High Commissioner for Cyprus has been instructed to inform the public officers that they should not in future offer themselves for election unless expressly authorised. No official information has reached the Secretary of State with regard to the popular feeling respecting the decision in the election case, or as to any allegations of undue influence on the part of the Government officials, and he therefore sees no reason to inquire into the latter allegation.

POSTAL ARRANGEMENTS IN SCOTLAND.

MR. ESSLEMONT (on behalf of Dr. CAMERON, Glasgow, College): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether, when the South of Mull route between Oban and Bunessan is reopened this year, he will consider the feasibility of landing the mail bags for the Fionafirth district on the Ross of Mull side of the Sound of Iona, and so avoiding the delay in the service of the district which occurred under the arrangement of last year?

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: The matter will receive careful consideration. It is believed, however, that in certain winds and heavy seas it is dangerous to land and embark mails on the Ross of Mull side of the Island of Iona.

WHITEHAVEN SANITARY DISTRICT.

SIR JAMES BAIN (Whitehaven) : I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board, with reference to the fact that the County Council of Cumberland made an order extending the limits of the Urban Sanitary District of Whitehaven, on which the Local Government Board afterwards held a local inquiry by their Inspector, Mr. Arnold Taylor, whether the Local Government Board refused to confirm the County Council's order on the Inspector's Report ; and, if not, then upon what grounds ; and whether he will lay upon the Table of the House the Report of Mr. Arnold Taylor ?

MR. RITCHIE : It became the duty of the Local Government Board to direct an inquiry in the case referred to, in consequence of an appeal by county electors against the order of the County Council extending the Whitehaven Urban District by including within its limits an area comprising more than 2,600 acres. The inquiry was a very exhaustive one, extending over seven days, and the evidence of a large number of witnesses was taken. The proposals were very strongly opposed by both owners and ratepayers in the areas proposed to be added, and with the exception of one gentleman, who is the Chairman of the Whitehaven Urban Authority, not one witness who was an owner or ratepayer in the outside area was called in support of the scheme. After full consideration of all the facts, the Local Government Board came to the conclusion that the evidence of those who were in favour of the extension of the district failed to show that there was any sufficient reason for the wide scheme of extension proposed, and that they had therefore no alternative but to disallow the order. The Reports which are made by the Inspectors of the Board on the inquiries held by them are very numerous, and I should not feel justified in consenting to the Report in this case being laid on the Table, and thus making a very inconvenient precedent.

THE GREENWICH HOSPITAL.

SIR WILLIAM CROSSMAN (Portsmouth) : I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if he will state how much money has been expended during the last ten years on the maintenance and repairs of the buildings of Greenwich Hospital, now occupied by the Admiralty ; the amount paid for rates and taxes, or contribution in lieu thereof ; and how much of this would, in the case of an ordinary tenancy, have fallen upon the landlord, and how much upon the tenant ?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing) : The amount expended during the last ten years on the maintenance and repairs of Greenwich Hospital, now occupied by the Admiralty, has been £31,770, and in new works, additions, and alterations, £8,660. The whole of this expenditure would in the case of an ordinary tenancy have fallen upon the landlord. The amount paid as contribution in lieu of rates during the same period for the college and schools combined has been £26,385, of which the proportion for the college only is approximately estimated at £21,000. The whole of this expenditure in an ordinary tenancy would have fallen upon the tenant. On the other hand, the rent paid by the Admiralty for the use of the college buildings has been £100 per annum.

POSTAL ARRANGEMENTS IN CORK.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) : I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether, having regard to the promise of the late Postmaster General, a daily post and evening collection will be given to the people of Rathcoole and Kilcorrey, County Cork ?

*SIR JAMES FERGUSSON : In July last the late Postmaster General promised, in reply to a question by the hon. Member for North Cork, that this subject should be carefully considered. On the 15th August the hon. Member was informed that the existing Postal Service between Banteer and Kilcorrey was already being conducted at a cost in excess of the revenue ; and expressing regret that no further outlay could be incurred for improving the post. It is not likely that the circumstances have changed in any material degree since that time.

INLAND REVENUE OFFICERS.

MR. COBB: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is aware that his refusal to see any of the supervisors, officers, or assistants of the Inland Revenue, with regard to the grievances alleged in their petition to the Treasury, has caused considerable dissatisfaction among them, in view of the fact that, when the Customs outdoor officers alleged that there were grievances in their branch of the Service which they requested might be remedied, the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Financial Secretary to the Treasury held an inquiry and issued a Treasury Minute dealing with their complaints, which in March last was ordered to be printed, and was shortly afterwards published; whether any reason exists for treating the grievances alleged by the officials connected with the Excise in a different way from those alleged by the officials of the Customs; and whether he will re-consider his recent decision as to granting a short interview to one representative of the supervisors, officers, and assistants upon some of the points named in their petition, without undertaking so complete an inquiry as took place in the case of the officials of the Customs; or whether, as an alternative, he will direct any other kind of inquiry to be held?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): The case of the Customs' Service, to which the hon. Member refers, was entirely different from that of the officers on whose behalf he now appeals to me. As a result of a discussion of the Customs' Service in this House, on a Motion for a Select Committee to inquire into grievances which were alleged to exist, but had not been investigated, I undertook, in substitution for this proposed Committee, to hold a formal inquiry myself into the conditions of the whole Customs Outdoor Service, of a nature similar to the inquiry which would be undertaken by a Select Committee. The conclusions at which we arrived were, as the hon. Member states, embodied in a Treasury Minute, and certain changes in the conditions of the Customs' Service were made in consequence. In the recent case certain grievances were brought first before the Board of Inland Revenue, and through them to the Treasury, last year. They had very full and careful previous consideration from myself and my Colleagues, and I was able to meet the requests of the officers to some extent, and a very considerable sum was added to the aggregate of salaries, and some changes were made in other respects. At the same time, there were certain other points on which we were unable to meet the requests of the officers, and the petition which is now before me mainly consists of a request for reconsideration of those points. I am fully acquainted with the details of the case of the officers, and I entirely reject the suggestion of the hon. Member, that it is impossible for me to arrive at a just conclusion upon the alleged grievances without a personal interview with the officers concerned. If such interviews became customary in all cases in which grievances are alleged in any branch of the Civil Service, the time of Ministers would be entirely occupied in this manner, and the interest of Public Business would suffer. I can assure the hon. Member that, though I cannot grant such interviews, I take a deep interest in endeavouring as far as I can to master all those Civil Service questions, and that I fear the task of meeting all the wishes of Civil servants is absolutely hopeless.

MR. COBB: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether I correctly gather from his answer that he will consent to the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the subject?

MR. GOSCHEN: No; because the grievances have been already inquired into; and if this House were to appoint a Select Committee to inquire into the matter it would amount to a Vote of Want of Confidence in the result of the inquiry which has already taken place.

COLLECTION OF AGRICULTURAL RETURNS.

MR. J. O'KELLY (Roscommon, N.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether Excise officers have been either reduced or dismissed in connection with the collection of the Agricultural Returns ; and if he is aware that much dissatisfaction exists in the Service in reference to the work ?

MR. GOSCHEN : Only two officers have been reduced, and four dismissed, in connection with the collection of Agricultural Statistics during the last ten years. I am not aware that there is serious dissatisfaction in the Service in reference to this work.

THE BAILIFF OF JERSEY AND THE DANIEL CASE.

MR. COBB : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will lay upon the Table of the House the correspondence between the Home Office and the Bailiff of the Island of Jersey with respect to the Daniel case ?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.) : There has been no official correspondence between the Home Office and the Bailiff of Jersey. I have written private letters to the Bailiff ; but I see no reason for laying them on the Table of the House. Full publicity has been given to the proceedings in the Daniel case.

NAVAL PENSIONERS.

SIR WILLIAM CROSSMAN (Portsmouth) : I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty how many Naval pensioners of the age of 55 and upwards, who entered the Service prior to the issue of the Order in Council of the 29th June, 1878, have not yet received the full Greenwich age pension ?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON : The number of pensioners over 55 years of age claiming pensions is estimated to be about 2,800. All such claimants entered the Service prior to 1865, up to which time no age pensions existed. The Order in Council of 1878 therefore did not, as the question suggests, break any condition of the engagement of these men, but only affected the granting of a boon to which, previously to 1865, they were not entitled.

ARMAGH PRISON.

MR. BLANE (Armagh, S.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, with regard to the fact that in 1889 the General Prisons Board directed certain Minutes to be communicated to an officer of Armagh Prison, upon whom a Report was made, whether the directions of the General Prisons Board were complied with ; and, if not, what steps were taken to ascertain by whose default the omission was made ; and what steps the General Prisons Board purpose taking with reference to further Reports from Armagh Prison ?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.) : The General Prisons Board report that it is the case that the officer in charge of the prison failed to communicate the Minute referred to. He was cautioned by the Board to be more careful in future.

MR. BLANE : I want to know what steps will the General Prisons Board take with reference to the Governor of Armagh Prison, after they have found that he had not communicated to the officer of the prison ?

MR. JACKSON : I believe the General Prisons Board are quite able to look after their own Department ; and if they think it necessary in this case I am quite sure they will take action.

MR. BLANE : I beg to give notice that on the Estimates I shall call attention to this particular case, and move a Resolution.

NATIONAL EDUCATION IN IRELAND.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland have the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland had recent instances of the hardship resulting from the high average of 70, to maintain the services of an assistant teacher, on account of the decrease in population, prevalence of epidemics, the severe weather, &c. ; and will anything be done to reduce the average or mitigate the rule ?

MR. JACKSON : The Commissioners of National Education are not aware of any special cases of hardship arising from the rule mentioned in the ques-

ion. The Commissioners add that in all cases in which the school attendance is reduced owing to severe weather, prevalence of epidemic disease, or other exceptional cause, they invariably allow a reasonable time for the re-establishment of the normal average before proceeding to cancel the warrant for an assistant.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Will the right hon. Gentleman state whether it is a fact that in consequence of the influenza and the severity of the season this normal average has fallen in a great number of cases during the past year?

MR. JACKSON: No; as a matter of fact, during the past year—that is, the year ending on the 31st December last—I think the attendance has increased on the preceding year. There was, of course, a considerable falling off since, in consequence of the influenza.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Irish Commissioners of National Education issue at intervals private instructions to their Inspectors on matters such as the interpretation of the programmes, the mode of conducting examinations, &c., which are never made known to the teachers, and why do the Commissioners not follow the practice of the Education Departments of England and Scotland, which allow their Inspectors to consult with the teachers?

MR. JACKSON: The Commissioners of National Education report that they issue from time to time, according to the requirements of the service, special instructions to their Inspectors regarding the details of their duties, and that such portions as it is deemed essential that the teachers should be made acquainted with are communicated through the managers. The Commissioners encourage their Inspectors to confer with the teachers and managers, and to assist in matter bearing on the interests of the schools and the efficiency of the teachers; and they are aware that such consultation is of frequent occurrence, and is attended with satisfactory results.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware whether a different practice prevails in England, and will he undertake to have the practice of the Irish and the English Education Offices brought into harmony in this matter?

MR. JACKSON: I am not aware, and I can do no more than bring the matter before the notice of the National Board.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I will call attention to this matter again.

ENFIELD SMALL ARMS FACTORY.

MR. JAMES STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton) (on behalf of Mr. James Rowlands): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether it is the case that notices have been given dismissing men at the Small Arms Factory at Enfield since Monday last; whether 75 men are now under notice to leave; whether 27 notices were served on Wednesday on the stock-filers, and whether there are only about 60 stock-filers in all at Enfield; and whether he will undertake that no more notices shall be served until further inquiry has been made?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): It is reported to me that the numbers in the question are substantially correct. I have already stated that any necessary reduction shall be made with as little hardship as possible, but the diminution in our orders absolutely necessitates some reduction.

THE LATE CONVICT P. W. NALLY.

MR. J. C. FLYNN (on behalf of Mr. McCARTAN, Down, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland with reference to the evidence given at the inquest on the remains of P. W. Nally, who died in Mountjoy Gaol on 9th November last, whether he is aware that Dr. O'Keefe, the prison doctor, deposed at the inquest that Nally required outdoor work to keep up his health; that he was punished and lost marks on the charge of having shouted "God save Ireland" at Downpatrick Railway Station; and that he was forcibly removed from Downpatrick to Mountjoy Prison where he was reported "sick" on the 8th October, and on the 19th October the disease was declared to be typhoid fever; whether any word was sent to Nally's friends before the first week in November; and if he will explain why his brother Dr. Nally was refused permission to remain with him on the night he was dying; and why, when the term of his imprisonment had almost expired, he was not allowed to go into the Mater Misericordian Hospital; and whether he will grant a sworn inquiry into his prison treatment up to the time of his death?

MR. JACKSON: The General Prisons Board report that the medical officer states that he did not depose, as alleged in the question, that Nally required outdoor exercise. Nally was punished for misconduct, which consisted of shouting in a loud and disorderly manner, calculated to create a disturbance at Downpatrick Railway Station on 19th November, 1888, and likewise lost marks. There was no force used in his transfer from Downpatrick to Mountjoy Prison, to which he was removed in company with other prisoners on 1st April, 1891, from which date Downpatrick was closed as a convict prison. Nally's friends were not informed of his illness before the first week in November. He himself had specially desired that his friends should not be informed, and up to that time his case was progressing favourably. It is not the case that his brother was refused permission to remain. On the contrary, his brother was present at his death, as were also his sister and three other relatives. Under the rules prisoners are not discharged on the ground of health except on a certificate from the medical officer that further confinement is likely to endanger life. In the present case there was not only no such certificate, but the medical officer reports that the prisoner told his brother that he was well treated. He did not express any desire to be released from custody, and in the opinion of the medical officer his removal to another hospital would have in no way benefited him. I would add that an outside eminent medical doctor was called in for consultation, and he fully agreed in the way in which the case was being treated, and expressed his belief that nothing was being left undone to promote the recovery of the patient.

Mr. J. C. Flynn

The Government do not see anything in the circumstances of the case calling for the course suggested in the last paragraph.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): As the death of this prisoner was accelerated by his treatment, and as the whole case will be the subject of debate in this House, I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he will afford us the necessary information by laying a copy of the coroner's inquisition on the Table?

MR. FLYNN: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman at the same time is he not aware or can he give us any information as to whether it is not the usual practice to discharge prisoners in case of serious ill-health?

MR. JACKSON: I am not aware of any other practice than that prisoners are discharged only on a certificate from the medical officer that further confinement is likely to endanger life. With respect to the question of the hon. Member for West Belfast, I will inquire whether it is possible to lay a copy of the coroner's inquisition upon the Table.

MR. JOHN DILLON (Mayo, E.): I would like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he would not reconsider the question whether the medical officer failed to give a certificate of serious ill-health when he discovered that the prisoner was suffering from typhoid fever?

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.): I should also like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it was not stated at the inquest that Nally had been engaged in cleaning out the piggeries when he contracted the fatal disease, and that some of the pigs had died in consequence of the unsanitary condition of the place?

MR. JACKSON: If the hon. Gentleman will put down the question I will endeavour to answer it. As to the question of the hon. Member for Mayo, I do not know that there was the slightest neglect on the part of the medical officer of the prison, and if my recollection serves me, the evidence given at the inquest went to exonerate the doctor from any neglect. I believe there was a complaint that the typhoid character of the disease was not discovered at an earlier stage; but I believe that that is not unusual, and that there is not the smallest ground for any allegation of neglect on the part of the medical officer.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the prison doctor reported to the General Prisons Board that this prisoner was in danger of death?

MR. JACKSON: If the hon. Gentleman puts down the question perhaps I shall be able to get the information.

MR. HAYDEN (Leitrim, S.) was understood to inquire if the right hon. Gentleman was aware whether the treatment Nally received was not owing to his refusal to give evidence at the Arnell Commission?

MR. JACKSON: No, Sir. That is a question which it is impossible for me to answer.

THE BALACLAVA SIX HUNDRED.

MR. FLYNN (on behalf of Mr. CARTAN): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been called to a statement made in the Sunday Chronicle, of the 1st inst., to the effect that, for some time past, the 30 impoverished survivors of the Balaklava Six Hundred have been receiving, out of a fund voluntarily subscribed through that paper, 15s. a week, or such addition to their pensions as made the whole amount to 15s. per week; whether he is aware that this fund is now exhausted, and that 18 of these veteran soldiers are now pensionless, while one receives £. 3*1*d. per day, four a pension of £. 1*1*d. per day, and the other seven amounts varying from 1*s*. to 4*d*. per day; and whether, considering the services of these men, and the danger to which they exposed themselves in the public service, he will take steps to have them supplied with a competency for their old days?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Perhaps the hon. Member will allow me to refer him to the answer I gave on a former occasion on this subject.

DR. TANNER: Can the right hon. Gentleman inform us whether it is not a fact that a number of these unfortunate men have been driven into the workhouse for want of attention from the Department?

The question was not answered.

SCOTCH TRAWLING.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate in how many, and in what, bays in Scotland is trawling forbidden, also in what bays is steam trawling forbidden; if, when a large majority of the fishermen residing near any Scotch bay desire that trawling should be prohibited, do the Scotch Authorities consider and give effect to this desire; and has he any evidence to show whether the fishermen near any bay consider that the prohibition of trawling in certain bays has improved the supply of fish?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Sir C. J. PEARSON, Edinburgh and St. Andrews Universities): In reply to the first and second paragraphs of the question, I would refer the hon. Member to the Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act, 1889, by which trawling is forbidden within three miles of low water mark. It is also forbidden at a number of places mentioned in the Schedule to the Act. The Fishery Board may, by bye-law, exempt portions of the coast from the operation of the Act; but I understand that this power has been sparingly used. The Act makes no distinction between steam trawlers and other trawlers. With regard to the last paragraph of the question, I am not aware of any evidence of the nature referred to; but I shall inquire if it exists, and communicate with the hon. Member.

COLONEL NOLAN: I should like the Lord Advocate to give us the gist of the Act of 1889, for I confess I am not up in Scotch law.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

IRISH TRAWLING.

COLONEL NOLAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland in how many, and in what, bays in Ireland is trawling forbidden, also in what bays is steam trawling forbidden; if, when a large majority of the fishermen residing near any bay desire that trawling should be prohibited, do the Irish Authorities consider and give effect to this desire; and has he any evidence to show whether the fishermen near any bay consider that the non-prohibition of trawling has injured the take of fish?

MR. JACKSON : I am sorry I have not had sufficient time to get an answer to the question of the hon. Member.

COLONEL NOLAN : It is very unusual for one Minister to answer and another not to do so. I wanted to see from the answers of both Ministers whether—

MR. SPEAKER : Will the hon. and gallant Gentleman put his question ?

COLONEL NOLAN : I am sorry to say I have not got an answer to my question. I will put down another to the Lord Advocate.

THE CHICAGO WORLD'S FAIR COMMISSION.

MR. LANE (Cork Co., E.) : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether there is any representative of Ireland on the Royal Commission appointed to organise the British Section at the Chicago World's Fair ; how many Irish representatives are on the eleven committees (consisting of 387 members) appointed by the Royal Commission for the various sections ; is he aware that the Royal Commissioners have given no information by advertisement or circulars to manufacturers or other intending exhibitors in Ireland, though the time for applying for space expires on the 29th instant ; that they are charging exhibitors at the rate of £25 per 100 square feet for space given free by the World's Fair to all exhibitors ; and that their minimum charge for the smallest exhibit is £5, though exhibitors must pay all cost of transportation, erection, maintenance, and insurance ; and have the Royal Commissioners any accredited agent or offices in Ireland where intending exhibitors can apply for information or space ?

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. Gorst, Chatham) : The answer to the first question is, I am informed, in the affirmative. Ten gentlemen, specially appointed as representing Irish industries and education, besides several other Irishmen not so specially appointed, are serving on the various committees. Seven others were invited to do so, but did not accept the invitation. Circulars have been sent to all Irish exhibitors at previous International Exhibitions and to many other manufacturers, and advertisements have been inserted in six Irish papers. The charge to exhibition is £23 10s. per 100 square feet, and the minimum is £5. There is at Dublin a joint committee, formed by the Corporation, the Chamber of Commerce, and the Royal Dublin Society, who hold all information at the disposal of Irish exhibitors.

POSTAGE OF FRIENDLY SOCIETIES CIRCULARS.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.) : I beg to ask the Postmaster General when the reduction of  $\frac{1}{2}$ d. in the postal rate of the circulars of Friendly Societies will come into force ?

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON : In November last an alteration was made in the Book Post regulations, so as to allow a circular (which fulfils the conditions of being wholly or in great part printed, and of being in identical terms to several persons) to be attached to any other document admissible by book post. The circular notices of meetings sent out by Friendly Societies, therefore, may now have a statement of account appended on the same sheet without losing the privilege of passing at the book rate of  $\frac{1}{2}$ d. per 2 oz.; but the statement must be kept apart, and not embodied in the circular.

THE MCKINLEY TARIFF AND RECIPROCITY.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs with what nations have the United States concluded arrangements for the free or more favoured admission of American natural and manufactured productions under the Reciprocity Section of the McKinley Tariff Act ; if in those markets the exports of the United Kingdom and British Colonies will be at a disadvantage compared to American exports ; and whether the Washington Government have issued notices to various other States that if before 15th March they do not decide to give an advantage to American goods the President will, by decree already authorised by Congress, impose prohibitory duties on their consignments to the markets of the United States ?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER: Arrangements of the nature referred to have been concluded between the Government of the United States and the Governments of Brazil, Santo Domingo, Guatemala, and Spain for Cuba and Porto Rico. In Brazil and Santo Domingo British goods will consequently be at some disadvantage as compared with imports from the United States. An announcement of a character referred to in the third paragraph of the hon. Member's question has already been made by the Government of the United States.

POST OFFICE AT VENTRY AND FENIT.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE (Dublin, S.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether the Post Office has opened a telegraph station at Ventry, County Kerry, without any guarantee being given; if so, whether the Post Office will do the same at Fenit, and without further delay, to help the fishing on that portion of the coast, which opens 15th March?

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: A telegraph office was opened at Ventry without any guarantee, because it was estimated that the revenue would cover the expenses; but one could not be established at Fenit without guarantee, seeing that the revenue would not cover the expenses. Some of those who are interested in the locality have undertaken to give the guarantee, and when the necessary agreement has been executed instructions will be given for a telegraph office to be established as soon as possible.

THE IRISH LAND PURCHASE ACT—EVICTED TENANTS.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether evicted tenants have taken advantage of Section 13 of the Land Purchase Act of last Session; and if they such tenants have done so, how many, and to what estates do the applications refer?

MR. JACKSON: The Land Commissioners report that, under the 10th of their general rules of the 15th August, a period of two months is allowed, during which the agreements executed before the 5th February under the 13th section of the Act referred to may be lodged with the Commission. Up to the present eleven such applications have been lodged relating to nine estates. These are the cases of which the Commissioners have official knowledge; but they point out that it is a matter of general notoriety that a number of such agreements were entered into, though they have not come officially before them.

MR. DILLON: May I ask if any landlords in Ireland gave their tenants opportunity to avail themselves of this section on reasonable terms?

MR. T. C. HARRINGTON (Dublin, Harbour): May I ask if any landlords in the County Court refused the request of the tenants that they should be allowed to purchase?

MR. JACKSON: I must have notice of these questions.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Did the eleven applications of the right hon. Gentleman referred to represent eleven tenants?

MR. JACKSON: I believe that is so.

OBSTRUCTIONS IN THE RIVER BANN.

MR. MCARTAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to a resolution, unanimously adopted by the Ballymoney Board of Guardians on the 15th instant, to the effect that the obstructions for navigation and drainage purposes placed in the River Bann, after an experience of 40 years, have proved to be useless, and requesting the Government to remove the obstacles; and whether he will consider the desirability of having them removed with as little delay as possible?

MR. JACKSON: Assuming that the "obstructions" referred to are the weirs and navigation locks, the Government have no power to remove them; they formed part of a scheme carried out under the authority of Parliament, and can only be removed by the same authority.

INSPECTION OF KITCHEN BOILERS.

MR. CRAIG (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the explosion of a kitchen boiler at Newcastle, attended with loss of life, and to the evidence at the inquest, as well as the Coroner's remarks as to the necessity of such boilers being inspected; and whether he will consider the desirability of passing an Act to deal with the matter?

MR. MATTHEWS: Yes, Sir; I have received a Report from the Coroner and the depositions taken at the inquest. The accident appears to have been due to the freezing of the taps—of which the occupier of the house was made aware—and to the defective construction of the boiler. I do not think that official inspection of kitchen boilers in private houses is a matter on which legislation is desirable.

MR. CRAIG: I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman to inquire whether in the United States there are not Inspectors whose duty it is to inspect boilers in private houses?

THE RATING OF ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if he can inform the House when the Bill relating to the Exemption of Elementary Schools from Rating, mentioned in Her Majesty's Gracious Speech, will be introduced?

MR. RITCHIE: We must make further progress with the Bills now before the House before I can say anything respecting the Bill referred to.

CABLE COMPANIES.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether any and what charges are levied from the Cable Companies respectively in respect of telegrams sent through their lines to and from this country; and whether he has ascertained the total number of words received by cable in this country from and despatched to Africa, the West Indies, North and South America, India and the East, and Australasia respectively, in each year?

\*SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: Cable Companies pay £5 a year for the telegraph wires which they transmit their messages this country. For messages handed at Postal Telegraph Offices to be forwarded by cable, or for messages arriving by cable and transmitted over our wires, the Department charge ordinary inland rate of  $\frac{1}{2}$ d. a word. I have not ascertained the total number of words received by cable in this country from, and despatched to countries named, and I have no means of doing so.

SOUTH WALES COLLERY STATISTICS.

MR. DAVID THOMAS (Neath, Tydvil): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he can give the production of the number of persons employed (including between surface and ground), and the number of lives lost through accident at collieries in the South Wales district during 1885, the number of fatal accidents resulting therefrom in each of underground employment; and also that much of the interest attaches to the Mines Inspectors' Reports, the summaries of the statistical part of them is lost by the delay in publication, whether he will take steps to expedite their presentation to Parliament?

MR. MATTHEWS: There has been no delay in the publication of the statistics. The summaries for districts are now in the printer's hands and will be laid before Parliament in a few days' time, when the hon. Member will obtain all the information desired. I may remind the hon. Member that the mine owners are not required by the Statute to send the Returns to the Inspectors before 21st January; therefore the tabulation of figures for 3,400 collieries, as well as from the ferrous mines, has this year been prepared by the Inspectors without any considerable despatch.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY PENSIONS.

MR. HARRISON (Tipperary): I beg to ask the Chancellor of enquer whether he is aware that, under the 10 and 11 Vic. c. 100, s. 3, any member of the Royal Irish Constabulary who retired from that force between 1866 and 1st August, 1874 might do so on full pay; that those who joined the force before 1847 might be on full pay after 20 years' service; that those who joined it after that date might retire on full pay after 30 years' service; whether he is aware that the late Sir Stafford Northcote, as Chancellor of the Exchequer, in January, 1877, stated that it was the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown that it was the correct interpretation of a Statute; and whether, nevertheless, a head per annum was deducted from the pensions granted to all those men; and, if so, whether the Government will now take into consideration the propriety of revising the pensions such cases, and giving the men the full pay claimed by them?

MR. GOSCHEN: The section quoted by the hon. Member permits the award of pensions not exceeding, as a maximum, the rates mentioned in the testation. The statement of Sir Stafford Northcote in the Debate of 1877 as to the opinion given by the Law Officers was as follows:—

"Although the Government might pay the higher rate, the men were not legally entitled to a higher rate of pension than had been awarded, and there was no legal reason for giving them more now."

I am assured that the pensions actually awarded to the constables in question are not £15 a year below the maximum allowed by the Statute. The Government in 1877, after a very full inquiry, were satisfied that the equity of the men's case was fully met by the decision then arrived at.

TRADE SOCIETIES AND THE COST OF CERTIFICATES.

MR. FENWICK (Northumberland, Ansbeck): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that members of registered trade societies are charged 6d. for every certificate, and an additional 1s. for "searching the register"; the same for one year's record; whether he is aware also that Section 1, Sub-section 2, of "The Friendly Societies Act, 1875," enacts that no registered society shall pay money on the decease of a member without a registrar's certificate of death, which must be supplied at a maximum cost of 1s.; and whether he will take steps to amend the law relating to registered trade societies in accordance with the Friendly Societies Act?

MR. GOSCHEN: I am desired by my right hon. Friend to answer this question. It is correct that by Section 14 (2) of the Friendly Societies Act, 1875, a registered friendly society is prohibited from paying money on the death of a member or other person without a registrar's certificate of death; and it is provided that such certificate may be obtained for 1s. Neither of these provisions exists in the Act relating to trade unions. They are not compelled to get certificates of death; but, if they do get them, they must pay the registrar of deaths his usual charge. I will take into consideration the suggestion to amend the law relating to registered trade societies in accordance with the Friendly Societies Act.

OVERCROWDING ON RAILWAYS.

MR. J. WILSON (Lanark, Govan): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the officials of a railway company who fail to supply sufficient third class accommodation are at liberty to fill the first and second class compartments with third class passengers; and, if not, whether the Board of Trade are prepared to take measures to deal with what on certain lines is a crying evil?

*SIR MICHAEL HICKS BEACH: I think that what the hon. Member complains of is not that passengers holding third class tickets are allowed to travel in carriages of a higher class, but that passengers are inconvenienced by the railway officials allowing their carriages to be overcrowded. Such passengers may have a remedy by civil action, but on that I cannot give an opinion. I quite admit the evil of overcrowding, but it is an evil very difficult to prevent. An official may stop people from getting into a tramcar or omnibus—it is quite another thing to keep a crowd out of a train, and though I should readily consider any suggestions on the subject, I am not at present prepared to propose legislation on it.

THE FORESTRY COMMITTEE AND THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE.

MR. HARRISON: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether he is aware that the late First Lord of the Treasury, in answer to a question on the 26th March, 1888, stated that, though the Government had come to no decision as to the Report of the Select Committee on Forestry made in the previous year, yet the question would have to be dealt with by the Agricultural Department; and whether any steps have been, are being, or will be, taken to carry out the very strong recommendations embodied in that Report in favour of the appointment of a Forestry Board, the establishment of schools of forestry, and the planting of trees over large areas of the United Kingdom, and especially in the West of Ireland?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): The powers of the Board of Agriculture in regard to forestry do not extend to Ireland, but I am informed that the question of forestry in that country is being dealt with by the Congested Districts Board, who are making an experiment on a considerable scale in Connemara. I am aware of the statement that was made by the First Lord of the Treasury in March, 1888; and when the Board of Agriculture was constituted, the recommendation of the Select Committee in favour of the appointment of a Board of Forestry was carried out to this extent, that certain powers with regard to forestry were conferred upon the Board. Within those powers, we have done, I think, everything that we can. We have no power to establish schools; we can only aid existing institutions; and on two different occasions we have made grants towards the cost of lectures in the University of Edinburgh under the auspices of the Royal Scottish Arboricultural Society, and there is now before me a scheme for the delivery of lectures to a class of practical foresters in the Royal Botanical Gardens in that city. The Board have also made a grant in aid of a new chair in the Durham College of Science, which is to include the teaching of forestry, and I hope to give favourable consideration to some other proposals which have been made to me for providing increased facilities for such teaching elsewhere. I am in entire sympathy with the desire to promote a sounder knowledge of forestry, and I shall be glad to take every available opportunity of effecting this purpose.

THE LATE SENATOR JAMES G. ROSS.

MR. HOZIER (Lanarkshire, S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he can give any information with regard to the administration of the estate of the late Senator James G. Ross, who died at Quebec in October, 1888, leaving property valued at some seven or eight million dollars, and bequeathing by his will half of that property to his brother, Mr. Frank Ross, and the other half to Protestant charities at Quebec and to Protestant charities and relations at Carlisle, Lanarkshire, where he was born?

MR. CURZON (for Baron H de Worms): The subject does not come under the cognizance of the Colonial Office, so that I am unable to afford my hon. Friend the information he desires. I would suggest that he should put himself in communication with the authorities of the Province of Quebec.

POSTAGE OF POLLING CARDS.

MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether, for the purposes of Parliamentary and municipal elections, polling cards bearing the registered numbers either in writing or in print may be allowed to pass through the post as an ordinary postcard?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Sir JAMES FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): Under a new definition of circular about to be adopted, polling cards will be allowed to pass at the book rate, provided the contents are wholly printed; and a deputation of agents which called upon me recently stated there would be no

Sir Michael Hicks Beach

Facility in printing the voter's number on the register with the rest of the card. It is undesirable to print varying particulars in writing in a regular.

MR. CREMER: It is impossible for Sir, to catch the nature of the right hon. Gentleman's reply. I would like a direct answer to the question as to whether polling cards will be allowed to pass through the Post if the numbers are written instead of being printed?

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: No, Sir; it is not thought fit to make separate titles for polling cards, but I am informed by a number of agents that they can quite conveniently manage to have these varying numbers printed. In that case, they would be allowed to pass at the ordinary rate.

MR. CREMER: Will clerks undertake to fill in the numbers in case of the written ones, which candidates or their agents are prepared to supply?

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: I cannot answer for the clerks; but I am informed there is no practical difficulty in having the numbers printed.

MR. CREMER: I am sorry to interfere again, but this is a very important question, especially at this particular instance. Do I understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that the clerks in the Post Office were prepared to insert printed numbers in lieu of the written ones—(cries of "No, no!")—and will he say whether polling cards must have the numbers printed?

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: I have been told by the agents that there could be no difficulty in having the numbers printed. I have altered the existing rules in order to remove the difficulties that exist in the way of sending out these cards for one half-year.

MR. MORTON (Peterborough): May the number be printed on either side of the card?

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: Yes.

THE GOVERNOR OF NEW ZEALAND.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies a question of which I have given him private notice, reference to a telegram published in the Times, whether any communication has been received by Her Majesty's Government from the Government of New Zealand, relative to the appointment of a successor to Lord Onslow; and if so, what reply has been given?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: I have not received from the hon. Member any private notice, and I would suggest that in future any such notice should be sent direct to me as representing the Colonial Department in this House. In answer to this question, I have to say that no cable message has been received by the Secretary of State from New Zealand, and it follows that no reply has been sent. In the telegram which appeared in this morning's papers the Secretary of State has seen, with some surprise, that he has been charged with a breach of faith in not having submitted the name of Lord Onslow's successor before a final appointment was made. There is not the slightest ground for such a charge of breach of faith, if it has been really made, as the Secretary of State has invariably acted upon the decision of Her Majesty's Government conveyed in the Circular Despatch of 8th July, 1889, published in (C 5,828). A telegram was sent to the Governor of New Zealand directly the Secretary of State received Her Majesty's approval of the appointment of the Earl of Glasgow, and any prior report which appeared in the papers was made without authority.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON: As a matter of personal explanation I beg to say that I had a personal interview with the Secretary of State for the Colonies before 3 o'clock, and he undertook to see the Under Secretary.

PROCEEDINGS AT BANTRY QUARTER SESSIONS.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if his attention has been called to the proceedings at Bantry Quarter Sessions early in February, at which a tenant named John Keohane brought an action against Edward Godfrey, P.L.G., estate bailiff to Lord Kenmare, for illegal seizures and distress of cattle; is he aware that it was proved at these proceedings that Lord Kenmare used to charge 12s. for every distress warrant against his tenants whether executed or not, and appropriated these illegal charges to his own use ; and in view of the fact that Lord Kenmare is a Justice of the Peace, as well as his agent Mr. Maurice Leonard, will the Lord Chancellor take notice of these proceedings ?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University) : I am informed that in the case referred to, the question of the illegality of the charges in respect of the distress warrants was not decided or gone into by the Judge who tried the case. The question, therefore, contained in the third paragraph does not arise.

CONSTABLE COURTNEY.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he has received from the Cork County Grand Jury a Resolution asking of the Government, in the case of the £1,000 compensation granted to Constable Courtney (owing to injuries received at the hands of men of the Limerick Militia), "as a matter of justice to the ratepayers of the county to defray half the sum out of the Imperial funds" ; and whether he proposes to take any action in the matter ?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle) : I did receive, through the Irish Government, the resolution of the Cork County Grand Jury. It appears that the compensation to the injured constable, so far as it is payable by the public, is fixed by Statute, and I am in communication with the Treasury on the subject. I do not think that the proposal of the Cork Grand Jury is unreasonable.

CIVIL SERVANTS' RETIREMENT.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) : I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he will give the promised Return of the Civil servants exempted from the retirement at 65 rule, and what causes the delay in giving the information ?

MR. GOSCHEN : In the application of a General Order to so large a body of men as the Civil Service, some cases must arise which require consideration and discussion, but I hope to be in a position to present the Return in question before long.

Mr. Flynn

"POLITICAL" PRISONERS IN PORTLAND PRISON.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has seen in The Irish Daily Independent, of the 22nd instant, a report of a visit to Portland Prison, supplied by a correspondent who accompanied the hon. Member for Waterford City, who recently visited the Irish political prisoners therein confined ; and whether he is aware that the prisoners (as described in this newspaper) were, during a severe snow-storm, harnessed to a wagon-load of stones on the roadside, and that the men had a regular harness attached to them ; and, if so, whether he will discontinue the practice ?

MR. MATTHEWS : Yes, Sir, I have seen this newspaper report. In several respects it is inaccurate. The storm which had prevailed on the previous day and in the morning of the day in question, had subsided, and the prisoners were employed in drawing materials from some quarter under repair in hand carts, eight or ten men to each cart. The equipment was the same as is used by sailors and soldiers when drawing field artillery. I see no reason why this kind of work should be discontinued.

DR. GALLAGHER.

MR. FLAVIN (Cork) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether Dr. Gallagher, who is undergoing a sentence of penal servitude for life in Chatham prison, has for more than a year been refused permission to write to his friends in America ?

MR. MATTHEWS : This prisoner wrote to his friends in America in November last, but he has received no reply to this letter or to his previous communications.

ENNISKILLEN GAOL AND THE PRISONS' BOARD.

MR. JORDAN (Clare, W.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if the Prisons' Board claim the area in front of the gaol in Enniskillen, extending from the gaol wall to the channel adjoining the country road leading south to Castle-cole ; and, if so, is it the duty of the Board to keep it in proper repair and clean it : will they either do so or hand it over to the Local Authority, the Town Commissioners, to put it into and keep it in proper condition ; and is this gaol now used as a prison, or is it intended that the Authorities will discontinue its use as such, and permit it to fall into further dilapidation ; if not, will they instruct an engineer to inspect and report on the condition and appearance of the outside front wall, doors, &c., with a view to due repairs ?

MR. JACKSON : I must ask the hon. Member to defer this question for a short time pending inquiries.

THE LAND COMMISSIONERS IN ENNISKILLEN AND INCREASE OF RENTS.

MR. JORDAN : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that rents in many cases and generally were increased by the Land Commissioners in Enniskillen, county Fermanagh, last week ; and if he will state the number of cases in which rents were thus increased, and the number in which they were reduced, at those sittings ; and the number of appeals by the landlord and tenant respectively, both in the cases of increased and reduced rents ?

MR. JACKSON : I have telegraphed for the information, but it has not come to hand. I, therefore, must ask the hon. Member to give notice of the question.

LISTOWEL AND TARBERT LIGHT RAILWAY.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he has received any representations from Listowel and Tarbert about the proposed construction of a light railway between those towns in North Kerry, and whether he will inquire into the proposals with the object of recommending the Treasury to make an advance of money under the Light Railways Act towards the construction of this line of railway ?

MR. JACKSON : I have not received any representations on the subject mentioned. As stated, however, in reply to a similar question put by the hon. Member for North Kerry, on the 4th August last, some representations had been then received, but no definite scheme had been brought under the notice of the Government.

THE MARQUESS OF DONEGALL.

DR. TANNER : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he will state the salary which is paid to the Marquess of Donegall as Clerk of the Peace for the County of Antrim ; whether he is aware that the Marquess of Donegall has not been in the County of Antrim for upwards of 20 years ; and whether it is in accordance with practice to have as Clerk of the Peace of an Irish county a gentleman who never visits the county, and who cannot be seen by any person who has cause of complaint to make to him ?

MR. JACKSON : The county officer referred to was not appointed by nor is he under the control of the Government. I would, however, point out that, under the County Officers and Courts Act of 1877, all future appointments will be to the combined office of Clerk of the Crown and Peace, the duties of which must be discharged in person.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

EDUCATION AND LOCAL TAXATION RELIEF (SCOTLAND) BILL.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.) : I should like, Sir, to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he can now say what course the Government are going to take with regard to the Equivalent Grant to Scotland Bill, which was under consideration last night, and if a decision has been come to upon the point of difficulty which led to the Debate being interrupted ? Further, I should like to ask how the Government propose to deal with that question of the money which has accrued during the present year, because we were assured again and again last night by the Lord Advocate that that money was to be dealt with by the Bill, and yet there is in the Supplementary Estimates a Vote in respect to that money. It is obvious it cannot be dealt with in both ways, and I should like to know what course the Government mean to take.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The money will, of course, require to be voted, whether it is, or is not, in the Bill. I think, in view of the very wide divergence of opinion expressed by many Scotch Members on both sides last night with regard to that Bill, and the prospect of discussion then opened out, and the very limited time that remains before 31st March, it may possibly be advisable to deal with the £120,000 by estimate and not by Bill. With regard to the Bill itself, my right hon. Friend the Lord Advocate will to-day put down the proper notice for introducing the Bill in Committee of the Whole House. The subject has been considered by the authorities of the House, and they have come to the conclusion that that is the proper course to take. I ought to say that some misconception appears to have arisen, though not from anything that has dropped from me as to those responsible for the error in point of technical order. The authorities of the House are in no sense to blame in the matter, for the Bill was not submitted to them until a comparatively late hour last night. The House is, perhaps, aware that in cases where there is doubt as to whether a Bill should be introduced in Committee or the Whole House, or in a more ordinary way, it is usual to appeal to the Public Bill Office for a decision on the point. That, unfortunately, was not done in the present case, and it was in that way that the mistake arose. The House will see that the matter is not free from difficulty when I mention that, though the Scotch Bill deals with the equivalent grant for Scotland, and the Irish Bill with the equivalent grant for Ireland, it is necessary to introduce the Scotch Bill in Committee of the Whole House, but not necessary that the Irish Bill should be so introduced.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES.

SIR WILLIAM HAROURT: I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury when the promised Papers on Mombassa will be presented. I do not complain of their non-presentation, but I want to ask the right hon. Gentleman, under the circumstances, to postpone until Thursday the Vote for the preliminary survey for the railway from the coast. I should also like to hear what the business on Monday will be.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Of course, there is a certain inconvenience in not taking the Supplementary Estimates in the order in which they appear. I understand there are Votes in which the Irish Members take a deep interest, and I understand they would be glad to have them discussed at the earliest moment. If that is so, it might be to the general convenience of the House to take the discussion on the Irish Votes on Monday, reserving the discussion on West African affairs until Thursday.

MR. J. E. ELLIS: Will the Supplementary Estimates be the first Order of the Day?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: That is the intention of the Government, and I understand it to be the desire of the House to take the Irish Votes first. In that case I will put them down first, and on Thursday we will begin where the Committee left off last night—with the Foreign Office Vote, Class IV.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in view of the lamentable waste of time caused by the ignorance of Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench, he will take steps in future to prevent such a waste of time, and will consult the authorities of the House before bringing in a Bill?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I apprehend that what occurred last evening would be a warning, if warning were required, to the various Departments; and as to the suggestion of waste of time, I hope that will not be so, but that the discussion which occurred will be sufficient to satisfy the desires of hon. Gentlemen opposite.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I understand that no Supply will be taken to-night?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Certainly; I shall take no Supply until the opinion of the House has been taken on the Bill relating to education in Ireland.

MR. T. M. HEALY: If we once get into Supply we shall get away from the measure, because the National Education Bill stands as No. 3 on the Paper, while Supply is No. 1.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Supply is put down as the ordinary Order on a Friday evening, in reference to which hon-members may have the right to move amendments, but there is no operative Bill before the House, and the National Education Bill stands as the 3rd Order of the Day.

MR. BRYCE : As I see the Vice President of the Council in his place, I would like to ask him when he expects the so-called Draft Charter of the Durham University to be presented and distributed?

MR. W. HART DYKE : I regret the day which has occurred very much. I expected the charter would have been circulated before now, but I will make inquiry into the matter.

MOTIONS.

MR. DE COBAIN.

6.35.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR : In moving to move the Motion upon the Paper, I do not think it will be necessary, and I am certain it would not be agreeable to myself or the House, that I should call upon the Motion which stands in my name. The question is familiar to the House, having been before it during the present Session and part of last Session, and all I need say is that I endeavour to follow the precedent which Parliament has set on unhappy occasions of this kind, and to avoid in the appearance of injustice to the gentleman referred to in the Resolution. By this Resolution the House does not, of course, constitute a Court of Law. We are not a tribunal to decide whether the charge against Mr. Cobain is well or ill-founded, and are ill-suited to undertake an investigation of that kind. The only ground upon which we pass this Resolution is that we have been made aware that a warrant is out against Mr. De Cobain, that, knowing that warrant was against him, he has remained in a foreign country, outside the jurisdiction of the law. He has been ordered to stand in his place in this House, and the Order has been served upon him, but he has refused to obey it, and commit ourselves to no proposition in any way prejudicing his case, but I think it will be felt by this House, as it has been felt by a previous use of Commons under similar painful circumstances, that we ought not to allow one to remain among our number who, with such a charge hanging over him, refuses to submit himself to the tribunals of this country, to have his name cleared, if so be he is innocent.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That Mr. Edward Samuel Wesley De Cobain, a Member of this House, having been charged with having committed, and with having incited the commission of gross and criminal acts of indecency, and warrants issued for his apprehension, and the said Edward Samuel Wesley De Cobain having failed to obey an Order of this House, that he should attend in his place upon Tuesday the 23rd day of this instant February, and having fled from justice, be expelled this House."—
(Mr. A. J. Balfour.)

(6.38.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.) : I only rise because I think the Resolution ought to be expressed in decent English, and that the several offences constituting the charge against Mr. De Cobain should not be presented in a topsy-turvy manner, but should be presented to the House in the order in which they occur. I would suggest that the Resolution should read thus :—

"That Mr. Edward Samuel Wesley De Cobain, a Member of this House, having been charged with having committed, and with having incited to the commission of gross and criminal acts of indecency, and warrants having been issued for his apprehension; and the said Edward Samuel Wesley De Cobain having fled from justice, and failed to obey the Order of this House, that he should attend in his place upon Tuesday, the 23rd day of this instant February, he be expelled from this House."

The Motion as it stands on the Paper is neither chronological nor intelligible, and as I think it should be chronological, grammatical, and intelligible, I beg to move accordingly.

MR. SPEAKER : This is proposed in the nature of an Amendment, and possibly the House may accept the Motion in this amended form.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

PUBLIC MEETINGS IN SCHOOLROOMS.

RESOLUTION.

*(6.40) MR. HERBERT GARDNER (Essex, Saffron Walden) : The proposition contained in the Resolution I have to move is not novel in this House, and therefore I shall not have to intrude upon the attention of the House at any great length. Since the Parliament of 1886 I have endeavoured to impress this question upon the attention of the House and of the country, and, with the exception of one instance, the Resolution has been opposed on every occasion by the Government and hon. Members opposite. The reasons in favour of this Motion are principally three : first, the scarcity in rural districts of places for holding public meetings, and consequently the necessity of using the schools for the purpose ; secondly, that the State has a right to claim the use of schoolrooms for public occasions ; and, thirdly, because the use of these rooms has often been granted or withheld upon inconvenient or unfair principles. If I can prove this, perhaps I shall have gone far to convince hon. Gentlemen opposite that the Resolution is as necessary as it is moderate. Before the Franchise Bill of 1885 the constituents of County Members were, generally speaking, well-to-do men, who could drive into the county town to hear the County Member ; but under the new electorate there is a majority of poor men, who are labourers or artizans. During the elections of 1885 and 1886, and at many by-elections, many hon. Members have been put to inconvenience in addressing their constituents, and some of us have been obliged to address them in the open air which, in these days of influenza, is inconvenient, and even dangerous. In my constituency, which includes 80 villages, there are only five places which I can hire to speak in. Precedents show that the State has taken upon itself the right of using these schools for public purposes when it pleases. It is not disputed that the use of these schoolrooms is often refused on unfair principles. But what is worse is, that they are often granted to one side of Political Parties, and denied to the other. If that should be contradicted, I can quote the Vice President of the Council who, in 1887, in a reply given to myself, said he had discovered that hon. Members opposite were under special disadvantages as regarded meetings in rural districts. With regard to the Amendments which have been put upon the Paper, I think that standing in the name of the hon. Member for Shropshire will be found to be out of order, and that the Amendment of the Member for Wigan is unnecessary. There is an Amendment of the hon. Member for Oxford providing that the use of these rooms shall not be allowed "at the time of an election for a seat on the County Council, or in the Imperial Parliament." I do not see how you can carry out that Amendment, which makes no provision for the Member of Parliament to visit his constituents, and I believe that proposal is practically impossible. Hon. Members have to vote on the point whether a political Party wishes to gain an advantage over its opponents, and whether they will run the risk of it being said that the arguments of the other side are so powerful that they wish them not to be heard by the electors. I do not believe that is the desire of hon. or right hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House, and holding this opinion I submit with confidence and hope my Resolution to the chivalrous instincts and sense of justice which I believe to be the common property of every section of the House.

(7.2.) MR. A. H. DYKE ACLAND (York, W.R., Rotherham) : It appears to me, Sir, that the managers of voluntary schools are taking this question into serious account, and there are different interpretations being put on the way schools are to be used. There are those who think these schools, receiving enormous sums of money from the State, are private property. The School Guardian says that the National Schools belong to the Church, and the fact that the State contributed to their erection does not affect the question of ownership and control. But the education given in these schools is largely provided for out of Imperial Votes. We say that the distinction you are always trying to make between taxes and rates is unreal. The public are providing rem 75 to 80 per cent. of the incomes of these schools, and it is reasonable that this large sum providing for the support of voluntary schools should carry some reasonable principle of local control. The same paper goes on to say—

"We think it would be wise of school managers to refuse the use of their schools for political meetings altogether."

That would mean practically the boycotting of all political meetings. The Vice President of the Council told us last year that he often attended political meetings, and had had to bolt from them.

SIR W. HART DYKE: Read the words. In large towns. In Erith in 1865.

MR. A. H. DYKE ACLAND: "I can assure hon. Members I have often had to bolt from the meeting." The question was raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Rugby, who proposed that village schools should be used for public purposes, when the right hon. Gentleman gave as one of the reasons for refusing his support that at these village meetings some of the audience misbehaved themselves. If the advice of papers like the School Guardian is followed we shall have no meetings at all, because there is no other place for either Party to meet in. Then we come to the stage of the clergyman, who refuses his school because he belongs to the other side. I have here a letter, dated the 27th October last, from Sir Walter Phillimore, in which he says the clergyman of a certain parish said—

"I and my friends are determined to do all in our power to prevent Gladstone playing tricks and drakes with Ireland. You cannot have it."

Then we have a much more modern stage. A letter from the Buckrose Division says—

"I am always willing to allow the use of our schools to candidates of either Party for the purpose of addressing the electors, but beyond this I do not feel disposed to go."

If that position were maintained in cases where the candidate could not go to the village more than once in four or five years, it would limit the occasions on which politics could be discussed to one single occasion in that period. We can lay down no rule in this case unless we admit the broad principle that reasonable meetings for public and political purposes shall be allowed in these schools. The questions of temperance and labour are involved in the politics of the day, and are we to say that unless a member or candidate is present the villagers are not to have reasonably-conducted opportunities for authorities to address them on these questions? These village schools are being used for evening agricultural classes to help the farmer and allotment holder to get the knowledge how better to use his brain power and labour in the cultivation of the land. Are we not also to allow men to come to the labourer and teach him how best to use his capital—his labour? I think we should in these places have reasonable freedom for the discussion of social and political matters which directly concern the people in their relations to local and Imperial affairs. We shall be asked, Is this to apply to Board Schools? Most certainly. Everybody who knows anything of the North knows how valuable are the working men's co-operative societies in teaching thrift, the value of money, and the power of association. Why should a man be refused the use of the village Board School when he comes down to teach the villagers how to make a shilling go as far as possible by means of a co-operative society? In some cases at the last School Board Election the members were returned pledged to lend the school for such purposes, and now the meetings are held. In the next village the clergyman thinks co-operation is bad, and refuses the use of his school to the present day. That shows that School Boards can be dealt with, and can be dealt with by the villagers themselves in their own interests at least once in three years, and that these other schools, which have quite as large sums of Imperial money at their disposal cannot be dealt with by the villagers. The point about school managers is that many clergymen lend their schools willingly and heartily for every good purpose; they welcome the man who speaks about labour and about co-operation, and for good entertainments, whenever conducted by Nonconformists or others, which will make the lives of the people better. But the point is that in the matter of private schools you have no security for permanence. One clergyman may so lend the school; but the clergyman who follows may take exactly the opposite view. This point should be carefully considered. The schools of this country last year received £3,000,000 from the State, and now receive more than £5,000,000. How, when many of these schools are not contributing 20 per cent. of the whole income of the schools, can you say that the people have no right to demand that their own public interests shall be considered? The Bishop of London said:—

"Every arrangement which treats the school as the people's own, and encourages the people to take a share in the management, will do at least as much service as the wisest advice and most skilful administration."

Many of these schools have had money grants, and could not have carried on their work without them, and it is impossible to use the word "private" in the sense in which it is ordinarily used. I hope my hon. Friend's Motion will be taken in a wide sense; but we do not expect the Government to concede the schools for all the questions to which we have alluded. Politics are of a social character nowadays, and you must permit, by reasonable arrangement, discussion by the villagers of these social questions. There are the questions of friendly societies and old-age pensions, and we should encourage the villagers to meet Members of Parliament and discuss these questions. There should be hardly a night when the schools should not be lighted up, and something interesting going on, instead of being dark and shut up, because people are afraid of these alarming subjects which are placed before the town working-men every day of their lives. Let us do all we can in Parliament—responsible for these grants—to help forward the villagers in every way that lies in our power. Let us give the grants on condition that when the schools are not being used for night-classes they shall be used for every kind of meeting, political or social, which the inhabitants desire to be held in them. These are the very subjects on which we want more light and discussion. Is not insecurity enough already in lives of many of our labourers, in tenure of their cottages and things to inculcate a fear speaking out. Can you not then the security of hearing only both sides, but all sides, out treating them like children every political and social question, can do much to lighten the heart of the labourer if we do all we can brighten, instruct, and improve it. do not do enough in that direction the use to which we put our local schools at present. Let the Government give the concession on a local basis, and the more generous the concession the more reasonable will be the use to which the schools are put the greater the opportunity for education of the citizens, which opportunity we are bound to do our best to deny to the inhabitants of our districts.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to end of the Question, in order to add the "taking into consideration the scarcity of buildings suitable for holding public meetings in rural districts, and the desirability that electors of the Country should be enabled to hear both sides of questions affecting Imperial and local interests, this House is of opinion that the schoolrooms in schools in receipt of Parliamentary grants on such occasions should not interfere with the educational purposes of the schools, and under the condition of payment of all reasonable expenses by the members of the meeting, should be at the disposal of the inhabitants of the district in which the school is situated for the purpose of holding public meetings,"—(Mr. H. Gardner.)

—instead thereof.

*(7.20.) MR. STANLEY LEITCH TON (Shropshire, Oswestry): hon. Member for Saffron Walden introduced his Resolution as it were a Radical Candidates' Bill. It seems that these gentlemen are not able to find places in which to address their constituents, and so the hon. Member suggests that someone else should provide them. I have certain sympathy with the hon. Gentleman, for I have often had to speak in the open air and on the hillside her places which are extremely inconvenient, and I should not object if candidates should have nice schools scattered all over their constituency, swept and garnished, in which they and congenial spirits might gather together. Let us put the question on the right lines. It is for the inconvenience of ourselves that we desire his appropriation, this invasion, so to speak, of the property of other people. The hon. Member for Saffron Walden begins by declaring the scarcity of convenient rooms in rural districts, and ends by claiming the schoolrooms everywhere, in towns as well as country. He declares it would be a great advantage to have political meetings in these rooms, and then, far from confining his Resolution to that, he ends by saying that every school shall be at the disposal of every two inhabitants of every district for the holding of all kinds of public meetings. What kind of public meetings? It is rather difficult to define a public meeting; his resolution would include Socialist, Anarchist, and Fenian meetings, as well as bogus meetings of every description. And I suppose the hon. Member for Rotherham would not be quite happy if it excluded pipes and le from the schoolroom.

MR. A. H. DYKE ACLAND: smoking concerts.

*MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: I should be sorry for the schoolmaster the desire of the hon. Member was carried out, and there was a public meeting every night. How he is to carry on his school work under such circumstances I cannot conceive. Of the schools which the hon. Member desires to take, 9,600 have been built by private individuals by private subscriptions, without one farthing of public money, and £4,000,000 have been spent on them by private individuals. Now, hon. Members desire to get hold of these buildings, on the ground that a public grant is made for education; but I would point out that the grant does not apply to the construction of the schools at all. I have great sympathy with hon. Members; but surely their purpose is not educational. We can never allow that these schools are public property. The hon. Member ignored altogether the managers of the schools.

It is rather a strong measure for two inhabitants to override the freely elected representatives of the people—the School Board—to enter the school and put aside the wishes and regulations of the Board. I wish to make a suggestion, which I hope will be acceptable both to the Government and to hon. Members opposite. We are promised that a Bill shall be brought forward to exempt schools from rates, and I think we might add a clause to that Bill, under a proper definition, which will give, under reasonable conditions framed by the Department, the use of these rooms for political meetings.

*(7.30.) MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby): I wish to support the Resolution of my hon. Friend in its most generous sense. I have always been a strong advocate for opening the schools for political and social purposes which will elevate the mind of the villagers in any way. I do not understand in moving this Resolution that we are trying to obtain the schools for ourselves as candidates or Members of Parliament. But we are doing it for the purpose of giving the parishioners in their own school district an opportunity of discussing the different sides of all questions. I also controvert the statement that these schools are entirely private schools. If these schools had not been built either by the landlords or private subscriptions, they would have had to be built out of the rates. Amongst those who so subscribed are many Non-conformists as well as many of those of the Church of England. Now that such large contributions are made out of the Imperial funds it is only fair that the schools should be used as far as possible for the benefit of the parishioners. In putting my verbal amendment to the Resolution it was with a view of giving them power which they do not possess under the Resolution as it stands. There will always be found—whatever the subject of the discussion may be—people ready to take the responsibility of calling and conducting the meeting, and this would give them power to hold meetings, and see that the parishioners are not kept out by people brought from other districts, which is often done. Those who ask for the room would have control of the meeting, and it would be in the first instance for the benefit of those whose children attend the schools. I do not wish to restrict the use of the rooms to political and County Council meetings; I desire that they should be open for the discussion of every subject, social or political, Imperial or local, and as far as possible for entertainments which may elevate the minds of the parishioners. I hope the Government will accept this Resolution in the generous sense in which it is put on the Paper, then it will be dealt with by legislation, and we shall be able to discuss the details in the Bill. I cannot see what there is in the Amendment of the hon. Member for Shropshire, unless it is that he desires to put in this Preamble to the effect that on behalf of the clergy he grudges giving the schools in these cases, but that, knowing that both sides are in favour of the Bill, he is willing to yield. I also regret the Amendment of the hon. Member for the Oxford University. That comes very badly from the Representative of the rural clergy, who has a quiet seat, and has never to go through the drudgery of Election speeches. If he really speaks the mind of the rural clergy, I am very sorry for it, but I do not believe it. If it is not, I think it very unfortunate that it should come from one who is here as special spokesman of them. I hope the House will not accept any Amendment, but that they will accept the Resolution in a generous sense, and not accept any limitations, but leave all details to be settled in a Bill.

*(7.40.) MR. J. G. TALBOT (Oxford University): I do not claim to represent the rural clergy or the rural lawyers any more than the urban clergy or urban lawyers. I wish to explain why, and to what extent, I think it necessary to oppose the Resolution of the hon. Gentleman opposite. I should like to remark that these school buildings are primarily places for education; and secondly, and by accident, they become places of public meeting. I do not desire to offer a non possumus, but there is a danger in the natural desire to meet what is the very obvious wish on the part of many people, of forgetting what the schools exist chiefly for. In so far as we devote these buildings to other purposes we run the risk of unfitting them for the purpose for which they were originally designed. They are to be used for political meetings, and these meetings sometimes degenerate into a certain amount of rowdyism—I do not say more at the meetings of one side than the other—there is a good deal of disturbance, and the furniture gets rather knocked about. That is not a convenient condition for school buildings to be reduced to. One hon. Member suggested that smoking concerts should be permitted. The effects of smoking overnight do not always disappear with the night, and those effects, I suppose, would be an uncomfortable adjunct to education. These buildings are, under present circumstances, often used for evening technical education lectures. Suppose the parishioners claimed the schoolroom for a public meeting, what is to prevent, unless the Bill is very carefully drafted, the lectures being disturbed by the political meeting, which the parishioners have a right to demand? Hon. Members will see that this is a question which cannot be disposed of by an after-dinner discussion, but is one which really needs careful attention, which I am sure the right hon. Gentleman will give to it. The hon. Gentleman who moves this Resolution says—

“Under the condition of payment of all reasonable expenses by the convenors of the meeting.”

Has the hon. Gentleman thought these words out? They are very nice, but how is he going to carry them out? The convenors of the meeting will be the inhabitants of the village, but how are they going to pay the expenses? The managers have to maintain the schools in a fit state every day to secure the grant. Suppose the room is upset by a rowdy meeting, and some of the chairs and desks are broken; who is going to make good the damage? Who is going to ensure that the room is in a proper state the next morning for its primary use? These points want very careful watching. If these meetings are to go on all night, and every night throughout the year—

MR. HENEAGE: Not all night.

Mr. Heneage

MR. J. G. TALBOT: The speaker's sequence might be exhaustive and others might want to answer it, and there might be a regular Parliamentary debate. If that is to be the case I do not know where we shall be led. We must put a limit to their use, and I thought they might be used for Parliamentary and County Council election purposes only, and then my right on. Friend might rescue them by his wisdom from the dangers he has endeavoured to point out. I am sorry that the occasion has risen for this Motion at all. Such matters should be arranged by cooperation one with another. I suppose there may be unreasonable clergymen, though I have not often come across them; yet if there are unreasonable people, I suppose the House must do something to meet the difficulty. I do not think there was any large demand made for this; it if we are going to deal with it, I hope it will be carefully done. As it must be done by Bill, I suppose we shall soon have an opportunity of discussing it. We know the Government have a very large programme before them, though how much of it they will fulfil I do not know. I have great confidence in them, but I do not think adding another Bill to that programme will help them through. As we are going to have one Education Bill for exempting school buildings from rates, that affords a good opportunity for adding a clause on this subject, and the two were dealt with together it might conduce to a saving of public money.

(7.50.) THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): I hope I have not intervened too soon; but I am anxious, before hon. Members separate, to put my views and the views of the Government before the House with regard to his Resolution. The speeches of both the Mover and Seconder were perfect models of what a speech should be on a Resolution of this kind. There was no evidence of an intention on their part to stir up Party strife. I must be allowed, in the first instance, to say one word on the part of the Department which I have the honour to represent. So far as my own opinion goes, I have always expressed a great regret that there should be any necessity for holding political meetings in our schools. I am not alone in holding that view; it is held, I know, by many hon. Members opposite. Still more do I entertain this regret in view of the changes we have made in regard to our elementary schools. I trust I am not over-sanguine in hoping that the changes we have made and the better position in which we have placed rural schools will induce managers—especially in respect of the newer branches of education in which amusement is mingled with instruction—to adopt the system of evening classes, which is one of the most prominent features of these changes. In 1887 the matter was brought before the House, and the hon. Member for Leicester said that just in proportion as these buildings were well adapted for school purposes, and furnished for that end, just to that extent they were ill-adapted for public meetings. But we have this evening to meet the case which is put before us, and my duty on behalf of the Government is to say that I am prepared to concede this point. We have a great difficulty in regard as to how and where public meetings are to be held in rural districts. I myself have had some lengthened experience of public meetings. The hon. Member for Rotherham has referred to a more unfortunate phase of my experience. What I had in my mind when I spoke happened a long time ago, and hon. Members may congratulate themselves that we have now a more peaceful state of things. Not many years ago I had the painful experience of being invited to attend the meeting of a political opponent in his own hop kiln. Hon. Members will appreciate the dangerous position I occupied when I felt all the while that my opponent might at any time light the fire, and while drying his hops might dry up his opponent. It is perfectly obvious from the speech of all hon. Members that we have a great difficulty in regard to these meetings, and we are all agreed that we should wish all to share alike in regard to these schoolrooms—either that they should not be used at all or else be at the disposal of either Party. Cases have been shown where schools have been lent to one Party and denied to the other. Then we come to the proposal of the hon. Member. Although I know that during last Session I refused to import an Amendment with reference to this matter into the Education Bill then passed, I think I can with some justice—it is scarcely worth while to go into the reasons—press the view that it would have been hazardous for me, considering that the Bill I was dealing with was bristling with contentious matters, to attempt to graft such a proposal on the Bill. Yet I wish to assure hon. Members that I was during that discussion impressed with the fact that this was not a difficulty which was felt on one side of the House only. I found several Members on this side, both during the discussion and afterwards, pressing seriously upon me the fact that a great difficulty—especially in the Eastern Counties—was met in regard to public meetings in schools. Since that time I have gone into the matter, and have come to the conclusion that, owing to the extraordinary growth in the speech-making power of the country, this was a difficulty that must be met. I calculated that for every speech made in 1865 there were now a hundred. Putting all these facts together, and acknowledging as the Government must do that there is a real grievance to meet as regards the supply of places for political meetings, I wish to state, on behalf of the Government, that we are prepared to fully accept the principle embodied in this Resolution. Sir, having said so much, and without going closely into the speeches of the Proposer and Seconder of the Resolution, I think it only fair, for many reasons, to urge one or two considerations upon the House with regard to this question. It has been urged by my hon. Friend that this is not an easy question to deal with, and that there are grave difficulties in regard to the matter. But they are difficulties which I believe, with a little give and take on both sides of the House, can be fairly and adequately met. But I should be wrong if I did not mention one or two points for the consideration of hon. Members. In the first place, I should like to urge this point on hon. Members: The Resolution as it stands demands that these schoolrooms shall be at the disposal of the inhabitants of the district where the school is situated. This points to the intention that the demands should come, and ought to come, from the locality. I am of opinion that this demand should come from a certain number of the ratepayers of the locality, or other responsible persons. I think that some such provision as this is necessary in regard to these schools. Much has been made, and I think very fairly made, in previous discussions, of the difficulty of the damage which might be done to schools. Under the circumstances I think it would be perfectly useless for us to discuss that point. All of us who have any experience of these things know that damage may occur. That is a great matter, because it involves this: that security should be given that any damage that was done should at once be put right, and it also raises the difficult point with regard to the description of the meetings held in the schools. I think we ought to have some security that a candidate can only summon a meeting through the ratepayer in the locality; and as regards any damage that may be done, I think that security should also be given, and that such damage should also be made good at once. I think it should also be understood that the right can only be claimed where very considerable pains have been taken to discover a suitable building and where a suitable building cannot be found. I would further point out that it is the interest of the locality that this should be done. There may be cases of schools being taken for a meeting where the building may be filled with people coming from other parishes to the exclusion of the inhabitants of the locality. Well, then, I think the manager should be protected not only as regards the actual hours during which a meeting of the school may be held, but in a case such as this. Supposing a demand is made for the occupation of a school for a public meeting on a certain date, and then following this meeting an inspection of that school is to take place. Here a very great difficulty may arise. The inspection usually takes place in the early morning, and a noisy meeting might place the manager in a very great difficulty as regards the inspection of that school. I think we should, therefore, see that some protection should be given to the manager, and that he should have some right of appeal to the Education Department or some responsible body. I think I need not detain the House further. I think due notice should be given; and I can only conclude these few remarks by saying that I think it would be well that these difficulties should be met in a fair and a generous spirit on both sides of the House, and I hope the concession I have made will be appreciated by hon. Members.

(35.) MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I am quite sure that the concession which has been made by the right hon. Gentleman will be received in every quarter of the House in the way it deserves. The right hon. Gentleman could not have taken up a new position with better humour or better grace. I will not go for a moment into the reasons he gave for justifying the attitude he has now taken up. It would be ungracious for me to do that; and I may state that it is enough for us that the right hon. Gentleman and the Government are spared, to use the right hon. Gentleman's own language, "to the full" to accept the principle of this Amendment. The qualifications, if qualifications they may be called, are really not worth harrelling about. In fact, many of them—the important ones—are already embodied in the Resolution. The proposal that the demand should be made by a certain number—it should be a very small number—of responsible persons, is by no means an unreasonable one; and I have to remind him that my hon. Friend the Member for Letherham admitted that the test of the kind of meeting that ought to be held, as regards the character of the meeting, was to be found in the sense of the inhabitants of the districts. As regards this last point, as to the seasonableness of notice being given, of course, in the case of all meetings of his kind, that must be recognized. As regards the apprehensions expressed faintly by the right hon. Gentleman, but loudly by the hon. Member for the University of Oxford, both of them seemed to forget that schools are used every week of the year for political meetings. When the hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford talked about danger to the furniture, and of the difficulty of the place being put in order early next day, and when the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council observed that the Inspector might arrive next morning and find the room not quite ready, and so forth, all this would apply to schools which all of us who represent boroughs know are open every week of the year. That is to say, we hold our meetings in Board Schools, and the next morning the school work goes on exactly as if these meetings had never been held. All these apprehensions are purely imaginary; and I only regret for the sake of the position of the University of Oxford that the Member for that body, which I, as an humble member of it, of course wish well as much as the hon. Member himself, should come forward to take up this position. But as the Government have not followed him in that very obnoxious line, I shall say nothing more about it, only to point out this: that his own Amendment, if accepted by the House, would have left all these dangers for several months previous to an election. The right hon. Gentleman said—and this was almost the only point which I thought he was not reasonable in—he said that the inhabitants should satisfy themselves that they should not come and demand the schools unless they were persuaded that it was the last resort. Well, I do not think that any such necessity should be laid upon the inhabitants. We all know very well what is the place of last resort; that would be the public-house; but does the right hon. Gentleman mean that meetings should be held in a public-house rather than in a school?

SIR W. HART DYKE: What I really wished to impress upon the House was that they should only use a school when they could not get a better place, and that every possible pains should be taken by them to get a better place if possible.

MR. J. MORLEY: I quite accept the right hon. Gentleman's explanation; and I am sure that the persons concerned will take care to find a better place if they can. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to limit the use of the schools by talking about the Parliamentary candidate as being the only person who could use these schools. I hope that he, and I hope that the Government, will fall in with the wishes expressed by the hon. Member for Rotherham, and that all subjects of political and social interest would be discussed at meetings in these school-rooms—temperance, friendly societies, co-operation. Persons wishing to discuss all subjects of that kind, if a sufficient number of the inhabitants wish to discuss them, should be allowed to do so, and I hope that all these schools, supported by public money, will be open to the people. It is a very important concession that is made. It will make a great difference in rural life, and after the night now passing I hope we shall never more hear any of the nonsense about these schools being private property.

COLONEL BLUNDELL (Lancashire, S.W., Ince) : Sir, whilst I am not opposed to school buildings in rural parishes being used for public meetings and for entertainments, I am, at the same time, most anxious that the Vice President should specially consider the peculiar position in which the Church schools stand. I mean school rooms which are also used as churches. The circumstances of these schools are different from those of the ordinary elementary schools, and it is not at all impossible that if they were thrown open, as is proposed by this Resolution, at the instance of several householders, they may be used for the purpose of entertainments that may justly be held to give offence to the congregation of the Church. Therefore, Sir, I would suggest either that the Church schools should be exempted—perhaps that would be desirable in any case—from the Resolution, or that, in case of objection being taken, power should be given to the managers of referring any application to the Inspectors or to a local Magistrate. The effect of that would be to check any possible abuse.

Mr. J. Morley

*(9.48.) MR. T. H. BOLTON (St. Pancras, N.) : I understand that the Government have, in principle, assented to the Resolution of my hon. Friend the Member for Saffron Walden. The object of my rising is, therefore, not to prolong the discussion, but to direct attention to the terms of the Resolution. In the Preamble the Resolution recites that there is a scarcity of conveniences for the holding of public meetings in rural districts, and the Resolution goes on to say that, in the opinion of the House, schoolrooms should be made available for the purpose of public meetings. Sir, taking these two parts of the Resolution it might be suggested that the want of adequate accommodation, and the necessity of supplying it, were alike confined to the rural districts. That is not so. I quite admit the case of the rural districts, but in many of the cities and large towns the case is quite as strong. In my own constituency, for example, namely, North St. Pancras, in Gospel Oak district, the only good room available for public meetings is a Church schoolroom, the use of which, for reasons I will not comment upon, has been denied to myself and to my friends. Some rule has been made that the room is not to be used for political purposes, and, as a consequence, I have not had an opportunity of holding a meeting of my constituents in that particular district. The only large room available in the whole neighbourhood is a room on the border of my constituency, for which a considerable fee is charged. The inconvenience arising from the want of suitable places for the holding of public meetings is felt in many other parts of the Metropolis. Therefore, Sir, I hope that when the right hon. Gentleman considers how to give practical effect to my hon. Friend's proposal he will not confine his attention to the rural districts, but that he will likewise consider the claims of the Metropolis, and of the populous towns throughout the country to similar accommodation.

*(8.55.) VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Lancashire, N.E., Darwen) : Sir, although I sympathise very greatly with my hon. Friend opposite, the Member for Saffron Walden, I a-

the same time, think that a certain amount of sympathy should be extended to the managers of the rural and voluntary schools—sympathy with the sentiment they profess, and with the action they have thought it right to take. For my own part, I think that the managers of the voluntary schools would, on the whole, have acted more wisely if they had agreed that both Political Parties should have practically a free hearing before the constituencies. At the same time, the House should remember the circumstances under which these schools are built. Nearly two-thirds of the whole of the voluntary schools were built without a penny of assistance from the State—built by clergymen and churchmen interested in a particular form of education—namely, the education of the poor in the principles of the Church of England. Now, Sir, although I think the managers have behaved unwisely, I cannot but sympathise with them in their feelings of reluctance to permit the schools which they built to remain in the Church of England being used to destroy it. Take a parallel case—the Volunteers—who are maintained largely by public funds. Supposing it were suggested that the drill halls belonging to the Volunteers, which have been put up by private subscriptions, should be available for public meetings when any six gentlemen of the parish might so desire, and supposing that these meetings might take the form of a denunciation of the volunteer system and their commanding officers. I think the Volunteers in this House would take care to make themselves effectively heard in opposition to any such proposal. I think they would be wrong. I think it could be better if they allowed the meetings; still, you could not hold them illogical if they said they would not allow buildings erected for the purpose of fostering the Volunteer movement being used to denounce it. Now, Sir, I understand the Government have accepted the Motion of the hon. Gentleman opposite. I think they are wise in so doing; but they must carefully consider the regulations under which meetings are to be held. Precautions must be taken that those who have the use of the schools can give a substantial guarantee against loss. But, if proper precautions were taken, I do not think any harm would accrue to voluntary schools; but I do not think any Resolution, or Bill consequent upon it, ought to be carried unless such precautions were taken.

(9.7.) SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I always hear the noble Lord speak upon this subject with great satisfaction, because I look upon him as a Representative of an almost extinct species—I mean the old Tory. In fact, his accents come upon us almost like distant music, and remind us of the Lost Chord. The noble Lord said they had created these schools for the purpose of extending the interest of the Church of England; but ever since the passing of the Elementary Education Bill of 1887 they ought to have perceived that there was no longer a legitimate purpose to which these schools should be appropriated. Although very reasonable views on this subject had been taken in this House, I have no doubt that there would be a great many people outside who would still adhere to the view that the village school is primarily to be used for the maintenance of the views and interests of the Church. But that is not the fact since the Elementary Education Act and those large grants were passed. I think Gentlemen on both sides of the House regard with favour the idea that the rural population shall have opportunities of instruction and interest. The noble Lord speaks of this matter as if it were a question of Party politics. But that is not our view, for we think it is not to be restricted to political meetings by any means, and what we contemplate is that the schoolroom should be the village hall, as the town-hall is the place of meeting in the town. There is generally in a village one building alone—unless you wish people to go to the public-house, which is the last place it is desirable they should use for the purpose—which is available for public meetings, and we contemplate that they should meet there when they have any question to discuss, whether they want allotments, or a Small Holdings Bill, or similar subjects; and where can the village community more properly meet to consider them than in a village school? Take again the question of temperance. There are many questions affecting village life, apart from Party politics, for which I desire there should be a free use of village schools, as the regular meeting place for the discussion of subjects apart from Party affairs. The noble Lord is very much afraid of the damage that may be caused at Party elections; but in the large towns we are perfectly familiar with these meetings for all sorts of purposes, and above all for Party purposes, and nobody hears of those mischiefs arising which give him so much alarm. As for safeguards, the noble Lord belongs to the Party of safeguards; but, generally speaking, when their safeguards come to be examined, they are either very unnecessary or totally inapplicable. The safeguards advocated to-night are mostly superfluous, and everything the noble Lord has been contending for in that respect is contained in the Resolution. Therefore, I hope the Bill will be accepted in a liberal spirit, and not in the narrow view which has been expressed on the opposite side.

(9.15.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I agree with the right hon. Gentleman that the fact of a large contribution made by the State towards the elementary education carried on in the schools does differentiate them, to a certain extent, from ordinary private schools erected and solely maintained by private enterprise; but at the same time it is perfectly certain, as my noble Friend behind me has said, that these schools, in a large number of cases, have been erected at the cost of a certain section of the community, in order that religious education may be carried on in accordance with their particular creed. That is a fact that should not be lost sight of whenever this Resolution comes to be embodied in a Bill. It fact, I do not think it is possible to describe the discussion of this evening as more than a Second Reading Debate upon the principle of the proposal. We are all agreed, on both sides of the House, that it is in the highest degree desirable that those schools, in districts where no other public places of assembly are to be obtained, should be open to every side of politics to be used for the amelioration of the life of the inhabitants of the district. But I confess that I have a uneasy feeling that when the hon. Gentleman opposite comes to embody this view in his Bill, he will find that he has to take more trouble in devising the safeguards which the right hon. Gentleman has derided than he at present supposes. My noble Friend has pointed out that if damage occurs to these schools the cost should be defrayed by the people who engage them, and not by the managers of the schools, and the equity of that proposition, I am sure, will be recognised by Gentlemen opposite. I notice that the Resolution of the hon. Gentleman applies to Ireland as much as to Scotland and England, and it is obvious that it must apply to Ireland, inasmuch as every argument used with regard to England applies with tenfold force to Ireland. But I think hon. Gentlemen should be very careful lest they should give a power to any street lecturer on social or political subjects to make use of convent schools in Ireland—which receive grants very much in excess of the amount given in the English schools—for purposes which those who ~~administer~~ in their management would disapprove of. In the North of Ireland, where the religious sects are equally divided, I can conceive that very considerable security against damage would be required in some cases by the managers of schools. When the hon. Gentleman comes to frame his Bill with safeguards for the managers of schools against all the dangers which have been pointed out his task will be very difficult. I shall be glad when the time comes that he can bring forward his Bill. In the meantime, I trust the result of this discussion, although it can have no obligatory force until its effect is embodied in a Bill, will have some influence in inducing every manager of a school to open it, so far as he can, to the expression of any legitimate opinion on the other side of politics, and I believe that the vast majority of them are now prepared to do so for the purpose of ameliorating the conditions of existence of the people in their locality.

Sir William Harcourt

(9.24.) MR. HERBERT GARDNER: Perhaps I may be allowed to know ledge the acceptance of the solution by Her Majesty's Government, but I find that the words of the Leader of the House do not agree with those of the Vice President——

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member has no right of reply, as there is no Amendment before the House.

(9.25.) MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, Co.): I notice an observation of the First Lord of the Treasury with regard to Ireland. We have not intervened in this Debate because we have waited to see what position would be taken by Her Majesty's Ministers, but the right hon. Gentleman who spoke behalf of the Government has now said it would be the duty of the hon. Member for Saffron Walden to introduce a Bill, whereas we gathered from the previous speech of the Minister of Education that it was the intention of the Government to do so themselves.

SIR W. HART DYKE: I think there must be some misapprehension. I do not think I said anything implying that the Government would bring in a Bill.

MR. HEALY: The hon. Member for Saffron Walden has no power of carrying a Bill if it were to be opposed or blocked by hon. Members opposite. Of course, we feel in Ireland that this is a matter of some delicacy, and do not at all wish to say that our hands are made up on the subject. What I would suggest to Her Majesty's Government is that the Government should instruct the Irish Education Board to draw up certain rules which, in their opinion, would define the limits of deviation with regard to the objects to be discussed at meetings in these schools.

(9.30.) MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, Co.): So far as Ireland is concerned this question, I must say it is not to us a very practical one. So much interest is taken with us in political affairs, and the meetings we hold are usually so large, so many people desire to attend them, that it would be practically impossible to use school buildings in rural districts, as they would not be large enough to afford accommodation. Therefore, the question does not interest us much until we see the proposals of the Government; but I feel bound to protest against the suggestion made by the First Lord of the Treasury. The First Lord, after the Resolution was accepted on behalf of the Government, stands up and speaks of a Bill being brought in by the hon. Member for the Saffron Walden Division to carry that Resolution into effect. Although I am but a comparatively new Member of the House, I am surprised, I confess, at the course taken by the right hon. Gentleman. I thought it was settled, as one of the established customs of the House that if a Government accepts a Resolution, the acceptance of which would be nothing but a mockery and a form if it were not carried out in substance, it is the duty of the Government to make that Resolution effective by bringing in a Bill upon the subject. I believe it is a fact that every Member of the House accepts that doctrine. The Government having agreed to the Resolution ought themselves to introduce a Bill. All the Wednesdays up to Easter have already been appropriated by private Members, and what chance, I ask, would the hon. Member for Saffron Walden have if he were to introduce a Bill? In fact, it would be practically impossible for him to carry it. We know that a number of Members of this House will not be likely to agree with the hon. Member for Saffron Walden in all the details of the measure, so that we know the measure will be ruined if the Government refuse to initiate legislation, and that they will be turning their acceptance of the Resolution into a nullity. I appeal to the desire for British fair play, and ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he is not himself aware that he is departing from the customs of the House with regard to this Resolution.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As a matter of personal explanation, I wish to say that I accept every word that has fallen from the Vice President of the Council. One very strong reason why the Government cannot undertake to introduce a Bill, is that we think we may have difficulty in passing the measures already introduced, and therefore it would be just as much a mockery if we were to introduce it without a chance of passing it.

SIR WILLIAM HAROURT: As the right hon. Gentleman has given no explanation, I think we should have one. I certainly understood the Vice President of the Council to say that he would bring in a Bill.

SIR W. HART DYKE: If the right hon. Gentleman can quote a single sentence in my speech to that effect I shall be glad to hear it.

(9.34.) MR. F. STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye): It is perfectly clear that there is a discrepancy between the speech of the First Lord of the Treasury and that of the Vice President of the Council. We certainly did understand from the speech of the Vice President of the Council that the Government would bring in a Bill.

SIR W. HART DYKE: I cannot admit anything of the kind.

MR. F. STEVENSON: I think, Mr. Speaker, that where the schools are in receipt of a grant out of the Imperial Exchequer these buildings ought to be serviceable as town-halls or village-halls, to be used for the purpose of political meetings. There are only three courses to be pursued. The first is, that the Member for Saffron Walden Division should bring in a Bill himself dealing with the question. That is practically impossible, and I think it would be a shame if the Government were to accept this Resolution and leave the matter in its present stage without any legislation on the subject. Considering the number of Bills that are down by private Members, it has little chance of securing a place, and even if it did secure a place there would be no chance of passing it into law. So far, therefore, as the first course is concerned, I believe it to be out of the question, and I think hon. Members will agree with me. The second course is that the Bill should have special precedence given to it, but the third is, I think, a practical one; it is that a clause be introduced into the Rating of Schools Bill, giving the power of holding political meetings in school rooms. I do not see the object of the Government accepting a Resolution that cannot be possibly carried out. There is no meaning in it; and I think the best course would be, as has been suggested, to bring in a clause in the Rating of Schools Bill, adopting the course that has been so generally recommended. Should the Government refuse to adopt that course, it will remain for hon. Members upon this side of the House, when they have a majority in the next Parliament, to put in force the terms of the Resolution.

(9.40.) MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I am bound to say that as I left the House a short time ago I was under the distinct impression, from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council, that the Government undertook to give legislative effect to the Resolution.

SIR W. HART DYKE: Can you quote any single sentence in my speech to justify that conclusion? In the interest of fair-play, I ask the hon. Member to quote any sentence from my speech that will bear any such interpretation: that the Government either directly or indirectly pledged itself to bring in a Bill.

MR. CHANNING: Well, I cannot carry my mind back to the exact words, but the impression left upon my mind was that the Government would bring in a Bill to deal with the question. I think this is a question of great importance in view of the General Election, which cannot be much longer delayed, and I think it is perfectly clear that Her Majesty's Government intend to run away from the opinion they have definitely endorsed in the course of the Debate. It is obvious that since the speech of the Vice President of the Council there has been some consultation in other parts of the House, and it is also evident that the irritation of some noble Lords and hon. Gentlemen opposite, who sit behind the Treasury Bench, has been assuaged by an assurance that the Government does not intend to be in earnest in this matter; that they have no intention of carrying the Resolution into effect; that the Debate is to be reduced to an ignoble farce, and that the Resolution which they have adopted is to be relegated to the region of pious opinions.

(9.45.) MR. AMBROSE (Middlesex, Harrow): Supposing the Resolution passed it would be necessary to introduce this Bill, and what I understand the Government has done is to edge itself that if such a Bill were introduced they would support it. But appears to me to be impossible to intend that that involves a pledge on part of the Government to introduce Bill this Session to give legislative effect to this Resolution, thereby disengaging all the other Business to which is already committed. I take it that Government, having accepted this resolution, will afford every facility to Members to carry it into effect, and that they will give every reasonable facility for the carrying out of their ~~desire~~ as contained in the Resolution before the House.

(9.50.) MR. JACOBY (Derbyshire, id): I should like to know what are the intentions of Her Majesty's Government upon this question.

I have listened to the speeches made on the part of the Government, and to the announcement of the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of Council, but I confess I do not yet know where we are. Is this Resolution to be given effect to, or is it not? The Government has accepted it, and I hold that, according to all precedent, they are bound, having accepted it, to introduce legislation upon the subject.

(9.55.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, id): I hope if the Government accept this Resolution—and I have no doubt, under the promise of the Government, a Bill will be introduced on the subject—they will have some consideration for the position of convent schools. I hope these schools will be exempted from the scope of this Bill, which I have no doubt the Government will introduce, bearing the way in which they have treated this Resolution. I wish to point out that there was a similar clause in the Ballot Bill, but it was struck out by the House of Lords, and do the Tory Party justice it should be said that they rose in arms against the action of the Lords upon that occasion. The Government has accepted this Resolution, and I think it would be creditable if a Bill were not introduced this Session dealing with the question.

(10.0.) MR. ROBY (Lancashire, E., Eccles): I understand that the Motion is accepted by the Government, and I, therefore, wish to give notice that upon the Amendment becoming a substantive Resolution, I shall move the addition of the following words:—

"And that it is the duty of Her Majesty's Government to give effect to this opinion by legislation."

It seems to me that this is the only proper course to adopt in connection with this matter, and that it is the only way in which the Resolution can be carried into effect.

*(10.5.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets): I must confess that there never was, to my mind, a more extraordinary course taken than that taken by the hon. Members opposite. The Resolution has been accepted by the Government, and, as a rule, the ordinary course pursued by the Government would have ended the discussion. For my part, I do not believe that after a Resolution of this kind has been proposed and carried with the assent of the Government, that there would be the smallest difficulty in connection with it. It has been suggested that the Government should at once bring in a Bill dealing with the matter, but I see not the slightest difficulty in dealing with the question, now that the Resolution has been accepted. There never was a more complete offer made by any Government. Hon. Members opposite are asked to bring forward a Bill to give effect to their Resolution, and the Government go further by saying that they will give any such Bill their entire support. Such an offer, I think, is a most generous one; but if the House desires to impose upon the Government the responsibility of setting aside some of the most important measures that have been proposed to the House, that is not a responsibility that the Government is prepared to accept. The Session is yet young, and we believe there will be no difficulty with the hon. Gentleman bringing forward a Bill to give effect to his Resolution. If such a Bill is brought forward the Government will support it, and do their utmost to pass it; and I cannot see what more can be properly meet to consider them than in a village school? Take again the question of temperance. There are many questions affecting village life, apart from Party politics, for which I desire there should be a free use of village schools, as the regular meeting place for the discussion of subjects apart from Party affairs. on us, and, under all the circumstances, I feel compelled to move the adjournment of the Debate.

MR. SCHWANN: I beg to move at the Question be now put.

MR. PHILIPPS: I move that the question be put.

MR. SPEAKER: The original Question was that I do now leave the Chair.

(10.26.) MR. WILLIAM LAWRENCE (Liverpool, Abercromby): Having voted in favour of this Motion on former occasions, I am glad the Government have accepted the Resolution that has been placed before the House. I, therefore, see nothing worth while fighting about. As the manager of a country school, I have to say that I've found no difficulty in allowing opposing Parties to use the school and air their opinions as they think proper. The result of the arrangement has been most beneficial to the village and to the district with which I am connected. It seems to me to be unreasonable to force the Government upon short notice to add the important measures already in their programme by including a Bill embodying the Resolution now before the House. Why could not the hon. Member bring in a Bill himself? Nobody will block its passage, and I hope the hon. Member will bring forward the matter. I, for one, shall heartily glad to support him.

(10.28.) SIR E. BIRKBECK (Norfolk, N.): I have to thank the Government, on behalf of the Eastern counties, for what they have done in regard to the Resolution of the hon. Member. But is it to be understood at the Government, in adopting it, to introduce a Bill embodying it, and so to set aside the Small Holdings Bill and other measures that they have undertaken?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: The hon. Member has raised a question, I can save some time by saying that the Government were urged to an Educational Rating Bill of their own, and I should like to know whether the First Lord will insert a clause giving practical effect to this resolution? No other business would thus be set aside; on the contrary, the Government would be making this Resolution and its fulfilment part of their own business.

SIR E. BIRKBECK: The right hon. Gentleman is entirely mistaken if he imagines that I and my hon. Friends are going to allow a Bill like the Small Holdings Bill to be put aside in favour of such a measure as this. We intend to stick firmly to our guns upon this subject. I ask hon. Members opposite to quote some precedent in support of the action which the supporters of the Resolution have taken.

(10.29.) MR. SAMUEL HOARE (Norwich): I have to express my appreciation of the manner in which the Government has dealt with the Resolution. I have some knowledge of country life and of electioneering, and I have always found it to be a great grievance that the use of schools was allowed to one Party and not to another. It is most desirable that some change should be introduced, and I am, therefore, particularly glad to hear the views of the Vice President of the Council. Since legislation was necessary I should like to see it given effect to without delay. I am, however, not surprised that the Government should hesitate to undertake the responsibility of bringing in another Bill. I had hoped that the hon. Member would have brought in a Bill himself, but as an Educational Rating Bill is about to be brought in by the Government, I wish to know whether it is not possible for the Government to bring in a clause giving effect to this Resolution?

(10.30.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: A number of appeals have been made to Her Majesty's Government from several quarters of the House, and this circumstance will, perhaps, serve as my excuse for asking permission for again interfering in the discussion. Unfortunately the speech which I delivered an hour-and-a-half ago was heard by a comparatively thin House, and I think few hon. Members now present are really aware of the original cause of the present dispute. I expressed my hope on the part of the Government that the Resolution and the Debate which had taken place might have an effect upon every desired, unless there is some purpose behind which is not quite apparent to our understanding. In fact, it would really seem as if hon. Members opposite were disappointed at the frankness with which the Government has met this Resolution, and the readiness they have shown to meet the proposals of the hon. Member.

(10.10.) MR. THOMAS ELLIS (Merionethshire) : I think that by accepting this Resolution the Government has taken upon itself a new responsibility. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian has again and again laid down the principle that a Government ought not to accept an abstract Resolution unless they saw their way to carry it into effect. I think the Government ought either to have made some definite announcement that they will deal with the matter this Session, or otherwise they should have opposed the Resolution. I believe many Members left the House under this impression before the dinner hour, and that the large majority of Members believe that the Government has pledged itself to carry out the terms of the Resolution.

*(10.15.) MR. WILLIAM GEORGE AINSLIE (Lancashire, N. Lonsdale) : It appears to me unfair that the right hon. Gentleman should be asked to bring forward a Bill embodying the Resolution because that Resolution has been adopted by the House. I do not see that this involves the Government in any responsibility in regard to the bringing in of a Bill. If the Government are going to deal with these properties they will surely either have to purchase them or rent them, and in regard to purchase I do not know how it can be done, as there is no one to whom the purchase money could be handed over. As to renting, it rests with Local Authorities, and I believe there is sufficient public spirit in existence to deal with the matter. At the same time, I do say that the managers of these schools should do all they could to facilitate the holding of popular meetings in country districts.

*(10.20.) SIR RICHARD TEMPLE (Worcester) : An hon. Member has said that the Government has run away from its undertaking in respect to the opening of village schoolrooms for public meetings. Now I do not see how the Government can be charged with running away from its pledges, and I think the hon. Member opposite could be equally charged with absolutely shrinking from the terms of the Resolution which has been proposed. In fact instead of the Government running away from its pledges it is the hon. Member for Saffron Walden who is running away from his. It has plainly been indicated by the Government that they will support a Bill if it were brought in dealing with the subject, and I think, therefore, it rests with the hon. Member to bring forward some proposal for legislation, and that the responsibility does not lie with the Government. There is time at the disposal of private Members, but not of the Government, already over-burdened. Safeguards, too, are needed in a Bill relating to that voluntary system which has done so much for the country.

(10.24.) MR. WILLIAM JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.) : I have listened with great interest to the Debate, and I heartily concur in the proposal of the hon. Member for Saffron Walden Division. I beg to thank the Government for having so cordially and rightly accepted the Motion of the hon. Member; but in the last few minutes I have noticed an attempt to play off one of those smart little dodges which has been resorted to once or twice in the present Session. An attempt has been made to force the hand of the Government, and to compel them to undertake a Bill upon this subject. Such a proceeding ought, in my opinion, to be resisted. I am happy to think that the acceptance of the Resolution will in Ireland afford an opportunity to Orangemen of meeting in rural schoolrooms to express their opinions upon the subjects of the day. The sharp practice of the hon. Member for the Eels Division—

MR. SPEAKER : I do not think that the hon. Member should use such a phrase. Such an expression cannot be permitted.

MR. JOHNSTON : I beg to withdraw the words I have used, Mr. Speaker. But still, I do think that the hon. Member was trying to steal a march on us, and, under all the circumstances, I feel compelled to move the adjournment of the Debate.

The Question was not put.

MR. SCHWANN: I beg to move that the Question be now put.

MR. PHILIPPS: I move that the Question be put.

MR. SPEAKER: The original Question was that I do now leave the Chair.

(10.26.) MR. WILLIAM LAWRENCE (Liverpool, Abercromby): Having voted in favour of this Motion on former occasions, I am glad the Government have accepted the Resolution that has been placed before the House. I, therefore, see nothing worth while fighting about. As the manager of a country school, I have to say that I have found no difficulty in allowing opposing Parties to use the school and air their opinions as they think proper. The result of the arrangement has been most beneficial to the village and to the district with which I am connected. It seems to me to be unreasonable to force the Government upon short notice to add the important measures already in their programme by including a Bill embodying the Resolution now before the House. I, for one, shall be heartily glad to support him.

(10.28.) SIR E. BIRKBECK (Norfolk, N.): I have to thank the Government, on behalf of the Eastern Counties, for what they have done in regard to the Resolution of the hon. Member. But is it to be understood that the Government, in adopting it, are to introduce a Bill embodying it, and so to set aside the Small Holdings Bill and other measures that they have undertaken?

SIR WILLIAM HAROURT: The hon. Member has raised the question, I can save some time, saying that the Government were edged to an Educational Rating Bill of their own, and I should like to know whether the First Lord will insert a clause giving practical effect to this Resolution? No other business would thus be set aside; on the contrary, the Government would be making this Resolution and its fulfilment part of their own business.

SIR E. BIRKBECK: The right hon. Gentleman is entirely mistaken if he imagines that I and my hon. Friends are going to allow a Bill like the Small Holdings Bill to be put aside in favour of such a measure as this. We intend to stick firmly to our guns upon this subject. I ask hon. Members opposite to quote some precedent in support of the action which the supporters of the Resolution have taken.

(10.30.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: A number of appeals have been made to Her Majesty's Government from several quarters of the House, and this circumstance will, perhaps, serve as my excuse for asking permission for again interfering in the discussion. Unfortunately the speech which I delivered an hour-and-a-half ago was heard by a comparatively thin House, and I think few hon. Members now present are really aware of the original cause of the present dispute. I expressed my hope on the part of the Government that the Resolution and the Debate which had taken place might have an effect upon every

manager of a school throughout the United Kingdom, and induce him to allow the school to be used for every legitimate purpose. And I pointed out that when the Bill, that I thought was going to be introduced by the hon. Gentleman opposite, was brought forward we should have to deal with a considerable number of difficulties which I then enumerated—difficulties partly depending upon such subjects as the necessity for forbidding secularist meetings in schools, partly depending upon the necessity for dealing with the danger of damage to the schools by those who used them for public meetings or other gatherings, and partly depending upon the difficulty in Ireland of dealing with schools under the National Board, which receive larger contributions than schools in England, and partly depending upon the difficulty of dealing with schools under the management of the nuns in Ireland. And I pointed out in the most friendly spirit the difficulties that the hon. Gentleman would have to encounter in introducing his Bill. These remarks of mine gave rise to a discussion, and in the course of this discussion hon. Gentlemen opposite appear to be under the impression—honestly and fairly formed, I am sure—that my right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Council had made a promise to bring in a Bill. My right hon. Friend is not conscious of having made any such promise at all. However, I now understand for the first time that it is supposed that it is the Government that are going to bring in the Bill, and that it is not the hon. Gentleman opposite who is going to have the well-deserved credit of drafting the measure. Now, I wish simply to say that the only objection which the Government have to deal with the extraordinary difficulties of this question is the difficulty of time. We are now engaged—if I may venture to enumerate them to the House without breach of Order—we are now engaged upon a very critical Irish Education Bill, a Bill for Distributing the Grant in Scotland, a Small Holdings Bill, an Irish Local Government Bill, and upon a Bill for regulating the procedure of Private Bill Legislation, and some other measures of really first-rate importance —and all I have mentioned are in addition to Supply. Now, everybody knows that the Government have nominally command of a certain portion of the time of the House. But, as a matter of fact, no Government that ever existed has been able to carry more than a certain percentage even of the important measures introduced in any Session. It appears to me, therefore, with all respect to the hon. Gentleman, that probably there might be a better chance for his Resolution being embodied in an operative Bill if it were brought in by a private Member than if it were brought in by the Government at the end of a list of measures, none of which could be dropped for the purpose of bringing in a Bill dealing with this question, and this question alone. Everybody will admit that. Now, I understand that a proposal has come, not from an hon. Friend of my own behind me, but from an hon. Gentleman opposite—a right hon. Gentleman opposite—that we should graft upon the Education Rating Bill some provisions dealing with this question. Now, I certainly have gathered, from a faint but significant indication coming from the hon. Gentleman, that the Education Rating Bill was a Bill that was going to be violently opposed. Well, it seems—what shall I say?—most grotesque for the Government to appeal to a Bill hon. Gentlemen oppose objected to, a measure which they desire to accept; because it would compel them, in order to get what they wanted, to swallow what they did not want. Now, I distinctly and authoritatively understand from what has fallen from hon. Gentlemen opposite that they are prepared to accept the Rating of Schools Bill if we are able to add to it a measure dealing with this particular question. Now that I understand that, I will endeavour, with my right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board, and my right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Council, conjointly to frame a Bill which shall carry into effect these two objects; which I understand now to be desired equally by both sides of the House, namely, the relief, to a certain extent, of voluntary schools from rating, and the opening of voluntary schools

all legitimate public meetings and all the legitimate purposes contemplated by the hon. Gentlemen opposite. I understand that I am perfectly satisfied for the purpose of finishing the evening with great harmony, to endeavour to frame a Bill which shall, on these lines, meet the desires of everybody in the House.

(10.35.) SIR W. HARCOURT: With the same desire as the right hon. Gentleman, I ask the indulgence of the House for a very few minutes to just refer to an extremely ingenious proposal. Without desiring to introduce any controversial matter at all, I shall only say that this unfortunate cloud which has risen in the serene sky was mainly due to the interference of Jupiter himself, because so long as a lesser light led the night, and the Vice President of the Council had addressed the House, we were all agreed, and we were perfectly satisfied with the course the Government had taken. It is not until the First Lord of the Treasury made a speech of a highly sceptical character with reference to the Bill, pointing out the difficulties and almost the impossibility, with a certain gusto on his part, with which my hon. Friend who moved the Resolution would be met, that we began—I may use a vulgar phrase—to smell a rat, and understand exactly the game the Government were playing. They ought they could accept the Resolution and then leave my hon. Friend a Member for Saffron Walden in a position in which they knew very well nothing would come from it. Nobody knows this House can suppose seriously that my hon. Friend the Member for Saffron Walden, would give the smallest chance of passing a private Bill on that subject. Well, then for the first time after the speech of the First Lord of the Treasury we saw that the Government meant to have as little to do with it as possible; and that is the reason my hon. Friend the Member for Saffron Walden desires to have an expression of opinion on the part of the House that the Government ought take it in hand. Well, the Government have declared their desire to carry this Resolution, and, therefore, we are assured that they have no objection principle in carrying it out. The only question with them is the question of time. Very well, so far we are all agreed. Then, coming to the Education Rating Bill of the Government, if the First Lord of the Treasury thinks we are going to enter into a bargain with reference to the remaining clauses of the Bill, he is entirely mistaken—if he thinks we are going to be gambled out of it, and that he will remove all objections with regard to the other clauses of the Bill by introducing a clause with which both sides of the House agree. He has no right to ask from us as a consideration for introducing a clause with which he agrees that we shall support a clause to which we are opposed. If it were true that one side was agreed upon one and opposed to the other and vice versa, there might be some sense in that; but where it is a clause with which both sides of the House agree, it is only reasonable to ask the Government, having possession of the time of the House, that it should introduce into the Bill a clause with which we are assured both sides of the House will concur. Now, upon that basis we can perfectly agree. I am sure the right hon. Gentleman was only indulging in a pleasant irony when he attempted to impose upon us the condition of not opposing the other clauses of his Bill if he should introduce this clause into his Bill. If we can understand now that he will introduce a clause into it that should express the general feeling of the House on the subject, I think the House would be satisfied.

*(10.42.) VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Lancashire, N.E., Darwen): I beg to propose the Amendment placed on the Paper by the hon. Member for Wigan, that the words in "rural districts" be inserted after the word "that" in line 5. As the Resolution now stands it begins by reciting that there is a want of room in rural districts. That would seem to imply that any alteration in the law which is proposed would apply to rural districts and rural districts only, but that is not so, as it appears in the Resolution as it stands. I am sure the hon. Member for Saffron Walden would agree that it is not so if his attention were called to it. I object, for my own part, to the manager of a school throughout the United Kingdom, and induce him to allow the school to be used for every legitimate purpose. And I pointed out that when the Bill, that I thought was going to be introduced by the hon. Gentleman opposite, was brought forward we should have to deal with a considerable number of difficulties which I then enumerated—difficulties partly depending upon such subjects as the necessity for forbidding secularist meetings in schools, partly depending upon the necessity for dealing with the danger of damage to the schools by those who used them for public meetings or other gatherings, and partly depending upon the difficulty in Ireland of dealing with schools under the National Board, which receive larger contributions than schools in England, and partly depending upon the difficulty of dealing with schools under the management of the nuns in Ireland. (10.35.) SIR W. HARROD: With the same desire as the right hon. Gentleman, I ask the indulgence of the House for a very few minutes to just refer to his extremely ingenious proposal. Without desiring to introduce any controversial matter at all, I shall only say that this unfortunate cloud which has arisen in the serene sky was mainly due to the interference of Jupiter himself, because so long as a lesser light ruled the night, and the Vice President of the Council had addressed the House, we were all agreed, and we were perfectly satisfied with the course the Government had taken. *(10.42.) VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Lancashire, N.E., Darwen): I beg to propose the Amendment placed on the Paper by the hon. Member for Wigan, that the words in "rural districts" be inserted after the word "that" in line 5. As the Resolution now stands it begins by reciting that there is a want of room in rural districts. That would seem to imply that any alteration in the law which is proposed would apply to rural districts and rural districts only, but that is not so, as it appears in the Resolution as it stands. I am sure the hon. Member for Saffron Walden would agree that it is not so if his attention were called to it. I object, for my own part, to the schools being thrown open universally, and for this very good reason, that the grievance only exists in the rural districts. For my own part, I know that in the last Election of 1886 I had the obligation thrown upon me to address several meetings in the open air, but it was balmy summer weather. In the winter, of course, it would be different. It is not often, however, in rural districts, that you have a numerous audience to listen to you. In these country districts perhaps a couple of hundred people gather round the chair where the speaker stands, and he has no difficulty in making his voice heard. The grievance does not, therefore, exist in the rural districts in the summer time, but in the winter time no doubt a difficulty does arise. In the towns a totally different state of circumstances at once appears, but there is no difficulty whatever in finding room. (Cries of "Oh!" and Yes!") I submit there is very little difficulty at all. I venture to say that in the town of Darwen, which is the principal town in the constituency which I have the honour to represent, no person would have a difficulty in finding room to address the electors. But, supposing there is a difficulty, I do not think there is any claim on the voluntary schools of the district; because there is a collection of rich ratepayers who have plenty of money to erect a suitable building if they want it. The difficulty, therefore, applies to rural districts, and to rural districts only, and, therefore, the words should be inserted in the Resolution.

MR. GARDNER: I believe this is an Amendment which we cannot accept. It is perfectly true that the words "in rural districts" as put in the Preamble of my Resolution might convey to the House that it was only intended that the Resolution should apply to rural districts. So far as I am concerned it was my intention that the operation of this Resolution should be confined to the rural districts in which, to my knowledge, there is a very pressing need; but when the Resolution has been accepted by the Government in a wider sense, and when they have decided that it should extend to the urban districts, I think it is a little hard of the noble Lord to move an Amendment which restricts it to the rural districts. For my part, I cannot accept the Amendment; and after the way in which the Resolution was accepted by them I cannot believe that Her Majesty's Government will accept the Amendment, as it would absolutely conflict with the intention they had in accepting the Resolution.

*(10.55.) MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.): I agree with what has fallen from my hon. Friend who has just sat down. It is on principle we claim this right; and that principle extends to the urban districts quite as much as to the rural districts. There can be no distinction. No doubt in towns there are larger opportunities for finding other places for meetings than in the country. But it is the principle we insist upon; and that principle, as I understand it, has been practically accepted by the Government. I was obliged to use the words "as I understand it," because it so happens that I was not present during the entire Debate; and how was I employed? I was employed in possibly the less important business of addressing a public meeting in a country, district not far from London, as may be inferred by my presence here; and the meeting was held in a large room belonging to a Board school, where we had one of the most comfortable and orderly and convenient meetings that I have ever attended; and I could not help thinking, when I enjoyed that opportunity of saying the best I could for Her Majesty's Government, what a comment my experience was upon the Motion of my hon. Friend behind me, because, if this had not been a Board school—if there had not been a School Board in this locality—perhaps we should have been compelled to hold our meeting in some fusty old room, where we should have suffered the greatest discomfort. I hope the Government will stand by the arrangement they have come to, and that they will not accept the modification the noble Lord has proposed.

(10.64.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I must congratulate the right hon. Gentleman upon the agreeable way in which he has spent the evening in addressing a meeting, and upon the admirable accommodation provided for him elsewhere; but I wish he had been here at an earlier part of the Debate, because he would have learned that the real reason of our discussing this question so much longer than anyone expected was this: we were all agreed as to this proposal in substance, but that it was rather difficult to carry it out in detail. That is really what occurred. My noble Friend behind me has moved an Amendment. No doubt he based his argument, and I think rightly, on the fact that there was more necessity for room in rural districts than in urban districts. At the same time, I am quite prepared to admit that there is a want of suitable accommodation in some urban districts, as has been pointed out by one hon. Gentleman, the hon. Member for St. Pancras, who has told us that in his division there really was not suitable accommodation. Therefore, I am decidedly of opinion that, while it is true that it is in rural districts chiefly that there is a necessity, that necessity is not confined to rural districts; and that we cannot introduce into this Resolution an Amendment confining it to the rural districts. That only illustrates the extraordinary difficulty of dealing with this question. I conceive, however, that if you give an unrestricted right to use the schools in urban districts, you will give the right not only to the politician, but to everyone who wishes to make profit, or trade, or anything else by discussion at a meeting to go to a schoolroom and hold it there, as the cheapest place of the kind to be had. The West End Socialists, and other gentlemen of very extravagant views which are commonly held, there can be no doubt, in the urban districts, will claim the use of the cheapest rooms. In urban districts no doubt the cheapest available rooms would be the schools, if they were placed by Parliament at the disposal of the people for nothing beyond the cost of the expense incurred, but that is probably a thing to which Parliament will not assent without limitation. It would be very difficult for the House to lay down as an absolute principle, to which no exception is to be made, that public schools sub-vented by the State, should be handed over to any persons who desired to hold a meeting, in face of the fact that their principle would apply to the convent schools in Ireland, which receive the largest subventions from the State. That being so, I would advise the right hon. Gentleman not to place his principle too highly. But, Sir, the object with which I rose was to recommend my noble Friend behind me (Viscount Cranborne) and others, who have put down Amendments, to withdraw them, on the distinct understanding that this Resolution is to be allowed to pass without any Amendment, because I believe that it is impossible within the scope of a Resolution to introduce all the safeguards which will be found absolutely necessary when the unfortunate draftsman begins to deal with the complicated problems which will have to be faced and dealt with before the principle of this Resolution can be embodied in an Act of Parliament. In the meanwhile, Sir, whilst it is distinctly understood that we accept this Resolution without addition or amendment, I would strongly recommend my Friends not to press their Amendments on the present occasion.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Sir, we ought most distinctly to understand what the precise position of the Government is in reference to this matter. They will not undertake to do what their own supporters have asked them to do, and what the Member for Norwich (Mr. S. Hoare), particularly pressed them to do, namely, deal with this in the Education (Rating) Bill. If that were done there would be no necessity for the Amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for Eccles (Mr. Roby) being pressed. But the unfortunate thing is that the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury in speech after speech has one sentence in favour of the Resolution and a dozen sentences against it, and it is that fact which accounts for all our difficulties. The right hon. Gentleman has insisted upon the enormous difficulties and has enlarged upon every point, and the almost impossibility of it, and a Resolution accepted in that spirit will certainly never be effective. If the Resolution had been accepted in the spirit manifested by the Vice President of the Council, it would have been a different thing. But while professing frankly to accept the Resolution, the Leader of the House has adopted a disparaging tone and raised every conceivable phantom against carrying it out. Everything he has said tonight is against the Resolution.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, not against the Resolution.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Well, at any rate, against the possibility of its being carried out. Sir, a man who does not believe in the possibility of a thing never carries it out. The only object of the addition moved by the Member for Eccles is to have some distinct understanding from the Government that they really mean to do what they can to ensure that this Resolution is carried out. The right hon. Gentleman has not told us whether the Government mean to insert clauses in the Education Rating Bill, and on that point we are entitled to assurances, because upon that we may come to terms. Why have we not had those assurances? Because everybody knows that the object of the Government is to delay, and ultimately to defeat, this Resolution. That will be thoroughly understood inside of this House and out of it. On our part we frankly understand the meaning and object of these manœuvres. But, Sir, even now if the Government will come frankly forward and say, "We will accept this Resolution, and will do our best to carry it out," this Debate ought to come, and would come, to an end.

*MR. RITCHIE: Sir, I do not think that the tone of the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman is altogether calculated to bring this discussion to a speedy or an amicable close. The right hon. Gentleman imputed to my hon. Friends beside and behind me a desire to delay and defeat this Resolution by moving Amendments. But, Sir, all these Amendments were on the Paper, whereas the friends of the right hon. Gentleman have got up at the last moment and moved Amendments which are not on the Paper.

MR. ROBY: I have not moved an Amendment; I have only given notice that I would move.

Sir William Harcourt

MR. RITCHIE: Well, I will substitute the words "proposes to move" for the word "move"; and I will say that the hon. Gentleman proposes to move a Resolution which is not on the Paper, and as to which we had not the smallest notion a couple of hours ago. And yet the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby brings against my hon. Friends behind me a charge of obstruction, although he has not addressed one single word of remonstrance to his hon. Friend behind him for moving an Amendment that is not on the Paper.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: The Amendment of my hon. Friend arose out of the speech of the Leader of the House. He could not have given notice of it.

MR. RITCHIE: There was nothing in the Resolution which imposed on any one the duty of carrying it out, and, therefore, the right hon. Gentleman the moment the Government accepted the Resolution, which is as much as is ever done in such cases, put up one of his supporters to move a new and most important Amendment, and that at the eleventh hour. What is the right hon. Gentleman's warrant for so unprecedented a proceeding? It is because my right hon. Friend, in accepting the Resolution, alluded to the many points of difficulty that would attend its enforcement. Would the right hon. Gentleman have wished that my right hon. Friend should have deceived the House by saying the matter was easy to deal with? It never was in the mind of my right hon. Friend not to do everything that could possibly be done to give effect to the Resolution. There was every intention on the part of the Government to give effect to it. There is another point. The Leader of the House, in answer to the appeals made to him from both sides, expressed the willingness of the Government to give effect to those appeals, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, though criticising the terms, expressed entire satisfaction with the conclusion, and everybody thought that there the matter would end.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Let us understand that. There was a condition annexed. Is that condition withdrawn? If so I am satisfied.

MR. RITCHIE: My right hon. Friend did not impose any condition at all. What he said was that originally there was a strong expression of opinion from the other side against the exemption from rating of elementary schools; that it was likely the Government Bill would lead to a great deal of discussion, and meet with much objection from the other side. He said—"If you appeal to us to give effect to the Resolution by inserting a clause in our Bill, you must expect that that Bill is going to be carried." That is all he said. He imposed no condition at all. He said that the Government had taken note of the suggestions that had been made; that they would endeavour to give effect to the proposals suggested, and would consider in what way the wishes of the House could be met; and that they would see whether it was possible to frame any clauses which could be inserted in the Bill dealing with the rating of schools. That is what I say now; that is what I fully understood was accepted by the Member for Derby, and accepted on the understanding that there would be no Amendments.

MR. ROBY: If I understand the right hon. Gentleman aright, the Government will endeavour to give effect to the Resolution by legislation during the present Session.

MR. RITCHIE: What I said was that the Government would endeavour to give effect to the suggestions made by Members on both sides of the House, and would frame some clauses which might be taken in conjunction with the Bill which they propose to introduce relating to the rating of elementary schools.

MR. ROBY: As I understand that what I desire will be done by means of a clause to be introduced in a Bill promoted by the Government, I am perfectly willing not to move my Amendment.

MR. J. G. TALBOT (Oxford University): I ventured earlier in the evening to suggest to my hon. Friend beside me what I wish now publicly to express, that it would be well if his Amendments were not pressed. In view of what the Government has said as to the clauses which they will introduce in their Rating Bill, I hope the Amendment will not be pressed.

MR. JOICEY (Durham, Chester-le Street): I am somewhat surprised at the turn this Debate has taken. I had the honour of hearing the very admirable speech of the Vice President of the Council, and I left the House on the understanding that this Resolution had been accepted in its entirety by the Government. So far as I now understand, the sympathy of the Government is with the noble Lord behind them who has moved an Amendment. There was no restriction or qualification whatever attaching to the acceptance of the Resolution by the First Lord of the Treasury.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If the hon. Gentleman thinks he is representing my views he is entirely mistaken. I said I thought the Resolution should apply to all schools with proper safeguards.

MR. JOICEY: The Government are now attempting to attach a condition (Cries of "No, no!"). Well, if I am in error I must admit it is owing to my not having heard the discussion.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE: In deference to the wishes of the Leader of the House, I ask leave to withdraw my Amendment.

Amendment to Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. F. S. POWELL (Wigan): I shall not proceed with my Amendment.

Question put, and agreed to.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Resolved, That, taking into consideration the scarcity of buildings suitable for holding public meetings in rural districts, and the desirability that the electors of the country should be enabled to hear both sides of questions affecting Imperial and local interests, this House is of opinion that the school rooms in schools in receipt of Parliamentary Grants, on such occasions as do not interfere with the educational purposes of the schools, and under the condition of payment of all reasonable expenses by the convener of the meeting, should be at the disposal of the inhabitants of the district in which the school is situated for the purpose of holding public meetings.

Supply,—Committee upon Monday next.

EDUCATION AND LOCAL TAXATION RELIEF (SCOTLAND).

LEAVE. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [25th February],

"That leave be given to bring in a Bill to make provision in regard to the Distribution and Application of sums from time to time paid to the Local Taxation (Scotland) Account, and in regard to the fee grant in Scotland."

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) : I should like to ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether it is not always the practice of the Government on Fridays to set up Supply a second time?

MR. SPEAKER : That entirely depends upon the Government and the time of night.

MR. T. M. HEALY : There are Government Bills of great importance on the Paper ; it is now 11.20 p.m. ; and as it is certainly an unusual course for Her Majesty's Ministers not to set up Supply again, I beg to move that this House do now adjourn.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : I have no desire to stand in the way of the discussion of the other Resolutions on the Paper. But what I proposed to do was to proceed with the Private Bill Procedure Bill.

MR. T. M. HEALY : Very well ; I am satisfied.

Order read, and discharged.

MOTION.

PRIVATE BILL PROCEDURE BILL.

MOTION FOR LEAVE.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.), in rising to present a Bill to amend the Procedure with respect to Private Bills in Scotland and Ireland, said : Sir, I will endeavour, in deference to a request made to me by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Stirling Burghs, to introduce in a very brief statement the proposals which Her Majesty's Government desire to make with regard to the reform of Private Bill Procedure in respect of Scotland and in respect of Ireland. This matter has to be looked at from two entirely different points of view. We have to look at it purely as it relates to suitors in those parts of the United Kingdom, and we have to look at it as a relief to the Members of this House who have to carry on a great deal of heavy and laborious work in connection with Private Bill legislation. Now, Sir, as regards the first point, I do not think it necessary to say much. There is a very generally expressed desire in Scotland—a genuine but not so generally expressed desire in Ireland—that the Private Bill legislation of these two countries should, at all events so far as a good many of these proceedings necessary to coming to a decision upon cases are concerned, be conducted not at Westminster and not before Committees of these Houses, but in Ireland or Scotland, before some other form of tribunal. That much will be admitted by the Scotch and the Irish Members, and I do not propose to waste time in discussing that point. There is, however, another point of view which is, in my mind, at least as important, and that is what I may describe as the national aspect of this problem. The labour thrown upon Members of this House by Private Bill Committees is such, with the greatly increased time required by our Debates, and the greatly increased interest shown by the public in those Debates, that it becomes a burden they are very little able to bear. Sir, very valuable and remarkable evidence was given by the right hon. Gentleman behind me, the Chairman of the Committee of Selection (Sir John Mowbray), with regard to the extreme difficulty of getting Members of this House to serve on Private Bill Committees, and upon the correlative fact that Committees of the House of Lords were preferred by suitors, not because the House of Lords is better, but because it has more leisure to attend to Committees, and is therefore able to give greater satisfaction to those who go before it. I think it is our bounden duty, as far as we can, to relieve Members of this House of the labour which is thus thrown upon them, and it is also our bounden duty to satisfy the feelings of suitors in Scotland and Ireland by diminishing the cost and relieving them of the necessity of coming in every case to Westminster to try and conduct the litigation in which they are interested. The Bill, therefore, attempts to remedy two evils which have long been felt. But this difficulty has always met those who attempted a remedy—namely, that if you remove the Private Bill legislation relating to Scotland and Ireland to a local tribunal, you will have the same class of cases decided in Scotland and in Ireland upon principles quite different from those obtaining at Westminster. It should also be borne in mind that, whilst the House should be relieved of its semi-judicial labour, it should not be relieved of the responsibility of deciding the principles that should regulate and govern Private Bill legislation in every part of the United Kingdom. Several proposals have been made for mitigating the case of suitors and relieving the labours of this House. One proposal was that all these matters should be tried, not first before a Committee of this House and then before a Committee of Lords, but that they should be tried before a single Committee partly composed of Peers and partly of Commoners. This was proposed with the view of saving half the expense and half the time; but, as was pointed out by the Committee, there was this great difficulty, this objection to the proposal—that the relief would be far less than the proposers of the plan imagined. Another suggestion is that the system of Provisional Orders carried out by the Board of Trade and the Local Government Board might be largely extended; but we must recollect that a Provisional Order saves trouble only when no Parliamentary opposition is expected. The passing of a Provisional Order is commenced by a local inquiry conducted by an officer delegated by the Department, and if the opposing parties in the locality are satisfied, then the matter passes the House of Commons sub silentio, and the House is not involved in the trouble of examination by Committee or the labour of arriving at a decision. But if the Bill is opposed after the Provisional Order is introduced, practically all the labour incident to an ordinary Private Bill is repeated in the case of a Provisional Order, and therefore no time, labour, or expense is saved by this process. There remains, then, the plan of a Special Commission in Ireland and in Scotland, if the Bill is intended to apply to either of those parts of the United Kingdom, by which the labour of a Private Bill Committee may be delegated to another and a paid tribunal. But it will be observed that almost every scheme hitherto proposed for utilizing a Special Commission of this kind labours under the defect that it either removes the whole of the Private Bill legislation submitted to the Commission from the control of Parliament, or else it so surrounds and hampers the decisions of the Commission with Parliamentary safeguards that practically suitors are as much inconvenienced and Parliament has as much labour thrown upon it as if the Commission had never been asked to intervene in the matter at all. One plan I ought to allude to very briefly has been suggested, the delegation of Parliamentary control altogether to the Commission, a plan which received a certain amount of sanction last year, yet which, in spite of the high authority supporting it, I cannot bring myself to recommend to the House. That plan is to delegate to a certain number of Members of this House the duty of sitting in Scotland or Ireland to assist paid Commissioners in dealing with these questions. It seems to me that plan raises most serious Constitutional issues, and is open to very grave objection from other points of view. Are you going to pay these Members or not? If you are, you will introduce a new and, I think, a very unwholesome precedent, and if you are not, how can you expect Members to absent themselves from their homes, and certainly from their business, for long periods of time, to carry on difficult and exhaustive inquiries in localities with which they are not connected? Again, is it right, is it in accordance with Parliamentary usage, that when a man is sent here by his constituents to discuss and vote upon various questions, we should send him away to take part in other business wholly unconnected with the Debates in this House, business which obviously would prevent him from doing his fair share of the work going on at Westminster, and bearing his proper share of the responsibility which attaches to decisions come to in this House upon questions submitted to it? For these reasons, as the House will readily conceive, on the whole, I do not think the Government ought to take on themselves the responsibility of proposing such a very novel and, as we think, such a very inexpedient measure. Well, the plan we propose, which I venture to propose with great diffidence to the House, for I am well aware of the difficulties which surround this question, turns and centres on the appointment of what I may call a Joint Standing Committee of both Houses of Parliament. This Joint Standing Committee is to consist of the Chairman of Ways and Means in the House of Commons, the Chairman of Committees in the House of Lords, and two Members appointed by each House in addition. The Committee, I may say, will have the right to sit for the purposes of this Bill, for which alone it is called into existence, even though the House may be prorogued—it may sit to carry on its business, if it so desire, at any time of the year. The first duty of this Joint Committee is to see that the promoters of any Bill prima facie relating to Scotland or Ireland have satisfied the Standing Orders of the House, or that the Standing Orders are suspended in reference to the measure they have introduced. The second point the Committee is to determine is whether the Bill is in the main a Scotch or an Irish Bill, or whether it is not. It will be observed that unless you give a decision on this question to a tribunal having what I may describe as an equitable jurisdiction you will be face to face with many difficulties. You may have a scheme which is in the main Scotch or Irish, but which overflows, as I may say, however little, into England and Wales, and affects those parts of the United Kingdom. If you lay down a hard-and-fast line on the subject, you will preclude such a Bill from reference to the Commission whose duties I will explain presently. I propose to give this Joint Committee a discretion in the matter, allowing it to decide without appeal whether in its opinion the measure is one mainly Scotch or Irish as the case may be. The third point this Joint Committee will have to determine is whether the Bill involves any principle upon which Parliament has not hitherto come to any decision. Notice that most of the Bills that come before us are of a kind upon which Parliament has over and over again expressed a general view and has frequently laid down the general lines upon which a Committee should decide. But now and then it happens—let us take the Channel Tunnel proposal, or electric lighting schemes; and there are others that might be cited—now and then it happens that some new invention or project comes to the front upon which Parliament has never settled what should be the principle of procedure to be adopted by a Private Bill Committee to which it delegates so much of its authority. If in the opinion of the Joint Committee the Bill is one that does involve a new principle, then, in that case, we propose that the present procedure should be maintained. It is only when a Bill belongs to a well-understood class, a class for which precedents and principles are laid down, that the Bill is to be relegated for decision to the Commission. I may notice that one advantage that will be gained by the institution of this Joint Committee is that it will have the assistance of that legal advice from experienced officials which now aids in the conduct of Private Bill legislation. I think nobody acquainted with the inner working of our legislative system will deny that this will be of great advantage to the system of Private Bill legislation for Scotland and Ireland. This, broadly speaking, is the principle of our Bill. The actual constitution of the Commission is a matter of less importance, and of less novelty. It will be sufficient to say that it appears to me we shall be very wrong if we do not utilise the existing Railway Commissioners, highly paid and competent officials, well acquainted with the work to be done, and who comprise among their number a Scotch Judge eminently qualified to assist in Scotch affairs, and an Irish Judge to assist in Irish affairs. But in addition to the Railway Commission thus constituted of Judges and Railway Commissioners there should be, I think, an Assistant Commissioner to deal with Scotch matters, and an Assistant Commissioner to deal with

Irish matters. I believe that would be sufficient for all the work of the Commission, but there is power given in the Bill for the Speakers of both Houses of Parliament to appoint additional Commissioners should the Joint Committee represent to them that the number of Bills referred to the Commission is in excess of what the Commissioners are able to deal with. It will be observed that if our plan is carried into effect, the stages of Bills will practically be : The stage before the Joint Committee—at which, of course, counsel will not appear—when the Committee will decide whether the Bill is within the Standing Orders, whether it involve any new principle, on which Parliament has not hitherto given any decision, and whether the Bill be mainly Scotch or Irish ; the Bill will then be referred to the Commission; it will be read a first and second time in the two Houses without debate ; it will be referred back by the Commission to the Joint Committee, who will be able to suggest formal Amendments to the Commission, the convenience of which all acquainted with Private Bill legislation will understand. The Bill will then come before the House for Third Reading, when it may be debated, may be rejected, or may be referred back to the Commission with instructions to carry out any Amendment which may be decided upon by the House. I hope, and I believe, that the Bill which I have thus briefly expounded to the House, though novel in some of its principles, really carries out many of the objects which have been aimed at by gentlemen who have previously endeavoured to frame schemes of this kind. I think it will retain the control of the Imperial Parliament, not only over the general principles of Private Bill legislation, but also over the details of any Bill on which Parliament desires to express its mind, and while carrying out these objects will enable local inquiries to be made in Scotland or in Ireland, as the case may be, and I think it will considerably diminish the cost of litigation. I believe it will satisfy the demand, the most legitimate demand, over and over again brought before this House by inhabitants of Scotland and Ireland, who have long protested against a system which drags them up to Westminster to deal with affairs which are, in the main, matters of detail, which can be better entered upon by inquiry on the spot.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Procedure with respect to Private Bills in Scotland and Ireland."—(Mr. A. J. Balfour.)

*(11.43.) MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.) : This is a question to which the salutary rule recently laid down by the Chairman of Ways and Means may well be applied—namely, that we should refrain from expressing a strong opinion upon a measure until we have actually seen it in print, for it is obvious that its provisions are of a somewhat complicated nature. But I may say at once of it that it seems to have been much better thought out and to be a better contrived measure than that introduced last year, and the fact of the scope of the measure having been so greatly changed justifies the opposition offered last year. At the same time, I confess that there will be considerable opposition to some parts of the measure, and upon like grounds. The right hon Gentleman bases his scheme to a considerable extent on the supposition that Members of this House are over-worked and need relief. I am quite aware of the strong evidence given on this subject by the right hon Gentleman the Member for Oxford University (Sir J. Mowbray), but I have heard other Members of the Committee of Selection decline to bear out that opinion, and for my part I do not believe that a case has been made out to show that Committees cannot be adequately manned for the purpose of dealing with Private Bills. There are many of us who maintain that Railway Bills and other Private Bills are, after all, Bills affecting public interests, and ought to be dealt with by those who are distinctly representative of, and responsible to, public opinion ; and unless a clear case were made out of the absolute impossibility—and this is the hypothesis the right hon Gentleman proceeds upon—of finding among Members of the House of Commons sufficient time and capacity to do this work ; unless a reasonable case were made out, I should be strongly opposed to handing over these inquiries in any degree to paid Commissioners or Judges, Railway Commissioners or others. We discussed these matters often last year, and it was often pointed out that the business which makes up the total of our Private Bill legislation consists broadly of two parts, and by far the largest part is that originated by Local Bodies, for the acquisition of gas works, water works, and so on—local legislation required by Municipal or other Local Authorities. I conceive that this part of the business could be largely dealt with by an improved system of Provisional Orders, and by increasing the powers of Local Authorities. But when we come to Bills promoted by great Railway Companies the position is somewhat different. They maintain there would be no saving of expense by local inquiry, and they are the best judges, for they pay the expense. At the same time, I quite recognise the fact that in Scotland there is a strong desire that inquiry should be local, and I am quite willing that it should be local, especially if litigants have no good reason to show why the case should be brought up here. But inquiry, local or not, ought, in the opinion of a good many of us, still to remain in the hands of the representatives of public opinion, and should not be placed in the hands of Judges or paid Commissioners. The right hon. Gentleman did not explain all the provisions of his Bill, and we shall be curious to know who these Assistant Commissioners are to be, and with whom is their nomination, whether they are to be paid—[Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes]—where they are to sit, and if an office is to be established. Last year considerable objection was taken to the Government proposal, because it involved the establishment of a new Board in Edinburgh, and I am curious to know if there is any proposal of the kind now. When we consider that the number of disputed Private Bills coming from Scotland average six or seven in the year—I think I am stating an extreme number—and that since last year the two principal belligerent Railway Companies in Scotland—the Caledonian and the North British—have come to an agreement that they will not oppose each other, or encroach on each other's territory, I would ask, Where is the work of the Commissioners in Scotland to come from if their appointment is to be of a more or less permanent character? That is the great difficulty in the way of establishing any local tribunal, or fixed paid tribunal, for Scotland and Ireland alone. The right hon. Gentleman has not explained why the principle of his measure should not apply to England. If it is a good thing in itself I can conceive that the proper course would be, if you quite believe that you cannot get members to undertake the duty and discharge it efficiently, to have a highly paid and responsible tribunal to do the work for the three countries. You would then have work enough to do for the best class of men. But speaking without knowledge of the particulars of the scheme, and unable therefore to speak confidently, I confess I have no great hope of the results that will flow from establishing this half-and-half tribunal for the purpose of accomplishing the really small amount of work arising in Scotland and Ireland.

(11.50.) MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I listened with attention to the First Lord of the Treasury, though I am not able to agree with him. It is his view, I suppose, that the Government must do something to remove grievances, so far as our country is concerned, but I am bound to say I listened to the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman with a feeling of deep sadness. I want to know why he cannot let the thing alone if he cannot give us what we want? Why give that which does no good to anybody, and which nobody wants. So far as I am concerned, though I have no great love for the procedure in this House—if I was a promoter of a Bill I would rather come here ten times than go once before such an unfortunate tribunal as the right hon. Gentleman proposes to set up. I say nothing for Scotland except for the sake of symmetry. I do not know why this should apply to Scotland as well as Ireland, but I am not prepared to say whether it would be good for Scotland or not. As the Labourers eland) Act originally appeared in 1883 it contained powers to take and compulsorily, and the decision was left to the House, with considerable expense to petitioners. We got the Government with enormous difficulty, or it was thought almost an invasion of the sacred privileges of Parliament, to allow the Privy Council to do the business by Commission. A more unfit tribunal than the Irish Privy Council here could not be, all nominees of the party delighted to have the chance of knocking down any scheme a Board of Guardians may propose. Now, what is this proposal? First and foremost, what does it save? Nothing is saved. All the House fees have to be paid. Promoters have to come now with pockets loaded with gold for these fees. Then they have to run the gauntlet of the Standing Orders to the satisfaction of the Examiners. I hear praises given to the officials who have the conduct of Private Bill procedure, but I say a more inelastic set of gentlemen it would be difficult to find; they are bound by rules like the laws of the Medes and Persians, to the very letter of which they attach a sacred character. Plus these, the promoters will have to face a body like the Railway Commission, with Sub-Commissioners added by the Government of the day. There will be all the expenses of the First Reading; the Second and Committee stages are saved, and then the Bill goes through the House of Lords. Now, take the case of the Bill we had before us to-day dealing with the Belfast Lunatic Asylum. This would go before Judges and officials entirely out of sympathy with our point of view, and where our point of view would have no influence. But in the House we have a free arena for debate, and we can here prevent some mischief being done, though we may not be able to do much effective work. The right hon. Gentleman, with his usual cynicism, says he has brought forward this Bill to save the extremely heavy labours of Members of Committees. Now I have been in the House for twelve years, and I have never been asked to serve on a Private Bill Committee. I was present when the Chairman of the Committee of Selection gave evidence, in which he said promoters were all anxious to have their Bills taken somewhere about Derby Day. Those who had evidence to give wished to be in town about that time, and so there was a glut of Committee business about that time. I cannot think that Members who do not take a very active part in our proceedings here would not be glad to discharge some function attaching to their position. Is not a Committee of this House a far better tribunal than the tribunal the right hon. Gentleman proposes? Members of this House are men of flesh and blood in touch with public opinion; but when you have a tribunal of officials, you have views and ideas entirely different from those you will find in the House. I say the right hon. Gentleman is trying to solve a problem insoluble except in one direction—namely, Home Rule—and in that alone. Unless you set up in Edinburgh and Dublin competent authorities racy of the soil to exercise their judgment upon these matters, men in whom the people have confidence, and whom they meet with in daily life, you will do no good. We want to deal with men of flesh and blood in whom we have confidence. These are the views we entertain, and we think the Bill unfortunate. It has no chance of passing; there is no demand for it. I am almost sure Scotland has no desire for it. The right hon. Gentleman who has just spoken expressed no desire for it; it suits nobody. The First Lord of the Treasury has had the opportunity of putting his proposal before the country before the date of the Dissolution, and I am glad he has had that opportunity. He has devoted himself to it in a painstaking manner, and nobody doubts his hard official work, though he has done the Irish people all the mischief he could during his tenure of office. Well, he has had the opportunity, and he has brought forward a Bill which satisfies nobody, not even himself. He does not think it so good as a Coercion Bill, but he thinks if it will do no good it will do no harm. But this will be worse than the present system, which is bad only in the sense that it is expensive and cumbrous; it is not bad in itself, and, therefore, I am opposed to this measure.

It being Midnight, the Debate stood adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, 29th February, 1892.

THE COLONIES AND THE MCKINLEY TARIFF.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, I wish to take this opportunity of putting to the noble Lord, the Secretary of State for the Colonies, a question of which I have given him private notice. My noble Friend stated last week, in answer to a question that was put from this side of the House, that the West Indian Legislatures had been considering what new taxation should be levied in order to make up for the loss of Revenue resulting from the arrangement come to with the United States in consequence of the McKinley Tariff Act. My Lords, I have no doubt that the answer of my noble Friend was accurate as regards the West Indian Colonies generally; but, since that answer was given, I have received communications from certain persons connected with the Colony of Jamaica, who complain of the statement then made as not doing justice to the actual financial position of the Colony. They inform me that, although the total loss of the Revenue, consequent upon the new arrangements, exceeds £30,000 a year, it has not been found necessary, nor is it intended, to levy any new taxation in consequence. I understand that, since that answer, to which I refer, was given, some further information has been received at the Colonial Office, and I should be glad to know whether, in consequence of that information, my noble Friend is inclined in any way to modify or add to the statement he lately made.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Lord KNUTSFORD): My Lords, the statement which I made on the former occasion was made purposely in very general terms so as to comprehend all the Colonies; and, speaking broadly, the statement was correct; for the Colonial Legislatures have, speaking generally, been considering the question of what taxation, if any, would be necessary in order to make up for the loss occasioned by their action to meet the views of the United States. It is true that, as regards Jamaica, the Governor, in his speech on the opening of the Legislative Council, stated, as his opinion, that it would not be necessary to raise any new taxation in Jamaica,—the Revenue being, as the noble Earl opposite has pointed out, in a very prosperous state,—and that, therefore, he did not propose to ask for fresh taxes. I have no official or other communication or intimation that this view has been adopted by the Legislative Council; but, at the same time, I have not the least doubt but that it will be. I may perhaps mention some other facts a little more in detail as regards the other Colonies, as this opportunity is now given me by the noble Earl. I may state that in British Guiana the Court is probably now considering Ways and Means. In Trinidad I have just approved of some votes imposing new taxation; but there are some proposed Stamp Acts which have not been settled by the Council so far as we know. In Barbadoes fresh Acts have been passed and have been sanctioned. In St. Vincent measures came before me after I had spoken on the former occasion, and I have now approved of those measures. In St. Lucia the questions are still under consideration; and so also in the Leeward Islands.

OF COUNTY COUNCILS.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

*THE BISHOP OF SALISBURY: My Lords, in venturing to put to Her Majesty's Government the question that stands in my name, I should like to ask, by the indulgence of the House, to be allowed to explain why it is that I do so. I do it in the interests of the County Councils themselves as much as of those who have asked for grants from them. My Lords, I recognise fully the difficulty in which these Councils have been placed, especially in the matter of technical education. They have perhaps been rather imperfectly instructed in their duties on this matter by the three Acts of Parliament passed in three recent years; they have had to formulate their principles and to work out their methods in practice as they went along; and, therefore, it was almost inevitable that there should be some little inequalities in their way of acting.

But, inasmuch as unfortunately,—I am afraid it is a matter of general knowledge,—elections to County Councils are conducted more or less on Party lines, it seems reasonable that the light of publicity should be brought to bear on their action, especially in the distribution of large sums of public money. I venture, my Lords, to ask whether it is not a matter of right, rather than of favour, that we should be explicitly informed on what principles and by what persons grants for technical education are either given or refused; and I beg, therefore, to ask Her Majesty's Government whether it is possible to require technical education Committees of the County Councils to publish minutes of their proceedings?

THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Viscount CRANBROOK): My Lords, in the absence of my noble Friend (Lord Henniker) I have been requested to answer this question, which would naturally have fallen to him. My Lords, the fact is that there is no power to require a Committee of the County Council to publish minutes; nor am I aware that there is any authority for their incurring expenditure for such a purpose. It may be the case that they could admit reporters; but everybody will see that there might be a good deal of difficulty in admitting reporters to consultations of Committees. And, after all, my Lords, the grants are not made by the Committees, but by the Councils themselves.

EVIDENCE IN CRIMINAL CASES BILL [H.L.]—(No. 4.)

Order of the Day for the Third Reading, read, and discharged.

SHORT TITLES BILL [H.L.]—(No. 12.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, the object of this Bill is simply to shorten the language of Acts of Parliament. Your Lordships are aware that of late years it has been the practice in every Act of Parliament to introduce a short title which by Statute is made the mode by which the Act can be cited; and that has been found in practice to be very convenient. But, unfortunately, that was not the practice in Parliamentary drafting until a comparatively short period since; the result of which is that all Acts of Parliament which have been passed before a particular date must now be cited by their long titles—and some of them are very long indeed. We popularly are in the habit of speaking of the Habeas Corpus Act, and the Statute of Fraud, and so forth, which is a convenient and popular mode of citing them; but, if you had to refer to either of those Acts in an Act of Parliament, you would require to have four or five, sometimes six, and, in one case that I have here, twelve lines as the title by which the particular Act is known. Under those circumstances, my Lords, it has been thought well to endeavour to grant to the references to former legislation the same procedure as the modern habit of Parliamentary drafting has introduced; and this Bill, which is called the Short Titles Bill, is simply for the purpose of rechristening the old Acts of Parliament with short titles, whereby they may be referred to in future when new legislation has to be applied to them. I am afraid your Lordships would not find much instruction or information by my reading through this Bill, or making any further observations upon it; because, after having explained its object, the only thing I could do would be to read the old titles of the old Acts of Parliament, and then to read the new titles that have been introduced for the purpose which I have indicated. I am afraid your Lordships would not consider that a profitable employment of your time, and therefore I will now simply move the Second Reading of the Bill.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2d."—(The Lord Chancellor.)

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2d (according to Order) and committed to a Committee of the Whole House Tomorrow.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.*LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL (GENERAL POWERS) BILL.*SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Second Reading be deferred to Monday next."

(3.10.) MR. BOULNOIS (Marylebone, E.): I desire to protest against the postponement of this Bill until Monday. It was ordered for this day, and appears "by Order" on the Orders of the Day. A number of Members have attended early in their places expecting the Bill would be taken, and now it is again put off for a week. I do not know how these arrangements are made, but I do think that Members ought to have notice of a postponement of this kind, and should not be left to find it out at the very last moment when they expect the Bill to be taken. I have no objection whatever to the postponement, but I do not think it should be left on the Orders as to be taken "by Order."

MR. KIMBER (Wandsworth): I believe it is still competent for an hon. Member to move the refection.

Second Reading deferred to Monday.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL (TRAMWAYS) BILL.*SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(3.11.) MR. J. STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton): In moving the Second Reading of this Bill I will briefly allude to its objects. It is for the purpose of continuing the tramway lines across Westminster Bridge and along the Embankment as far as the bridge of the South Eastern Railway, near Charing Cross Station, and the object is to connect the tramway systems on the south with the north side of the river. There has been, as I will shortly show, very considerable demand for this tramway. Last year a Bill for constructing the line was promoted by the Tramway Company, but it was rejected in the House on the Second Reading stage. The Bill now, somewhat differing from the Bill then, is promoted by the London County Council itself. It appears to the Council that the circumstances of the case make it more properly the Authority to construct the line, inasmuch as the bridge and the Embankment are under its particular care by Act of Parliament. For this and for other reasons it has seemed desirable that the London County Council should construct the line. There are two portions of the line, the one I have described and a very small portion uniting the new line with the other London Tramway Companies lines, which come very near to the terminus of the South London Company, but as to this small portion of the line it is hardly worth while my speaking. The clauses of the Bill are in one respect very different from the ordinary clauses of a Tramway Bill. It is proposed that the Council shall have power to work the tramway itself if necessary, and I may say that that clause has been introduced into the Bill because if the tramway were to be constructed and the Tramway Company were not to lease it from the Council the line would be useless and the expenditure on construction wasted. It is not desired, however, by the London County Council to work the line, and an agreement between the Council and the South London Tramway Company has so far advanced that there is hope that an arrangement may be arrived at satisfactory to all parties for the working of the line by the Tramway Company, and if this agreement is arrived at then the clause for the making of the line by the London County Council will not be pressed. Negotiations for this agreement have advanced a considerable length; they have reached this stage: that whereas the London County Council ask £1,350 a year rental for the line from the South London Company, the Company is willing to give £1,000. That is the difference at issue, that and the question of rates, and these points surely may very fairly be settled by the Committee upstairs. If we are so near an agreement as that, it is hardly worth our while contemplating it falling through now. There was a clause in the Bill last year which caused great opposition, limiting the hours of servants to ten each day. There were many Members who cordially agreed with the proposal, but objection was taken to it being introduced in a clause in an Act of Parliament. In the present case, the County Council are willing to make this a clause in the agreement with the Company subject to the approval of the proper Authorities. No doubt one of the points at issue before the Committee will be whether such a clause should be introduced or not into the agreement between the Council and the South London Tramway Company. That is a suitable point for decision upstairs, it will take its place in the consideration of the agreement. The line is not proposed to be carried further than Charing Cross Bridge. The Lambeth Vestry, within whose district a considerable portion of the line lies, have signified their assent to the Bill. Now there come in one or two objections that have been raised to the Bill and have been circulated among Members in papers which have reached my hands, and one of these documents emanates I believe, though it does not bear the statement on the face of it, from the District Railway Company. This document argues that this Company paid £200,000 for the privilege of passing under the Embankment, that it has stations at Westminster Bridge and also at Charing Cross, and that to run a tramway line along the Embankment is not fair to them. Upon this I beg to observe that the right to go under the Embankment was the right purchased, there was never a thought of a monopoly being conferred of a line of communication there, and the same objection, if it hold good, would equally apply to streets in almost any quarter of London, and I cannot for a moment think that the House will throw out the Bill on this ground. Then the same document objects to the London County Council embarking on a speculative undertaking involving risk of loss, the burden of which must fall on the ratepayers. Now, I have told the House how far the arrangement for working the line has gone, and it will be in the power of the House to estimate how far this is likely to throw speculative burdens on the ratepayers. But this is in no sense an extraordinary or novel undertaking. Local Authorities have laid down a very large proportion of the tramway lines in the country, and the London County Council are doing nothing speculative in this matter. Then there is a statement put forward that Westminster Bridge and the Embankment are thoroughfares peculiarly unsuitable for tramway lines. Now, Westminster Bridge is, as I am informed by engineers of the London County Council, one of the widest bridges crossing the Thames, and the Embankment is one of the widest drives in London, and if people are to travel by tramway this is just one of the lines to be taken. It is said it will destroy Victoria Embankment as a carriage drive; but this I cannot admit for a moment, seeing the width of the roadway, though, even if it did, let hon. Members observe the number of carriages driving along the Embankment for pleasure and compare the number with the crowds of working and middle class people passing by this route to and from the South of London. There is a very large number of people indeed, clerks, artisans, shop assistants, male and female, working men of all classes, compositors, and others, who live in the South of London, and whose employment brings them to Westminster Bridge to cross to the other side of the river. They have to make the journey in all weathers, in rain or snow or mud, and unfortunately these conditions predominate in London, and these unfortunate people have to go to office, shop, or warehouse, in wet clothes and wet feet, to their considerable discomfort and with risk of injury to their health. If the tramway were constructed over Westminster Bridge, to say nothing of going any further, it would bring these people right up to lines of omnibuses, and of course going on to Charing Cross would do still more, and the crossing the bridge would land the people where they could avail themselves of Westminster Bridge Station of the District Railway. These facts have been before the London County Council in a memorial signed by no less than 62,000 inhabitants and resident ratepayers in the South of London, and these are some of the reasons I lay before the House in favour of this undertaking. I have only one more matter to touch upon, and that is that in one of these opposing memorials which have been circulated among Members of the House it is stated that, the present Council being just about to quit office, it should not be allowed to commit its successor to this new departure. Well, the House has heard how very little of a new departure it is either in legislation or in the action of the London County Council itself, which has, as the House knows, resolved to take over a much more important piece of tramway than is now proposed to be made. But if the House throw out the Bill, if the Government should join with some of its supporters in the endeavour to throw out the Bill on the present occasion on the ground of objection I have just alluded to, then it will be a most extreme verification of what has been said on this side of the House—what has been predicted from this side of the House, not without full knowledge of the circumstances—that the deferring the County Council elections to March would have an exceedingly impeding effect on London legislation. If a Bill is not to pass because the Council is about to dissolve and its successor about to be elected, why then, for one whole year out of the three, will London progress and legislation for London and London people be absolutely arrested so far as the County Council is concerned. This question is of extreme importance to London people, and whatever points are at issue between the Council and the Company will be settled after the election by the chosen representatives of the people of London.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. J. Stuart.)

*(3.27.) SIR ALGERNON BORTHWICK (Kensington, S.): I was extremely sorry to hear the closing remarks of the hon. Gentleman, because I am certain that in my own opposition to the Bill I am not moved by any political motives, and I am positive that Her Majesty's Government had nothing on earth to do with any such motive in postponing the County Council elections. I am equally certain that in opposition to the Bill I shall find support from the other side of the House. I need not follow the hon. Gentleman into detail of the various clauses, because these may very properly be dealt with by the Committee should the Bill ever reach that stage, but I ask the House to throw out the Bill positively. In the first place, it comes before us in a very shifty, broken form, and in the very statement we have just heard we find how inconclusive the arrangements are for the working of the Bill, and in the very statement put before us by the London County Council itself we read—

"The arrangement is so far complete that it will probably be ready for submission to the Council when it reassembles after the election if the Bill be read a second time."

So we are to proceed on the hypothesis that if we pass the Bill, perhaps the London County Council may be able to entertain it after the new election. Then we ask if that is the case, seeing that the Bill was rejected only eight months ago, why are we troubled with the Bill again now; why not wait for the new Council to put it forward in a complete shape or a perfect form without taking any further steps? The hon. Gentleman has alluded to a certain amount of opposition from the Underground Railway Company, and that opposition appears to me perfectly natural. The Company paid £200,000 to the predecessors of the London County Council for the privilege of going under the Embankment, and, the Council having possessed themselves of this £200,000, now propose to run a line overground in opposition to the very persons from whom they derived this pecuniary benefit. But this is a matter which concerns the Railway Company, and is not the principal objection. The hon. Gentleman speaks of the Embankment as important as a means of traffic, and so it is of local traffic, but the hon. Gentleman will not tell me that the workmen, clerks, and others to whom he alludes have any business on the Embankment. They have no business, no work, no occupation there; they are not employed there. They travel long distances and they are dropped at various points. They do not all go to Lombard Street or to the City; they go to Regent Street and the City, and various places inside and outside the City, and, leaving the tramcars, are carried to their destination by the various lines of omnibuses which diverge in various directions in large numbers. I have counted six omnibuses in the minute passing my house, and excellent vehicles they are. I hope we shall have no comparison drawn to-day between these and "gilded chariots." They are excellent conveyances, and the ladies of London avail themselves of the omnibus service quite as much as do the working classes. The stream of omnibuses crosses the bridge and takes natural directions according to the requirements of the traffic right or left and carrying passengers long distances for a penny. But none of these omnibuses take the line of the Embankment. No, they follow the natural routes, and I maintain that it is fiction to say that if you had this tramway it would be of the slightest real use. It is intended only to land passengers at the foot of a gentle hill rising to Charing Cross; it does not go to the station even, but practically nowhere—among a lot of cabs, where the terminus will cause an enormous amount of obstruction. It would cause the greatest amount of obstruction, too, on Westminster Bridge, where the roadway is only 53 feet wide. If you take 16 feet from the centre of the roadway you leave a very narrow margin for the traffic, which even now is often brought to a standstill. But the fact is, this proposal is the outcome of a long-standing endeavour on the part of Tramway Companies to capture the West End. For their own purposes they wish to have lines running through the West End of London. I am quite aware that the tramway system is of great public convenience in some parts of London, where the thoroughfares are suited to them, but as Lord Palmerston said, "Dirt is only matter in the wrong place," so tramways become an intolerable nuisance when introduced into the unsuitable narrow thoroughfares of the West End. The traffic at many points is blocked beyond endurance now very often. We shall probably have to come to this House for powers to do something to relieve the congestion of traffic at Knightsbridge. Here and at such places as Hyde Park Corner, in spite of the admirable steering of the drivers of cabs and omnibuses, who with the utmost cleverness and forbearance avoid constant difficulties, there are blocks repeatedly; and if you introduce into the middle of such traffic fixed lines, you will effect the greatest amount of inconvenience and damage to the tradesmen in the West End, who find employment for those sempstresses and shop assistants to whom the hon. Member has referred, and if you ruin their trade you injure the very class on whose behalf the hon. Member urges this Bill. This I am on the question of tramways generally. For the last ten years attempts have been made to carry the tramway lines up such streets as Sloane Street, an impossible street for the purpose, and over and over again the project has been defeated. Now the attempt is made to get communication for the cars over Westminster Bridge, and I suppose in due time the attempt will be made to get up Parliament Street to connect with the northern branches of the lines. On these and other grounds I ask the House to reject the measure as one it is impossible to sanction.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Sir Algernon Berthwick.)

*(3.36.) MR. DIXON-HARTLAND (Middlesex, Uxbridge): My objection is that the real object is not stated in this Bill, that real object being to make a connection between the northern and southern tramway lines. If this is to be done, then let the proposition be made in an open, straightforward manner. There is no reason why the North and South Metropolitan Tramway System should not be connected, but let it be proposed in a Bill introduced for the purpose, and let us have some voice in the selection of the bridge over which the traffic is to go. The last bridge to select would be Westminster. It is inconvenient, and the bridge is unsuited for such traffic. I have seen the plans of the bridge, and have consulted engineers, who tell me the construction is unfitted for such traffic. The crown of the arches is elliptical and unfitted to bear the heavy traffic in the centre of the road. The bridge was built to accommodate lines of slow, heavy traffic on either side and the quicker traffic in the middle; but if the tramway takes 16 feet from the centre of the roadway it will be impossible to accommodate two streams of traffic on either side. The power is also proposed to be taken to close a portion of the bridge for a certain time pending construction of the line, but meantime what is to become of the traffic? The Embankment was constructed at a great expenditure of public money for a specific purpose, to relieve the traffic flowing east and west by the Strand then so often blocked. But if this tramway is sanctioned on the Embankment, the effect will be to drive traffic back again to the Strand, for it will be impossible to use the Embankment for carriages. Nothing owners and drivers of carriages dislike more than the twisting of their wheels by the tramway metals, and, equally with the public vehicles, carriages have a right to the use of the roads, for all pay rates. It is evident, also, that something more than horse cars is contemplated, for the Bill includes a clause for regulating the smoke from engines. Will that not prevent all other traffic? Will anyone care to drive along the Embankment passed by puffing engines every two minutes? With regard to the District Railway, undoubtedly it is right that the Company should have a voice in this matter. I was twitted last year with holding a brief for the District Railway Company, though I did nothing of the kind, as I have no connection with that line except as a passenger. But I think, if a public body gives £200,000 towards a public improvement, and directly that is made all the profit is to be taken away by competition promoted by the Local Authority, that is scarcely likely to encourage public bodies to assist municipal improvements in the future. Well, the Bill was thrown out last year by a decisive majority, and I hope the House will not stultify itself by accepting this proposal from a defunct County Council—a proposal which we do not know that the new Council will carry out. It may well be that the new Council may think it has quite enough in hand without entering upon other undertakings. I certainly think such a Bill as this should wait for the opinion of the new Council, and if the Bill is for the purpose of effecting a junction between the northern and southern tramway systems, this is not the bridge for the purpose, because the lines do not come up to the bridge on both sides of the river.

(3.43.) MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I have listened with attention to the two speeches made against this Bill, and I fear they are of the class we have long been accustomed to as used against anything like a development of popular traffic. I have failed to recognise one argument or reason against the passing of the Bill. I was astounded to hear the hon. Member for South Kensington (Sir Algernon Borthwick) argue that the other side of the bridge would not be more inconvenient as a terminus than the end of Villiers Street. You have a dense industrial population coming daily from Brixton, Peckham, and the southern suburbs to employment on the other side of the river, and crossing Westminster Bridge and turning northward many of these people will, by the line indicated in the Bill, be brought within reasonable distance of their place of employment. The hon. Gentleman who seconded the Amendment admits the desirability of connecting the northern and southern tramway systems, but where would he begin his operations for the purpose if not at Westminster Bridge?

MR. DIXON-HARTLAND: There is no tramway system with which to make a junction on the north side of Westminster Bridge.

MR. J. ROWLANDS: No; there is not, I admit that; but will the hon. Gentleman say that he would not equally oppose a plan to carry the northern system over Blackfriars Bridge by way of Farringdon Street? Would there not be exactly the same District Railway monopoly opposition as we meet with now? Am I to suppose the hon. Gentleman would be prepared to endorse a scheme of that kind for crossing Blackfriars Bridge?

MR. DIXON-HARTLAND: That is not the question before us now.

MR. J. ROWLANDS: Just now the hon. Member said there was no reason why the two systems should not be connected, but he objected that there is no connection on the northern side of the bridge, then I ask him would he oppose a plan where the connection could be made at Blackfriars, and he evades the answer. Of course we should meet with the same opposition. I thought I heard the whole of the opposition when I heard of the carriage wheels. We have heard of this skidding of carriage wheels many times. I admit, of course, the equal right of carriages to the use of the roadways, but I deny the right of the owners of carriages to exclude the public conveyances carrying thousands where the carriages carry units. With the argument on behalf of the railway monopoly I need not deal; it is not an argument against the Second

Reading of this Bill. The thoroughfare through which the proposed line will run is a wide one, the terminus is a useful one as landing passengers within easy walking distance of the Strand. I am not afraid of another argument which has not to-day been used, that it will spoil the Embankment. I desire to see the cars running along the Embankment, giving the industrial classes the benefit of a ride by the side of the river on a summer's evening for a penny, just as the industrial classes in Paris can ride along the Boulevard des Italiens. (Several hon. MEMBERS: No, no; that is not so.) Yes; I have done it myself—or I should say the Rue de Rivoli. (No, no.) At all events, I desire to see the industrial classes of London able to travel cheaply by the side of the Thames as the people in Paris do by the Seine. I hope that omnibuses may adopt the idea of going along the Embankment. I know of no reason why they should not. What reason is there for opposing this Bill? There is a dense industrial population dwelling at a considerable distance from their employment, and they have to take a public conveyance. But in bad weather they get wet through, having to cross the bridge on foot, and they have to continue their work during the day, and I, from experience, know what it is in wet clothes or with wet feet. I hope hon. Gentlemen will withdraw this opposition, for I can tell them there is only one opinion upon it outside. It may be bias on the part of the people, but it is regarded as class opposition from those who do not themselves need this means of conveyance.

(3.51.) MR. KIMBER (Wandsworth): I base my opposition on grounds quite other than those which have already been advanced, though I concur in what has been said by the Mover and Seconder of the Amendment. My main ground of objection is that this Bill is promoted by the London County Council. ("Hear, hear!") I expected that cheer, but I am not at all afraid to announce at the outset of my observations the ground upon which I make them. I hope to show the House before I have done, and in a few minutes, that this Bill is the thin end of the wedge for proposals which, if carried to their logical conclusion, will be of a colossal description, involving London in Socialistic experiments for extracting capital from the pockets of those ratepayers who have it and turning it into the pockets of those who have not—to be repaid Heaven knows when. Let me draw attention to Clause 27 in the Bill, which provides that if the Council carries on the undertaking at a loss, then this loss shall be borne by the ratepayers. Not without reason has this clause contemplating a deficiency been introduced. A few weeks ago we had announced to us from public platforms in London what is called the London programme of the Progressists—programmes are fashionable just now—and the programme has attracted some attention. One speech in particular attracted my attention. It was suggested by one speaker, Why should not tramways be taken up by Municipalities and worked even at a loss to the ratepayers in order to accommodate what are called the toiling thousands, although those who would be made to pay are probably as great or greater toilers than they. The votes of these thousands are what is aimed at. That is the principle of which this, I say, is the thin end of the wedge, the first communication in the House, and I ask the House to pause before sanctioning such a principle as that. At another meeting in my constituency, one of the largest divisions in London, this principle was boldly announced by a well-known Socialist representative of his friends on the London County Council, and I suppose, to give it an extra touch of satire, it was said under the portals of the Local Board of Works. Working men in attendance were strongly recommended to organise and to use their votes, first of all, for getting on to the vestry and Local Boards, then on to the Council, and then, by the help of their fellows, into Parliament. For what? To control contracts for labour in London, to organise that labour for the purpose of appointing their own foremen, of fixing their own rate of wages, called a fair rate, but anyhow fixed arbitrarily, by those taking the wages and managed by the exercise of the labour vote, to fix their own hours of labour, or, as it might more properly be called, of non-labour. (Cries of "Question!") I am strictly keeping to the question, for I am proceeding to show that the Bill is simply a first enunciation before Parliament for carrying into effect this doctrine laid down out-of-doors by the party promoting this Bill.

These are the principles underlying the proposals in the Bill. If the Bill passes authorising the construction of one tramway, the precedent will be set and the House will be asked, if one why not ten, if ten why not all tramways? But the programme is not confined to tramways: it is to extend to docks and other undertakings, and the organisation is to extend to the vast army of labourers in this great Metropolis. Having made the London County Council the largest employer of labour in the Metropolis, and presumably in the country, those who secure the employment will, of course, expect the gratitude of this vast army of labourers and their votes to secure Socialistic domination over the whole of society, and over those whom Socialists call the people living at their ease, but whose work in most instances extends over many more hours than the limit labourers fix. Therefore I oppose this Bill. This proposal was rejected last year. The principle has often been affirmed that the State should not compete with private enterprise. The principle on which this Bill turns is of a much further reaching character than any mere question of whether or not this little tramway should be made. By Clause 24 the County Council seeks running powers over the whole of the two largest tramways in London—the London Tramways Company and the South London Tramways Company—and to work over and use them on such terms and conditions as, failing agreement, shall be settled by arbitration. The Parliamentary agents who are supporting the Bill say that it is not intended by the Council to work the lines themselves, but to enter into an agreement with a Tramways Company. But I object to private agreements made by Committees of the London County Council behind the back of this House, and smuggled through by a Bill of this kind. The Council would, under that clause, require an army of labourers, inspectors, conductors, and paymasters, and if there were any loss on the working the ratepayers would have to meet the charge. Clause 26 is a very necessary one, if the principle of the Bill be sanctioned, for in it the Council asks for power to spend on capital account, whatever that may mean in County Council finance. But it is not to remain capital; the ratepayers are to repay it, as if it were a loan, in 60 years. Why should they not raise a million if they are to be the promoters and financial agents of this vast Metropolis, with power to drag, by compulsory powers, out of the pockets of the ratepayers enough money to create industrial undertakings of this kind, and carry them on in competition with private owners? If the County Council, which was to be the Supervisor of the working of tramways, is to be a tramway owner itself, what kind of impartiality will they exercise? If this line is to be made at all, it is well known to commercial men that not only could it be done without charging the ratepayers or taking power to charge them, but it could be done not only with security against any possible loss, but with a very large payment to be made to the ratepayers if the County Council would but act as commercial men do. The Tramway Companies would give a large sum of money to cross the bridge. They would keep the bridge in order, and pay a large sum to the ratepayers annually in aid of the rates. If the line is to be made at all, it should not be made by the County Council, but by somebody else under conditions in which the ratepayers would be indemnified against any loss. For this reason, in addition to those given by the Mover and Seconder of the Amendment, I join in their hope that the Bill will be thrown out.

(4.8.) MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin): I think it would be convenient to the House if we were to restrict the Debate to rather narrower limits than did the last speaker. There are some persons now soliciting votes who believe that the whole of the tramways should be taken by the County Council, and worked on a semi-philanthropic and socialistic principle, at a loss, for the benefit of the people of the Metropolis, in somewhat the same way as the Post Office is worked. Whether there be many or few of these persons remains to be seen. I suspect that the number who indulge in these dreams is few. What I would submit to the hon. Member is that the best way to resist foolish proposals is to be sensible ourselves. Let us look at this question in its real dimensions and see what it really means. It is the same proposal as that brought before the House last year and rejected, and it will probably be rejected now. Although it is proposed this year by the County Council and was proposed last year by the Tramways Company, it is practically the same thing. If the Council takes over tramway, it does so in accordance with what is now the law, which enables them to take over the various lines at different periods. The Bill also contains power for the County Council to come to terms so that it will not work the line, but the Tramway Company will do so. The terms between the County Council and the Company are matters which properly come under discussion in Committee upstairs, and they are points which we should enter into later. They should be examined by the Committee, if on consideration of the principle of the Bill you do not see fundamental objection to the construction of the tramway. What we have to consider here is whether there is any fundamental objection to the construction of the tramway. Let us examine that. the circumstances of convenience or convenience such that you will entertain the project of a tram being constructed over the bridge and a little way along the bankment, not further than Charing Cross Bridge—so as not to interfere with the traffic from East to West? If you such rooted objection to this tramway that you cannot allow the Bill to pass upstairs? I asked hon. Members to consider this last year. It is perfectly true that there are no tramways along the Boulevard des Italiennes or the Rue de Rivoli; but they are all along the Seine, along the Champs Elysées. Under the Empire they were stopped at Place de la Concorde, but when the Empire was abolished one of the things done was to run them again, they now run between the Louvre and the Seine, which is a very narrow place. They run right through Paris, and the other end of Versailles; and between North and South there is interrupted communication. The tramways run from north to south and from east to west. Can you, with that experience before you, say that you desire all the amenities of London if you allow this tramway to be brought over the bridge and along the Embankment as far as Charing Cross Bridge? If it is proposed to carry the line along the Strand or any other very busy place if course, be absurd. But when e a large space like this, I should end the House —though I am will adhere to us original Reso-—to send the Bill upstairs, so that ils may be examined.

5.) MR. KELLY (Camberwell, think, Sir, there is another we might take with regard to this d that is to adjourn this discus-a month. I will explain why I that. This is not only not the ill as that of last year, but it will used by the very persons who ed the Bill last year. I letter from the Chairman of ondon Tramways Company, in e says the Company would not,

ld not, consent to the conditions the County Council desire to and that the Company would,
, feel it to be their duty to the Bill in Committee. The Council desires to impose the n that the Company shall not, ny circumstances, employ a man an ten hours a day; but there are s, such as a great Bank Holiday, ey desire to run every car at the able moment to carry poor people night; and if they were placed that restriction it would be im-for them to carry on their in their own way, dealing as they ind it necessary with their own
s. Their employés, who receive 42s.
, are contented, and it has been quite impossible to get the great y of them into any union. We w trying to decide this question, n a week's time we may have a Council willing to make reasonrms with the Tramway Company, o lead to that which is of the st importance to thousands of workds and poor children who cross the every day, and whom the Tramcompany would carry across it it any further charge whatever.
bound to vote for the Second ng, because I believe that will between now and the sitting Committee which will enable ties to come to terms. The ay Company is willing to build ne or work it for the County il, paying interest to the ratepayers use. The hon. Member for the dge Division held out the Smoke to the House. The Bill provides that the line shall alone be worked by either animal or electric power, so I do not see where the hon.

Gentleman could get his smoke from. The line over the bridge would be a great convenience to persons driving to Waterloo, for the trams now stop in a narrow and dangerous spot, seriously affecting the traffic, and being a constant source of danger to those leaving and entering the trams. The Embankment is three or four times the breadth, and there would be little danger or trouble in entering or leaving the cars at that place. I regret that we must go to a Division, for I think it is absolutely useless to pass the Second Reading under the present circumstances, as the chairman's letter says the Company will not work the line under the conditions now insisted upon by the County Council. That Body takes power by this Bill to work the proposed line, but surely this is impossible.
The line must be worked by the Tramway Company, or it cannot be worked at all.
I appeal to the hon. Member for Hoxton to adjourn the Debate for a month, and then we shall have a chance of seeing whether the County Council will or will not come to terms with the Tramway Company, and if they will not, the House will be more than justified in throwing out the Bill.

*(4.23.) EARL COMPTON (York, W.R., Barnsley): I have no intention of making an electioneering speech, as we are simply discussing whether a certain Bill promoted by the County Council shall be read a second time or not. As regards the matters brought forward by hon. Gentlemen opposite. The smoke difficulty was removed by the last speaker, and the clause referred to is the Board of Trade Clause, which has to be inserted in all such Bills, and I am quite ready to leave that point to the right hon.
Gentleman opposite, who, I regret, was not here at the commencement of the discussion. We have been told that the traffic would be seriously impeded across Westminster Bridge. There are four lines of traffic over London Bridge, and they are regulated just as if tram lines were laid down, therefore I cannot see where the objection comes in. As to the laying of the lines, I think some statement should be made on behalf of the County Council, as they are not to be laid in the centre of the bridge, but one line on each side, leaving the centre for the general traffic. The roadway is 54 feet wide, and the two lines for the tramway would take up 14 feet, leaving a 40 feet roadway for the general traffic, which would be ample. We should consider the necessity there is for some tramway communication between the South of London and the rest of the Metropolis. As to the question of finance, it seems to be the impression that it would be a serious matter. The cost would be £10,000. What has been the offer of the Tramway Company? Their offer has been to pay £1,000 a year. Of course there would be expenses, wear and tear and keeping up the line, and they might be calculated at 25 to 30 per cent. at the very outside. There would be no question of loss to the ratepayers of any shape or kind. A great deal has been made of the point that the County Council should have left the question for a future Council to decide. For my own part, I look upon that view with extreme disfavour; I think that it is the duty of a Municipal Body to carry out its work to the last moment, and that it has no right to postpone to its successors a duty which it regards at the present moment as necessary. With regard to the question of spoiling the Embankment, I imagine that the Embankment was made for the use of the ratepayers of London, that it should be used for their convenience, and that it should be left to them to determine what use to make of it. The argument has been used that the tramway would be competing with the Underground Railway. But that argument would mean that we are to have no more tramways or omnibuses at all. As a matter of fact, what is wanted is competition, and why should we not have it? Some hon. Members opposite seem to hold that everything proposed by the London County Council must be wrong, and I must confess regret that Party opposition has resulted in Party fights in elections for the London County Council. The London County Council knows that the districts of South London, which would be affected by this Bill, are unanimous in favour of it, and we have only done our duty in bringing it forward. I should like to call the attention of the House to Clause 5, by which it is laid down explicitly that if the work is not done in three years the matter will lapse. Therefore it will be in the power of the new County Council to decide whether they will go on with it or not, and the term would come to an end during their tenure of office.

SIR A. BORTHWICK: The Underground Railway paid £200,000 for the privilege of going along the Embankment.

(4.40.) MR. E. BOULNOIS (Marlbone, E.): I wish to say a few words upon the subject, but I do not desire to go into the matter of competition as to which these tramways and omnibuses will be subjected. I wish to say a few words from the point of view taken by the minority of the Council against the course adopted by the Council of constructing tramways. The hon. Member for Shoreditch has stated that the County Council does not desire to work the tramways, but to enter into an arrangement with the Tramway Company by which the latter should work it. I do not believe that it would be possible for the present County Council to enter into such an agreement with Tramway Companies, because, as we all know, it insists upon such terms as to wages paid and the length of hours worked as that would be absolutely impossible for the Company to entertain such proposals and pay its way. The minority of the Council object very strongly to the Council working those tramways. I admit there is a large majority in favour of taking them over and leasing them, but there has been a distinct undertaking given that there should be no attempt made to work them. With regard to the estimated cost of this undertaking, since the question of the acquisition of tramways has been discussed in this House last year, the County Council has given notice to the Tramway Company to purchase a very small piece of line. That purchase has been carried out upon the estimate made by the valuer of the Council, and it is now rumoured that a claim six or seven times as large as the estimate made by the valuer has been sent in by the Tramway Company. I think, therefore, it is necessary to accept the noble Lord's statement as to cost with caution. What I ask the House to do is to give time. This is purely an experiment, and I think the House should pause before allowing such an undertaking to be pro-

y forced upon the successors of the nt County Council.

45.) MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Berston): The opposition to this comes from two classes of Mem—those who are actuated by an use hatred of the London County cil and all its acts, and those can afford to ride in carriages and and who disregard the wants of nasses, who must ride in omnibuses ramways or walk. The conditions h the London County Council desire npose upon the Tramway Company o my mind rational and wholesome. e conditions are that the Company ld pay their servants fair wages, and the hours of work should be limited m hours a day.

MR. KELLY: I wish to explain that s is no condition affecting the wages , paid. The servants of the Company , always been contented with the ss they received, and they have sed to join in the union.

MR. CREMER: The statement that dition as to wages was to be imposed been made by at least two hon. abers upon the other side of the se, and if such a condition is not ained in the Bill the hon. Mem- have been misleading the House. elieve that the poorer ratepayers London have made up their i that the control of the tram- should be in charge of the don County Council. Hundreds and ands of people living upon the r side of the Thames are most anxious vail themselves of the increased ties of locomotion which would be lied by this Bill, and I confidently that if the opponents of the Bill sed in defeating it they will regret action before long. Depend upon it the new County Council will insist harder conditions than the present xil seek to impose upon the Tram- Companies, and I believe it is quite leble that they will be supported in demand by a Liberal House of mons.

50.) MR. WEBSTER (St. Pan- E.): I think there can be no doubt the construction of a tramway on tminster Bridge would seriously fere with the traffic. There is, in no room on the bridge for a tram-. If there were any widespread re for a tramway along this route I should say that the best proof of it would be to see omnibuses running along the same route, for it may be taken for granted that where the public wish to go there the omnibuses will be found. But we find none along this route; along the Embankment you seldom see an omnibus, and I take it that that is the best proof that the route is not desired for the purpose. Why was the Embankment constructed? I take it that it was not built for the use of a few people who want to go to the South of the Thames from Charing Cross, but rather for the general benefit of the people. Besides, it cannot be said that it is for the benefit of the public generally; for there are but few shops in the neighbourhood of Charing Cross. The Embankment was constructed for the general benefit of the whole of London, and I, for one, must protest against its being applied to the use of any particular class. The Embankment was spoken of as a great boulevard, and hon. Gentlemen referred to Paris, but they will find that in Paris there is no line of tramway running over any bridge. In Paris there may be a line of tramway running along the side of a bridge, but there is none running over it. Hon. Gentlemen want to have a tram line running along the Embankment in order that there might be better communication established with North London in the most congested districts. If they want to have communication established from North to South London it certainly ought not to be over West-minster Bridge.

MR. CREMER: Might I interrupt the hon. Gentleman for a moment with reference to what he said about Paris? There are at least two tramway lines in Paris running across bridges.

MR. WEBSTER: Then I beg the hon. Gentleman's pardon. But referring to London, I wish to point out to the hon. Gentleman who sneered at the statement that carriage wheels were injured by tramway lines, that carriage wheels are injured, and so are cab wheels, and so are omnibus wheels, and so are light car's and dray's wheels injured, and so are fire engines' wheels injured. I venture to say that the tramway line there is not wanted, that it is not required, and that it will destroy the beauty and all the interest of that noble boulevard, the Thames Embankment. Hon. Gentlemen opposite may also wish to use the open spaces along the Embankment, which were made by the late Leader of the House. Hon. Gentlemen in their Communistic wishes may desire to have gasometers erected there. I am opposed to this Bill on principle, and, further, I am opposed to it because I say, as a London Member, that a tram line is not wanted on the Thames Embankment.

*MR. A. J. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside): It seems to me deplorable that the time of the House should be wasted with discussing a matter so small as this, a proposal relating to a tramway line which is promoted by the London County Council, and which does not extend to the length of three-fourths of a mile. Hon. Gentlemen opposite have spoken of this as a Socialistic movement, and as the introduction of the thin end of the wedge. I was very much surprised to hear this from the hon. Member for the Wandsworth Division, because I remember that this movement is only a small part of a scheme which was promoted in this House more than 20 years ago. It was not promoted by Socialists then; it was not denounced then as a Socialistic movement; it was promoted by the London Tramways Company. It was opposed by Mr. Beresford Hope, who sat on this side of the House, and he conjured up before the House all the horrors which have been referred to by the hon. Baronet the Member for the South Kensington Division, and spoke of trams being allowed to run down Piccadilly, and down the Strand, and going along and destroying the Thames Embankment. Really, this is a matter extending over a distance of under five furlongs.

An hon. MEMBER: Eight miles of running power.

MR. MUNDELLA: That is the running power that the London Tramways Company wanted to get at that time. But what we want is to get the control of the tramways. The Metropolitan Board of Works opposed them because they wanted entire control of the tramways; the Metropolitan Board of Works contemplated what I hope the London County Council contemplate—getting complete control, not to work them; but as the streets are the property of the citizens of London, they should be under the control of the Local Authorities of London. We do these things in the Provinces. She controls the tramways, so does Liverpool and many other large towns. We'll control of the tramways, because it may be necessary to change divert the line of a street and prove it, and it is right that Municipality should have complete control over it. I never heard such a comment as this on a Private Bill in House—that this Bill should not sent up in the usual course to a Committee upstairs because there was election coming on. It is the first that such an argument has advanced in this House. Just fancy saying "Oh! throw out the Notting Improvement Bill, or the Liver Improvement Bill; they will have an election in November, and then there will be a change in the views of constituency." Why these arguments are monstrous, and I think they hardly justify the waste of time the House put to in this matter. What are facts? There are 60,000 ratepayers South London praying the House make this small improvement. Right hon. Friend the Chairman of Ways and Means has made brief but very powerful and import speech in favour of sending it to Committee upstairs. Every argument that has been advanced against measure is an argument that ought to be addressed to a Committee upstairs. That is the proper tribunal to try. It is mischievous to the last degree that the House should take this matter in its own hands, and should refuse consider the wants of any Municipality, should further refuse to send the matter before the ordinary tribunal. As to the hon. Baronet the Member for South Kensington said about the mischief tramways, he has heard from the Chairman of Ways and Means what took place in Paris, and Brussels too.

(5.) SIR ALGERNON BORTHWICK: I wish to say that I oppose this Bill on behalf of the West End Ratepayers Association, who have successfully defeated a series of these measures introduced notably by the very persons whom the right hon. Gentleman alluded to. About ten years ago it was proposed to bring this very tramway across Westminster Bridge, up Victoria Street, and also up Sloane Square.

Mr. Webster

Mr. MUNDELLA: And who are the West End Ratepayers' Association? Let us ask the right hon. Baronet what right have the West End Ratepayers' Association to interfere with a proposal for bringing a tramway line from South London across Westminster Bridge, or to take up the time of the House in opposition to the 60,000 ratepayers who have petitioned in favour of the proposal? After all, it is a question to be decided by a Committee upstairs.

Mr. WEBSTER: I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman a question. (This of "Order, order!") I want to know whether the Petition was presented this year or not?

Mr. MUNDELLA: The real question is—shall this Bill be referred to a Committee upstairs? During the last 21 years that I have been in this House it has always been the custom to send Bills of this kind before a Committee upstairs. That is the proper way, and I hope this House will not stand in the way of an important improvement promoted by a Local Authority which the Government itself has set up. I trust we shall go at once to a Division.

(5.13.) SIR CHARLES C. FRASER (Lambeth, N.): I beg leave to trespass on the time of the House for a few moments. I shall stand closely to the question. I shall not wander to Paris, and I do not "come from Sheffield." I claim to have an intimate acquaintance with Westminster Bridge and its neighbourhood, and would give evidence as Member for North Lambeth, which I am proud to be, on which one end of the bridge rests. I would draw attention to a new feature in this Bill. Last year it was proposed to take the trams from Westminster Bridge Road over Westminster Bridge; this year it is proposed to take the Albert Embankment trams—which at present stop well short of the bridge and road—round St. Thomas's Hospital, so that both lines will converge on the bridge—to the detriment of trade and traffic. The noble Lord the Member for Banbury (Lord Compton) has pictured two gentle streams gliding smoothly side by side over the bridge under the guidance of the County Council. I doubt it, and would leave his leadership on the bridge and pass to the Westminster end of it, where the two lines of trams will have to turn sharply to the right on to the Victoria Embankment. At this point the flood of traffic from Victoria Street, Great George Street, Parliament Street, through Bridge Street, pour down and must cause great danger and difficulty. Every Member at the present time recognises that but for the attention of the police in Bridge Street we should all be killed every afternoon. I would not trespass on the time of the House; I would not speak of the County Council or of Socialists, of those who loll in gilded chariots, or of the working men who, full of health and life, trudge to their work like Englishmen, but I would ask the House to focus its interest on those who have not those advantages when they face the dangers of the streets, and ask it to stay the advance of the uncompromising tram-car.

THE ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE IN TRINIDAD.

MR. ALFRED PEASE (York): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether a Commission of Inquiry has been sanctioned by the Colonial Office to inquire into charges made against the First Puisne Judge, and into the administration of justice in the Islands of Trinidad; and, if so, whether he can state the nature of the charges preferred against the Chief Justice; and whether the cost of defence before such a Commission would be thrown individually on the Chief Justice and other persons; and, if so, in view of the great expense that must be incurred in any attempt to prove that the daily duties of an official have been faithfully discharged over a course of years, and that all his judgments have been reasonable, whether the cost of defence could be defrayed out of public funds instead of out of the private estates of the officials whose conduct will be under investigation, and to whom the payment of such costs must necessarily be extremely burdensome if not disastrous?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir JOHN GORST, Chatham): Perhaps the hon. Member will allow me to answer the question. The Secretary of State has decided on the appointment of a Committee to inquire into charges made against the First Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Trinidad and Tobago, and into the administration of justice in those Islands. Complaints have been made against the Chief Justice of receiving in Chambers irregular applications from, and giving advice to, intending litigants; of allowing persons to sue in forma pauperis without the evidence of poverty required by law of preventing mortgagees from realising their securities, and keeping the mortgaged property for long periods under the control of Receivers appointed by the Court; of making orders unsupported by any evidence; of using insulting and intemperate language, and intimidating parties, witnesses and juries, and of abuse of the power of the Court to punish for contempt of Court. Up to the Report of the Commission about to be appointed has been received and considered by Her Majesty's Government, opinion can be expressed on the question whether any expense which the Chief Justice, or any other persons whose conduct is impugned, may have incurred in defending themselves before the Commission should be recouped to them from the public funds of the Colony.

SCHOOL ACCOMMODATION AT ENFIELD.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether the number of existing school places in the parish of Enfield is now 4,371, and whether, in view of the facts that last year's Census showed a population in the parish of 31,532, and that on the Departmental basis of one-sixth of the population the number of school places required would be 5,255, he will state what steps the Department has taken, or proposes to take, to secure that this deficiency of 884 places be supplied without delay. The hon. Gentleman had also the following question on the Paper:—ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he is aware that the population of the district of Bush Hill Park, in the parish of Enfield, is now about 3,600; that in the district there is only one small infant school; that the London Road School, the nearest school for older scholars, is a mile and a quarter distant from Bush Hill Park; and that many of the children from Bush Hill Park have to cross a level crossing on the Great Eastern Railway in order to reach it; and whether he will take immediate steps to have suitable school provision made for this district!

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford) : As the hon. Member has two questions dealing with the same subject, it will be for the convenience of the House that I should answer them together. When the results of the Census were known, the Department became aware of a deficiency, though not to the extent assumed in the question ; but no pressure upon the existing supply was experienced until the Free Education Act came into operation. Since the calculation of the number of school places given by the hon. Member enlargements providing for more than 150 children have been sanctioned, and others are in preparation. A site for a new school in the Bush Hill Park district has been approved, and the plans will be submitted in the course of a few days. It is confidently expected that by the end of the summer the whole ground will be covered, and the Inspector reports that even now there is no difficulty in finding room for all the older children who are under the obligation to attend school.

DEATH RETURNS IN SCOTTISH POOR-HOUSES.

MR. HALLEY STEWART (Lincolnshire, Spalding) : I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether there is any official Return giving the number of deaths in the Poorhouses of Scotland ; and, if not, whether he will amend the form of the "Abstract of Poorhouse Returns," by requiring the Returns to be made in separate columns of the persons now accounted for as "Died or discharged" ?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Sir C. J. PARSON, Edinburgh and St. Andrews Universities) : I am informed that the Abstract to which the hon. Member refers gives the number of deaths in the sick wards in each poorhouse, but does not include those rare cases of sudden deaths which occur in the ordinary wards. The Board of Supervision are considering whether the Abstract can be conveniently amended so as to show the total number of deaths.

THE PROPOSED GALLERY OF BRITISH PICTURES.

SIR ALGERNON BORTHWICK (Kensington, S.) : On behalf of my hon. Friend the Member for Chelsea VOL. I. [NEW SERIES.]

(Mr. Whitmore), I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether he can state what progress has been made in the negotiations with Mr. Henry Tate for the erection of a gallery for British pictures ?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. D. R. PLUNKET, Dublin University) : I am still in correspondence upon this subject, and I must ask my hon. Friend to postpone his question for a week.

THE UNITED STATES AND BRITISH CONVICTS.

MR. GIBBS (London) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the attention of the Government has been called to an extract from a Report of a Commission sent by the Government of the United States to inquire into the subject of immigration into the United States, in which the following paragraph appears :—

"There is a systematic landing on the shores of the United States of the convicts of Great Britain, and from England, Ireland, and Scotland. During the last eleven years there has been a wide-spread and thoroughly organised movement, known, encouraged, and patronised by the Government of Great Britain, for the purpose of sending convicts and ex-convicts to the United States" ; and whether it is the intention of the Government to make a representation in regard to this statement ?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. J. W. LOWTHER, Cumberland, Penrith) : Her Majesty's Government have not received the Report referred to, but Sir J. Pauncefote has been requested to procure it and send it home as soon as it is published. A similar allegation was made in 1889 by a United States Select Committee on Foreign Immigration, and it was then pointed out to the United States Government that the statement was devoid of foundation.

POSTAGE OF VOTING CARDS.

MR. ERNEST SPENCER (West Bromwich) : I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is prepared to allow polling cards to pass at the halfpenny rate, with the voter's number on the register written thereon ?

MADRAS PRESIDENCY FAMINE STATISTICS.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether he can define the areas in the Madras Presidency in which distress and famine pressure prevail, and fix the dates since which remedial measures, such as relief works, kitchens, &c. have been opened; what are the dates on which scarcity was first apprehended, taking the dates on which restrictions in water supply were officially directed in the districts affected as the basis; what was the normal death-rate in the areas referred to in 1890, and what is the death-rate in the same areas since 1st July, 1891; and what scale of diet is doled out of relief kitchens?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. CURZON, Lincolnshire, Southport): Broadly speaking, the areas are those mentioned in the Official Telegrams, published every week in the newspapers since July. The affected districts are: Bellary, Kurnool, Salem, Chingleput, Nellore, Anantapur, Cuddapah, Coimbatore, North Arcot, South Arcot. In parts of Chingleput and of some other districts relief works were opened in July, and some little gratuitous relief was also given. In Bellary and the Deccan districts generally relief works began in November, and gratuitous relief began in the last week of December. The Secretary of State has received no Report as to the dates on which the supply of water for irrigation purposes may have been restricted. The last Return of deaths received is the monthly Return for August, which gives the following results per 1,000 as compared with the death-rate of 1890: Bellary, 49 as against 26; Salem, 23 against 25; Nellore, 26 against 16; Cuddapah, 40 against 24; Kurnool, 59 against 29; Chingleput, 34 against 24; Anantapur, 52 against 26; Coimbatore, 26 against 21; North Arcot, 29 against 22; South Arcot, 34 against 26. The scale of diet at the Relief Kitchen is settled upon the provisions of the Famine Code, which prescribe 22 oz. of grain to 28 drachms of condiments as the minimum for an adult. The minimum can be increased at the discretion of the Medical Officer attached to the Relief House.

THE NEW LETTER CARDS.

MR. GOURLEY (Sunderland): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he hopes to receive an additional surplus from the Post Office by the sale of the new letter cards, which are sold at ten for a shilling; if so, can he state the estimated amount?

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: The letter cards are costly to manufacture, and the Inland Revenue estimate that the difference between the manufacturer's charge and the price at which the cards are sold to the public is approximately only sufficient to cover the cost of distribution.

THE CROFTERS' ACT AND THE CROFTERS' COMMISSION.

MR. FRASER - MACKINTOSH (Inverness-shire): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether, by the Crofters' Act of 1886, Sections 21 and 25, the sole and final power of determining who is a crofter within the meaning of the Act lies with the Crofters' Commissioners; whether his attention has been directed to the case of "Stewarts v. Macleod," and particularly the remarks of Lord McLaren, decided in the Second Division of the Court of Session on 9th December, 1891, where the Court overruled the decision of the Crofters' Commissioners and of the Lord Ordinary; and whether steps will be taken, by legislation or otherwise, to prevent these matters, which have been declared by Act of Parliament not subject to appeal or review, being brought before the Courts of Law?

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: I understand the question to refer to a decision of the First Division of the Court on 8th December, 1891. It is not the case that the Court overruled a decision of the Crofters' Commission. The question arose in a bankruptcy proceeding, which originated in the Supreme Court, and which was founded upon a civil debt constituted by a previous Judgment of that Court. The sections quoted from the Crofters' Act do not debar the Supreme Court from determining whether a person is a crofter when that question arises in the exercise of its ordinary jurisdiction. It does not appear to me that any change in the law is called for.

DR. CLARK (Caithness) : Is the right hon. Gentleman not aware that it was the intention of Parliament to give full powers to the Crofters' Commission to determine those matters, so as to prevent them going further.

*SIR C. J. PEARSON : I cannot gather the intention of Parliament otherwise than from the words of the Act, and these are in accordance with the answer I have given.

SCOTCH MAIL CONTRACTS.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH : I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether, for the satisfaction of the great number of people interested, he will consent to publish the terms of the specifications for the new contracts for carriage of mails in the Western Highlands and Islands of Scotland ?

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON : These services will very shortly be advertised, and the forms of conditions of tender will be given to any persons who may apply for them.

THE PHILIPSTOWN EVICTIONS AND THE POLICE.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he will state by whose authority and for what purpose collectors engaged recently in receiving subscriptions for evicted tenants in the parish of Philipstown, King's County, were accompanied from house to house by the police ?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.) : The Constabulary Authorities report that they had reason to believe that attempts would be made to intimidate persons who were unwilling to subscribe to the collection being made. Two constables were accordingly detailed for duty, so that their services would be available if required.

CLERKS TO GUARDIANS AND TO MAGISTRATES.

MR. COLMAN (Norwich) : I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if he is aware that in many rural districts the same person is Clerk to the Local Board of Guardians and also Clerk to the Local Bench of Magistrates, and thus advises the Guardians as to the prosecution of defaulters under the Vaccination Acts, and subsequently advises the Magistrates as to the penalties and sentences to be inflicted on the same persons ; and whether he will issue instructions to Boards of Guardians that their clerks cannot hold the office of Magistrates' Clerk to any Bench having jurisdiction over persons ordered to be prosecuted by such Board ?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's) : There are no doubt cases where the Clerks to Guardians, who are solicitors, act also as Clerks to Justices. As regards the proceedings to which the question refers, it does not in any way devolve on the clerks to determine whether the prosecutions should be instituted by the Guardians, and it is for the Justices to determine whether the offence has been proved. The advice which the Clerk to the Justice can give as to the penalties which can be imposed in case of a conviction cannot be affected by the fact that he holds the office of Clerk to the Guardians. The two offices of Clerk to the Guardians and Clerk to the Justice are not, in my opinion, incompatible. I could not propose to make it unlawful that one person should hold the two offices.

THE VACCINATION COMMISSION.

MR. CHANNING : I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether, in view of the long time that the Royal Commission on Vaccination has sat, he will inquire whether there are any points upon which the Commission is prepared to furnish a preliminary Report, with special reference to the question of cumulative penalties ?

*MR. RITCHIE : I have communicated with the Commissioners, and I learn that the matter will receive their consideration.

MR. BALLANTINE (Coventry) : I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether the Government will introduce a Bill for the purpose of suspending prosecutions under the Vaccination Acts until the Report of the Royal Commission on Vaccination has been issued ?

*MR. RITCHIE : It is not my intention to introduce a Bill for the purpose of suspending prosecutions under the Vaccination Acts.

TELEGRAPHIC MONEY ORDERS.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he will consider the advisability of simplifying the system of telegraphic money orders, and the form of such orders; whether he can see his way to a reduction of the charge for such orders; and whether he will direct that the money shall be delivered at the residence of the person to whom the telegraph money order is payable, with a view to ensure speed, and to guard against mistake or fraud?

*SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: It is not thought that the system can at present be made more simple. It follows that of postal money orders. It will be extended on the 1st of March to all offices open both for money order and for telegraph business, and the instructions have been revised. A certain reduction of charge will then take place—namely, when one remitter sends more than one order at the same time to one recipient up to £50 only one telegram of advice will be required. It is not thought expedient to alter the rule by which the recipient must claim the money at the paying office, which affords the security against fraud. The limited experiment hitherto made has shown an increasing popularity and few complaints, the number of telegraphic money orders having reached 10,673 in the last quarter as compared with 7,409 in the corresponding quarter of last year.

THE SASINE OFFICE CLERKS.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he is prepared to make the statement, in regard to the clerks in the Sasine Office, Edinburgh, promised by his predecessor on 27th July, 1891?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. AKERS-DOUGLAS, Kent, St. Augustine's): I am not able to discover what particular information the hon. Member desires; but if he will formulate the questions he wishes to put, I will endeavour to answer them.

EAST INDIA COMPANY PENSIONERS.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): On behalf of my hon. Friend the Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy), I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India if pensioners of the late East India Company can have the option of commuting, like pensioners in the Regular Army?

MR. CURZON: Military pensioners of the late East India Company have the same privileges as to commuting as pensioners in the Regular Army.

THE "SANITARY RATE" IN THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BILL.

MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, with reference to the proposal in Clause 42 of the Local Government (Ireland) Bill to throw the whole sanitary rate, over and above a limit to be fixed by the Local Government Board, upon the tenant, notwithstanding existing contracts and Statutes to the contrary, he will lay upon the Table of the House a Return showing the rate now levied for sanitary purposes in each union and division in Ireland; and whether there is any precedent for the proposal to allow a Government Department to fix the incidence of a rate?

MR. JACKSON: I am not aware that there will be any difficulty in granting the Return indicated, if the hon. Member will move for it in the usual way. The subject-matter of the second paragraph is one that can more properly be discussed when the Local Government Bill is under the consideration of the House.

SCOTCH RAILWAY MONOPOLY.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he will ensure that the agreement between the Caledonian and North British Railways, by which almost the whole railway system of Scotland will be placed in the hands of a monopoly, and new and independent railway enterprise seriously checked, will be submitted to the judgment of the House?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir MICHAEL HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I have not seen the agreement to which the hon. Member refers. If it comes within the meaning of Section 22 of the Railway Clauses Act of 1863, the approval of the Railway Commissioners will be necessary before it comes into effect; but whether this is, or is not, the case is not for me to determine. I have no jurisdiction in the matter, and cannot ensure that it shall be brought before Parliament.

DUNDRELL LUNATIC ASYLUM.

MR. SEXTON: On behalf of my hon. Friend (Mr. T. M. Healy) I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if a vacancy has been allowed, since July, 1890, to exist in Dundrum Lunatic Asylum for the post of head attendant; whether a temporary appointment was made from outside the service; and is it intended to deprive experienced officers of the chance of promotion by making the temporary appointment permanent?

MR. JACKSON: The vacancy in Dundrum Lunatic Asylum referred to is temporarily filled in the manner stated in the question. When a permanent appointment is being made to the post, the qualifications of all the candidates will receive due consideration.

RAILWAY FREE TELEGRAMS.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the Postmaster General what number of telegraphic messages were transmitted by the State on account of the Railway Companies, and free of charge to them, during the years 1888, 1889, 1890, and 1891 respectively?

*SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: The numbers of telegrams sent free by the Post Office on account of the Railway Companies in the years 1888 to 1891 respectively are as follows:—1888, 1,033,433; 1889, 1,196,596; 1890, 1,406,398; 1891, 1,571,803. The above figures refer to the telegrams sent free on behalf of Railway Companies only, that being the information asked for. But it is right that I should state that several Canal Companies also possess the right to send free telegrams, and that some Railway Companies—notably the Irish Railway Companies—have the privilege of sending telegrams at a reduced rate.

STERN LIGHTS ON SEA-GOING VESSELS.

MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether, in view of the accidents caused by vessels being run down, he can have the regulations altered so as to make it compulsory for all British vessels to carry stern lights at sea as well as in the rivers?

*SIR MICHAEL HICKS BEACH: The proposal of the hon. Member was adopted by the Washington International Maritime Conference, and has subsequently been approved by the Board of Trade in the amended International Regulations for preventing collisions at sea, submitted to Foreign Governments for consideration. I hope, therefore, that it may be included in the revised regulations when these have received International acceptance.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton) had a notice on the Paper to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that John Charlton, of Lingdale, Yorkshire, labourer, aged 70, was sued for a debt of a little above £5, and that an order was obtained for payment of 5s. per week; that these payments were regularly made until more than £5 had been paid in reduction of the debt; that, being out of work in the latter part of last year, he was unable to keep up the weekly payments, and that a judgment summons for two instalments was taken out, returnable at Guisborough on 20th November, 1891; that on that day Charlton attended at Guisborough to plead his inability to pay, owing to the fact that he was out of work, and was then, and had been since the 20th of October previous, in the receipt of parochial relief; and that he states that he went away on the assurance of the plaintiff's agent that the case would be withdrawn; that, on the case being called, the plaintiff's agent said that Charlton had told him that he had only had two weeks' relief, and that on this statement a committal order was granted; that the Relieving Officer has certified that Charlton was in receipt of relief from 20th October, 1891, until 9th February, he was arrested by the County Court bailiff as he came away from the relieving officer after receiving his weekly allowance, and conveyed to prison, where he now is; and whether, in view of the fact that Charlton's only means were those which he received as parochial relief, and that his wife cannot earn money for him, being 65 years old and suffering from disease of the heart and an abscess, he will see that the man is at once released? On the question being reached the hon. Gentleman said: I may say that I have just received a telegram stating this man has been let out. In view of the fact that he seems to have been imprisoned on perjured evidence, I should like to know whether the right hon. Gentleman will take action?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I can only say that I have no power in the matter.

CONSTABLE GURRY.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he will explain the grounds on which Constable Gurry, recently stationed at Tipperary, has been promoted to the rank of acting sergeant and removed to Clonmel; whether he has any objection to state the length of Gurry's service, the number of stations he has been in, the cause of his removal from each station, and his general conduct record; and by whom was he first recommended for promotion to the rank he now holds, and was he recommended for promotion by his superior officers?

MR. JACKSON: The Constabulary Authorities report that the acting sergeant referred to was promoted to his present rank on the recommendation of his superior officers. He has served through the exigencies of the Service at various places, and has been in the Royal Irish Constabulary ten and a half years. His general conduct record is good.

THE MULLINGAR BOARD OF GUARDIANS.

MR. TUITE (Westmeath, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the Mullingar Board of Guardians, having several years since paid out of their general funds the cost of obtaining the Private Act, 48 & 49 Vic. c. 131, enabling the town of Mullingar to be supplied with water, by a majority of two votes, struck a special rate on 18th February instant, of 3s. 8d. in the £1, to recoup by one levy the general fund, though their powers under the Act have been abandoned, and no works were ever constructed under it; and that this was done after the Board had been advised by their counsel that such a rate would be illegal, in view of Sections 31 and 41, which provide that the money for the purpose should be first borrowed; whether he is also aware that the Guardians are now unable to define the boundary of the area of taxation, namely, "the town and manor of Mullingar"; and whether the Local Government Board intend to take any action in the matter?

MR. JACKSON: The facts are generally as stated in the first part of the question. The matter is altogether a question of law, and the Guardians appear to be acting under the advice of their counsel. The Local Government Board do not propose to interfere.

THE IRISH CAPITATION GRANT AND MODEL SCHOOLS.

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the teachers of model schools were excluded from the capitulation grant arising from the £78,000 derived from "The Customs and Excise Act, 1890"; whether the model school teachers in contributory unions receive the same proportion of results fees from the poor rate as the teachers of other national schools; and whether Her Majesty's Government will authorise the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland to pay to the model school teachers in non-contributory unions, out of the £2,000 derived from the fees paid by the pupils who attend the model schools, and now paid into the Treasury as an extra receipt, the same capitulation grant as is paid to the teachers in other national schools?

MR. JACKSON: The reply to the inquiries in paragraphs 1 and 2 is in the affirmative. With regard to the third paragraph, the arrangement made by the Treasury with regard to the application of the item of £2,000 mentioned is one which I have no power to alter.

BALACLAVA VETERANS.

MR. OCTAVIUS V. MORGAN (Battersea): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that of the soldiers who fought at Balaclava there are 18 alive who have no pensions, and that there are 12 who have pensions varying from 4d. to 1s. 3d. a day; and whether Her Majesty's Government will take the necessary steps to provide that each of these heroes shall, for the rest of his days, enjoy a pension of not less than 2s. 6d. a day?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): As I have already stated more than once, the Balaclava Charge, gallant as it was, was but one incident in many actions which took place during the Crimean and Indian Mutiny campaigns, and I cannot discriminate specially in its favour. As I have also already said, the Treasury is now considering whether it will be possible to effect a reduction in the length of service qualifying for pension, so as to benefit many of the men now without a pension. I cannot, however, hold out any hope that the pensions will be generally raised to the high figure suggested in the question.

MR. SWIFT MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that it has been stated in the newspapers, and not contradicted, that no fewer than six of the survivors of the Charge of Balaclava are at present in workhouses in various parts of the country?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I am not aware of that fact, if it be a fact; but I do know that the Patriotic Commissioners, whose duty it is to inquire into the matter, satisfied themselves that there were a few men who had brought that condition upon themselves by drunkenness and misconduct.

MR. M'CARTAN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he can state, with reference to the survivors of the Six Hundred who took part in the charge at Balaclava, how many of them died in the workhouse, and how many of them are at present in workhouses; and whether the Commissioners of the Patriotic Fund have yet, in accordance with the Report of February, 1891, disposed of the £3,700 balance of the Relief Fund raised in the summer of 1890?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I have not information which will enable me to reply to the first part of the question; but, considering that, with few exceptions, these men received gratuities exceeding a year's pension, I can scarcely imagine that there ought now to be any serious destitution among them. The balance of the Relief Fund has only recently been transferred to the Patriotic Fund, and amounted to £2,949; and it is intended to apply it in the grant of pensions of 1s. a day to each of seven men as long as so many survive.

LICENCES IN MORTMAIN.

MR. ROBY (Lancashire, S.E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, on an application being received for a licence in mortmain under 51 and 52 Vic. c. 42, any consideration is given to the question whether such licence is legally necessary to save the property intended to be conveyed from forfeiture?

MR. MATTHEWS: The Attorney General, to whom every petition for the grant of a licence to mortmain is referred for report, gives due consideration, among other circumstances, to the legal necessity for a licence in order to save forfeiture. The gift of lands to Owens College was licensed on the ground that purposes of public benefit and utility would be promoted by the grant of the licence. The fees charged are solely for Revenue purposes. Twelve licences have been granted since the passing of the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act of 1888.

INTERMEDIATE EDUCATION IN IRELAND.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, under the regulations of the Intermediate Education Board in Ireland, no examining centre will be established, under the Intermediate Education Act, in any part of Ireland, unless there are at least 20 pupils presented there for examination; and, if so, whether, in view of the difficulty of presenting such a number in the smaller rural towns, and the little difficulty and small expense of providing superintendents to preside over the examinations, the Government will bring it under the notice of the Board with a view to reduce the requisite minimum number to ten or twelve; and whether he is aware that it frequently happens that a number of pupils are brought (under the superintendence of the teachers) at great expense from a considerable distance to the examining centres, and maintained there at further expense during the period over which the examination extends.

MR. JACKSON: I learn from the Intermediate Education Board that they have no fixed rule as to the number of candidates required to constitute a centre, but that each application is considered on its merits. The Board do not consider it would be advisable to adopt as a minimum the number ten or twelve, as in their opinion the doing so would largely increase the cost of superintendence.

MR. FLYNN: Will the right hon. Gentleman answer the last part of the question?

MR. JACKSON: I have no information on that point.

THE DEBT ON KINSALE HARBOUR.

MR. MORROGH (Cork Co., S.E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he can explain on what grounds the Irish Board of Works claim that the Kinsale Harbour Commissioners are indebted to them in the sum of £11,059 15s. 1d., this sum being made up of principal and interest, the latter being charged at the rate of 5 per cent.; and is he aware that the Board of Works have issued a writ for the recovery of this amount, and have threatened to appoint a receiver; that the Town Commissioners, in order to meet what they considered their portion of the liability, levied a special extra rate of 2s. in the £, which they find the ratepayers of the town are unable to meet; and that the Harbour Commissioners have applied for a Provisional Order to enable them to increase the Harbour dues for the purpose of meeting the payments, according to terms of the award of the Board of Works, dated 23rd April, 1890; if so, will he take into consideration the advisability of reducing the rate of interest, and also make a reduction in the principal sum, in view of the fact that a high rate of interest has hitherto been charged, and that the revenue of the port from fishing and other vessels has fallen off very considerably within the past few years, and that the Town and Harbour Commissioners have made every effort to meet the heavy instalments?

SIR JOHN GORST: The sum of £11,059 15s. 1d. represents the principal sum, with interest accrued at the rate of 5 per cent., which was still outstanding at the date of the award. The facts are substantially as stated in the second paragraph, except that I have not seen proof of the inability of the ratepayers of the town to meet the special rate of 2s.; but, in view of the steps taken by the Town and Harbour Commissioners, the Treasury are now prepared to grant a reduction of interest from 5 to 4 per cent. as from the date of the award. I see no ground for making any remission of principal.

MR. MORROGH: Will the right hon. Gentleman consider the propriety of reducing the interest from the date of the accumulation of the arrears?

SIR JOHN GORST: I cannot go further than to say that we will reduce the interest from the date of the award.

TENDERS FOR SCOTCH CONTRACTS.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether, in the tenders for the pier at Carloway, and for other works under "The Western Highlands Works Act, 1891," Her Majesty's Government will take care that no conditions are inserted similar to those in the tenders for Uig Pier, whereby Scottish contractors are bound to submit themselves to the jurisdiction of the English and not the Scottish Courts of Law?

SIR JOHN GORST: The Carloway pier will be constructed under Provisional Order, not under the Act referred to. The contracts are matters for the sole consideration of the promoters and the contractors; but the Secretary for Scotland will, I am informed, do all in his power to secure the omission from the tenders of the conditions complained of by the hon. Member.

MR. BUCHANAN: May I point out to the right hon. Gentleman that it is within the knowledge of Her Majesty's Government that, owing to the conditions imposed under this contract, several contractors withdrew?

SIR JOHN GORST: Well, Sir, I was not aware of that.

SCIENCE AND ART EXAMINATIONS.

MR. HOBHOUSE (Somerset, E.): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education if he is aware that Saturday 30th April is the day fixed by the Education Department for the next literary examination of pupil.

teachers in elementary schools, and that the same day has been fixed by the Science and Art Department for the next examination in geometry, and that the result of such an arrangement is to cause general inconvenience and annoyance to pupil teachers, and to prevent many of those who have to sit at different centres for the two subjects from passing both examinations; whether the literary examination is compulsory for pupil teachers, while geometry is taken up almost universally by them; and whether, in view of the great hardship that will result to many teachers if both examinations are held on the same day, he will arrange with one of the Departments to alter their date?

SIR WILLIAM HART DYKE: I am much obliged to my hon. Friend for calling attention to this matter, and I am glad to inform him that steps are being taken to hold the Education Departments Examination on an earlier day.

TRAWLING IN IRISH WATERS.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland in how many and in what bays in Ireland is trawling forbidden, also in what bays is steam trawling forbidden; if when a large majority of the fishermen residing near any bay desire that trawling should be prohibited, do the Irish Authorities consider and give effect to this desire; has he any evidence to show whether the fishermen near any bay consider that the non-prohibition of trawling has injured the take of fish; if he knows that trawling is forbidden within the three mile limit of Scotland; and if the Irish Government will take steps to ascertain whether the Irish fishermen prefer the Scotch or Irish practice with regard to trawling; and if they prefer the Scotch, will he remove the jurisdiction with regard to trawling from the Irish Fishery Board and transfer it directly to the Lord Lieutenant?

The hon. and gallant Gentleman also had the following question on the Paper: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he has made inquiries, and can explain to the House how it was that Question No. 23 on the Paper of Friday was not brought to his attention?

MR. JACKSON: I regret I was unable to reply to the last question when it appeared on the Paper on Friday, as I had not then had time to consider the telegraphed Report. As regards the first question, as the answer is somewhat long, perhaps the hon. Member will allow me to give the substance of it.

COLONEL NOLAN: The matter is very important, and I should like to have the answer in full.

MR. JACKSON: Very well, Sir; I will answer this question in full. The Inspectors of Irish Fisheries report that trawling from sail and steam vessels is prohibited in Belfast Lough, Dundrum Bay, and thence along the coast of Ireland to Howth and in Dublin Bay. Off the coast of Wexford trawlers must keep three miles away from vessels engaged in mackerel or herring fishing. Within certain limits in Waterford Harbour trawling is prohibited as regards vessels of over ten tons. Bantry Bay is closed to trawlers during night time, and within a certain portion of the bay at all times. It is prohibited within certain limits in Brandon Bay. In Galway Bay trawling is not allowed while drift nets are being used for mackerel or herrings. Within certain limits in Inver Bay (County Donegal) it is also prohibited. Trawling from steam vessels is prohibited with certain limits in Sheephaven Bay, off the coasts of Donegal, Londonderry, and Antrim, a portion of the coast of Wexford, a portion of Waterford Harbour, and Lacken Bay. In Killala Bay within certain limits it is prohibited from the 1st of August in each year until the 1st of May in the year following, and in the entire bay at all times when mackerel or herring fishing is being carried on. A bye-law prohibiting steam trawling in Galway Bay inside the Arran Islands has been submitted for the approval of the Lord Lieutenant in Council. Where a large majority of fishermen residing near a bay intimate their desire that trawling should be prohibited therein the Inspectors of Irish Fisheries usually hold a public inquiry into the matter, and, if they consider it desirable, make a bye-law to suit the circumstances of the case. In one case an application from certain fishermen was received requesting that trawling from sailing vessels be prohibited in a bay, but the Inspectors having recently held an inquiry into the fisheries of that bay, and having passed a bye-law prohibiting steam trawling therein, did not consider it necessary to hold a further inquiry, as they were of opinion that the protection of the bay from steam trawlers was sufficient. Evidence has been given to show that the fishermen near the bay consider the non-prohibition of trawling as injurious to the take of fish. Hence the bye-laws were made prohibiting trawling as described. The list of bye-laws quoted will show that the Inspectors are anxious to protect the fisheries of the bays; but, at the same time, they are careful to avoid any unnecessary action that would harass the trawling industry, which contributes so largely to the food supply. I have no official knowledge of the matter referred to in the fourth paragraph. The Government are not prepared to propose to remove the jurisdiction from the Irish Fishery Inspectors, in whom it is vested by law.

THE TREASON-FELONY PRISONERS.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether a treason-felony prisoner named Gallagher has been released; and, if so, when and on what grounds; whether the treason-felony prisoner M'Cabe, who became insane, has been discharged; and, if so, when and on what grounds; if not, where is he; and whether he has seen a statement in the Press that a man named Gallagher, a discharged treason-felony prisoner, is now a dangerous lunatic in America?

MR. MATTHEWS: The only treason-felony prisoner named Gallagher is still undergoing his sentence in Portland Prison. I have not seen the statement in the Press to which the hon. Member alludes. M'Cabe died in Perth Lunatic Asylum on the 9th October, 1890.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: Is it not the fact that two brothers of the name of Gallagher were convicted together, and that one has been released?

MR. MATTHEWS: All I can say is that we have not had more than one treason-felony prisoner of the name of Gallagher.

IRISH GRAND JURY ACT.

MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether there is any, and what, provision in the present Grand Jury Act by which a traverse can be tried in any county other than the county concerned; and whether he is aware of any demand on behalf of people living in the North or South of Ireland to have such traverses tried in Dublin, as is proposed by the Local Government (Ireland) Bill, Clause 9?

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, Dublin University): The latter portion of the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the previous question of the hon. Member will apply to a considerable extent to the second part of this question. But with reference to the first paragraph, I may point out that there is at present no need of any such provision, inasmuch as presentations are made by Grand Juries at the Assizes at which traverses may be heard before the Judge.

MILITARY LEAVE FROM INDIA.

MR. WEBB (Waterford, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War for what reasons, and upon what terms and conditions as to pay and promotion, are soldiers and non-commissioned officers during service in India allowed home on leave?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: Any warrant or non-commissioned officer after eight years' service abroad, and within the limit of 100 in one season, any soldier down to the rank of bombardier, after five years' continuous service in India, who has re-engaged, may have furlough for six months, with free passage, without loss of pay or promotion.

SUNDAY AND NIGHT DUTY AT THE DUBLIN GENERAL POST OFFICE.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that the hall porters and labourers employed in the General Post Office, Dublin, are required to perform Sunday duty and night duty, for which they are not allowed the usual overtime wage of the Department; whether he is aware that his predecessor in office promised to remedy the grievance of these servants twelve months ago, and that nothing has yet been done for them; and whether he will see that the usual wages are paid, and the deficit of the past twelve months allowed?

SIR J. FERGUSSON : The persons in question do as part of their weekly work an average of about two hours on a Sunday. I find that my predecessor said on the 7th March last year that the case of Post Office servants other than sorting clerks and telegraphists was under consideration. Since then extra Sunday pay has been extended to postmen at a considerable cost. I will now consider the cases mentioned, but I am not in a position to make any promises regarding them.

EVICTED TENANTS AND THE LAND PURCHASE ACT.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether any evicted tenants, or association on the part of evicted tenants, sought to take advantage of Section 13 of the Land Purchase Act of last Session before its expiration, and were unable to do so owing to the refusal of their landlords to co-operate; whether he can give the number of such tenants, the names of their landlords, and the grounds of their refusal to avail themselves of this Act to restore these evicted tenants to their late holdings; and whether the Government intend to introduce or favour any legislation for this object?

MR. JACKSON : I have no means of knowing the number of cases in which landlords and former tenants failed to agree to take advantage of the provisions referred to of the Land Purchase Act of last Session. I am not aware of any intention on the part of the Government to propose or to suggest legislation of the compulsory nature indicated in the last paragraph.

HOURS OF LABOUR OF WOMEN AND CHILDREN IN FRANCE.

MR. MACLEAN (Oldham) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the French Legislature has yet passed any law to give effect to the resolutions of the International Conference of Berlin regarding the hours of labour of women and children?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. J. W. LOWTHER, Cumberland, Penrith) : The French Legislature has not yet passed into law the Bill relating to the hours of labour of women and children, but it is in the Orders of the Day for future consideration.

METRE GAUGE RAILWAYS IN INDIA

MR. MACLEAN : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the metre gauge railways of Rajputana, the North West Provinces, and Bengal, with a total length exceeding 3,800 miles, which are now divided into four separate and unconnected groups, could all be coupled together for about £400,000, or only two per cent. on the original capital outlay of 20 millions sterling; whether the Secretary of State is aware that the money can easily be found for constructing the missing links of this system, and thus establishing unbroken connection on the metre gauge lines, on which traffic can now only be carried on by repeated transfers from the vehicles of one gauge to those of another, from the Valley of Brahmaputra in the east, across the whole breadth of Northern India to the western seaboard; and whether the India Office proposes to sanction the short connections required to develop the full usefulness of these metre gauge railways?

MR. CURZON : The question of constructing these metre gauge lines is now under the consideration of the Secretary of State in Council, who is therefore unable, at the present moment, to make any public statement as to the cost of construction or the means of raising the money.

RULES FOR RETIREMENT IN THE ARMY AND MILITIA.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether a sergeant-major is, under the Royal Warrant, compulsorily retired at 45 if serving with his regiment, and at 50 if with the dépôt; whether, under the Militia Regulations, a sergeant of the permanent staff must retire at 50, unless he was so serving prior to July 1881, while for sergeants of the Regular Army there is no such limit, and men are actually serving with the Regulars who would on the score of age be retired if they belonged to the Militia; and whether he proposes to remove the grievance complained of?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: The rules for retirement of warrant officers and for the permanent staff of the Militia are as stated in the question. They are necessary for efficiency. There is no age fixed for the compulsory retirement of non-commissioned officers in the Army, but commanding officers take care not to retain men who are no longer efficient. In the last annual Return, out of 13,203 sergeants only 29 were over the age of 50, and 17 of these were in the Royal Artillery, for the most part master gunners. I am not aware that any grievance exists.

THE HENRY BARREL COMPANY.

CAPTAIN BOWLES (Middlesex, Enfield): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if the Government sold the machinery to the Henry Barrel Company for the purpose of manufacturing the order for 30,000 carbines, and for what sum; and what was the original cost of the machinery?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: No, Sir; the machinery in question was not sold to the Henry Company for the purpose indicated in the question. Early in 1889 we sold to the company for £2,000 certain machinery, fixings, &c., which had been used in making the component parts of Martini-Henry rifles. It had been in use for many years and fetched its full value. As the Martini-Henry rifles would be in use for some time to come, it was considered to be an advantage that there should be a company able to make the spare parts, but it was intimated to them at the time of the sale that no orders of any kind could be guaranteed to them. I cannot state the original cost of the machinery.

"ACTING" AND "OUTDOOR" CUSTOMS OFFICERS.

MR. NEVILLE (Liverpool, Exchange): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether it was intended by the Treasury Minute of the 24th March, 1891, that the employment of "Acting" Officers should be limited to cases of exceptional pressure or emergency in regard to Customs Officers generally or to Outdoor officers only?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): The whole of the Treasury Minute in question relates only to Outdoor officers.

LORD WANTAGE'S COMMITTEE.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK-ALLAN (Durham, S.E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether, with a view to the House being able to form a judgment on the recommendations of Lord Wantage's Committee, and on the very conflicting opinions advanced by the minority, he will lay upon the Table the whole of the evidence taken before that Committee; and, if so, when he expects to be able to do so?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I can only refer to the replies I have already given on this subject, and say that directly I receive the evidence taken by Lord Wantage's Committee, I will consider whether I can lay it upon the Table. I have already stated that it is my wish to present it.

REUTER'S TELEGRAM COMPANY.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury why, in the contract between the Controller of the Stationery Office and Reuter's Telegram Company of 21st December, 1891, no provision is made for carrying out the terms of the Resolution of the House of Commons of 13th February, 1891, in regard to the payment by the contractor of a fair rate of wages to the men he employs under the contract?

SIR J. GORST: Before the tender of Reuter's Telegram Company for reporting the Parliamentary Debates was accepted, the attention of the Company was drawn by the Controller of the Stationery Office to the terms of the Resolution adopted by the House of Commons on 13th February, 1891, and an assurance was received that the spirit of the Resolution would be complied with. The Government has no reason to doubt that the assurance so given is being duly carried out.

MR. S. BUXTON: May I ask why this Resolution was not inserted in the contract, in order to make it perfectly clear to the public?

SIR J. GORST: The reasons against such a course were explained last year in the Debate on the Motion brought forward by the hon. Member himself. It is not expedient to insert the Resolution as a condition of a contract, as was then stated.

THE STEAMER "SIR WALTER RALEIGH."

MR. DEASY (Mayo, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he is aware that the steamer Sir Walter Raleigh put into Bantry Bay recently with her propeller disabled; whether the Board of Trade permitted her to be taken in tow for Dunkirk without having undergone repairs; whether he is aware that she broke adrift from the tug engaged in towing her; that Her Majesty's ships Triumph and Shannon were despatched to rescue her; and that she was picked up by another steamer, and towed back to Bantry Bay before the Government war vessels reached her; and, if so, whether, in view of the danger to the crew involved in the steamer being towed across the Channel in her present helpless condition, the Board of Trade will direct the necessary repairs to be executed at the nearest dockyard; and if he is aware that the Royal Victoria Dockyard, Cork Harbour, affords ample facilities for the repair of sailing vessels and steamers?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS BEACH: I am informed that this steamer did put into Bantry Bay recently, disabled, as stated in the question. There is no Board of Trade surveyor stationed there, but the coastguard officers reported by telegram to the officer at Dublin that the hull of the steamer was seaworthy; and they did not think any further action necessary, as she was being towed by a powerful tug. I am also informed that she broke adrift from the tug, and eventually returned to Bantry Bay, where she was surveyed by a Board of Trade surveyor despatched from Cork for the purpose. He reports that he found her hull seaworthy. I have directed the surveyor to allow her to leave Bantry with sufficient tug power, on an undertaking being given that she will proceed to the nearest convenient port for repairs to her machinery.

CHARGE FOR BIRTH CERTIFICATE.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, in reference to the charge of 3s. 7d. for birth certificate which must be paid by pupils entering for the intermediate examination in Ireland, whether the Irish Office has yet made any communication to the registrars with a view to reduce the charge to a nominal sum?

MR. JACKSON: The fee referred to is a statutable one, and there is, therefore, no power to suggest its reduction.

THE DEATH OF P. W. NALLY.

MR. McCARTAN (Down, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, with reference to the death of P. W. Nally, in Mountjoy Gaol, whether he will have a copy of the evidence and verdict given at the coroner's inquest laid upon the Table of the House; and whether Dr. Nally, brother of the deceased, was obliged to leave the gaol at 10 o'clock on the night when his brother was dying there?

*MR. JACKSON: The Government are not aware of any authentic report of the proceedings at the inquest in the case of P. W. Nally. Dr. Nally was not obliged to leave the prison when his brother was dying. On the contrary, as stated in reply to a previous question, Dr. Nally, with other friends, was present at his brother's death, which occurred about 9.50 p.m.

MR. SEXTON: Is the right hon Gentleman not aware that the coroner at the inquest was bound to take a copy of the depositions made before him? Are we to have them, or is it intended to conceal from the Members of this House all information as to the death of this man?

*MR. JACKSON: I have answered the question in accordance with the information given to me. So far as I am able to ascertain, the Irish Government have no authentic report of the proceedings at the inquest; but if there is an authentic report of course I will make inquiry about it.

MR. SEXTON: I will ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether it is not the practice of a coroner to take a copy of the evidence given before him; and whether the Irish Government will inquire if it was not done in this case?

MR. MADDEN: Undoubtedly it is usual for a coroner to take the depositions, but I am not aware whether it was done in the present case.

TIPPERARY.

MR. P. J. O'BRIEN (Tipperary, N.) : I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he has received a memorial from a large number of resident householders in the parishes of Upperchurch and Drumbane, County Tipperary, representing a population of nearly 3,000 inhabitants, praying that they would be afforded the accommodation of a Sunday post at the village of Upperchurch ; whether he is aware of the great inconvenience the residents in this locality are subject to (some of them persons in business, clergymen, and others) owing to there being no postal delivery on Sundays ; and whether the want could be supplied at a trifling cost by the appointment of a rural messenger on the Sundays from Ballycahill to Upperchurch, the distance being only five miles ; and, if so, will steps be taken to have this public want supplied ?

SIR J. FERGUSSON : Such a memorial has been received, but it has not been found practicable to comply with its prayer because of the expense involved. Even the existing service entails considerable loss on the Revenue.

FAIR RENT APPEALS.

MR. GILHOOLY (Cork Co., W.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in view of the fact that the landlords in the union of Dunmanway who have had fair rents fixed before the Sub-Commissioners are pressing their tenants for the old rents without allowing them the reductions granted by the Sub-Commissioners, he will expedite the hearing of appeals in the union referred to by the Chief Land Commissioners ?

MR. JACKSON : I have no information on the subject-matter of this question ; but I would remind the hon. Member that there is statutable provision for an adjustment between landlord and tenant in respect to payments made in regard to altered rents.

MR. GILHOOLY : Will the right hon. Gentleman ascertain when the Land Commissioners will hear the appeals ?

MR. JACKSON : I am sure the Land Commission would desire to expedite the proceedings as much as possible.

MR. GILHOOLY : In the meantime, allow me to say, the landlords are pressing for the old rents which the tenants are unable to pay.

MR. JACKSON : I have no power to interfere ; but the Court to which application is made will have power to take into consideration all circumstances of that kind.

PUBLIC MEETINGS IN IRELAND.

MR. GILHOOLY : I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he is aware that at a recent public meeting held at Goleen, Captain Welch, R.M., had a number of policemen, armed with rifles and bâtons, drawn up close and in view of the meeting, and threatened that if any illegal language was made use of he would disperse the meeting by force ; and what Statute, if any, empowered Captain Welch to disperse the meeting ?

MR. JACKSON : The facts appear to be as follows. From what had occurred at a meeting held at Goleen a few days previously, Captain Welch had reason to believe that the meeting referred to would be used for the promotion of intimidation, in relation to certain evictions which were being carried on in the immediate neighbourhood. Before the commencement of the meeting he spoke publicly to Father Forrest, P.P., pointing out the illegality of such a course, and warning him that if the meeting proved to be an unlawful assembly it would be his duty to disperse it.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.) : I should like to ask the Attorney General to explain under what Law or Statute this proceeding was taken. I should like at the same time to ask him to extend his answer so as to cover a case in which a similar proceeding was taken against myself when I endeavoured to address my constituents in a peaceable district. I want to know under what Statute a magistrate was justified in approaching me on the platform, and saying to me—

“ Mr. Dillon, if you use any language which, in my judgment, is illegal, I shall break up this meeting.”

MR. MADDEN : I cannot answer, of course, for what occurred in the case referred to by the hon. Member. He asks me under what Law or Statute a meeting, assuming it to be called for the purpose of intimidation, was dispersed.

MR. DILLON : The right hon. Gentleman has missed the point of my question. I was told this was a legal meeting, and that I could hold it, but that if my language in the judgment of the magistrate was improper or illegal the meeting would be dispersed.

MR. MADDEN: I assumed that the question put across the Table had reference to the facts of the case brought before me by the question on the Paper, but, if the hon. Gentleman wishes for information about other meetings, I must ask him to give me notice.

MR. GILHOOLY: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that at the previous meeting referred to there was a police reporter in attendance? If it was illegal, why not bring a prosecution; but why should a Magistrate be judge and jury in the case?

MR. P. J. O'BRIEN: Has Captain Welch had any legal training whatever?

MR. MADDEN: I am not aware that the legal training of Captain Welch has anything to do with the matter.

MR. DILLON: The right hon. Gentleman is evidently declining to answer the question I have put to him. It is whether it is legal for an Irish Magistrate to set himself up on the spot as a judge of the language of the speakers, and, if so, under what Law it is done? Mr. Speaker, I must ask the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the point of my question. If the meeting was illegal, why was it allowed to be held at all? It was allowed to be held, and that is a proof that in the opinion of the Magistrate it was not illegal, and the question is under what Law or Statute the Magistrate was entitled to constitute himself on the spot a judge, not only as to whether the meeting was illegal or not, but also whether the language used by the speakers was illegal?

MR. MADDEN: The Magistrate could not constitute himself a judge of the legality of the language used at the meeting. But, if the hon. Gentleman wishes to go into the question of other meetings, I must request him to give me notice. In regard to the particular meeting to which the question on the Paper relates, Captain Welch, rightly or wrongly—I cannot go into that—after what occurred at a previous meeting was apprehensive that the meeting about to be held would be used for the purpose of intimidation. Now, if the meeting had been so used, it would have been an unlawful assembly, and it would have been his duty to disperse it. The hon. Gentleman asks me if it was legal for Captain Welch to speak to gentlemen present at the meeting; but, in stating his apprehension and warning them of the possible consequences, he was doing nothing illegal.

MR. DILLON: The point of the question is that he stated that he would disperse the meeting if illegal language was used, and that amounts to saying that he would be the judge of the legality of such language.

MR. MADDEN: The hon. Gentleman will allow me to complete my answer. That is, no doubt, a point in the question, but what I said in reply is a totally different thing—that Captain Welch, in stating that if the meeting was used for the purposes of intimidation it would be an unlawful assembly, and it would be his duty to disperse it, was acting perfectly within the law.

COMMUNICATION BETWEEN WHITEGATE AND WOODFORD.

MR. M'DERMOTT (Kilkenny, N.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he can now state when telegraph communication can be established between Whitegate and Woodford; whether he is aware that letters at present take two days to go from one town to the other, though the distance is only six miles: and what steps he intends taking to redress this grievance?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: I have already explained that the circumstances would not admit of direct postal communication being established between the two places named. It is true that the letters take two days in passing from one to the other, but they are very few in number. With reference to the telegraph: on a similar question being asked last week the necessary inquiries were directed, but there has not yet been time to receive the Report.

MAIL TRAIN SERVICE TO WEXFORD.

MR. SEXTON (on behalf of Mr. T. M. HEALY, Longford, N.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he proposes to take any, and what, steps to carry out the promise of the late Postmaster General to grant a faster mail train service to Wexford?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: I am not informed that the late Postmaster General promised to grant a faster mail train service to Wexford. He promised to endeavour to come to terms with the Railway Company for that purpose, but the extra payment which they would require is more than the Service can afford. So far as the Post Office itself is concerned, all that is possible has been done by sorting on the way, and by the employment of additional force to expedite the delivery of the letters at Wexford, as well as at Enniscorthy.

INSTRUCTION IN ARBORICULTURE.

MR. HAYDEN (on behalf of Mr. HARRISON, Tipperary, Mid.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the authorities in Ireland, following the precedent set by the Board of Agriculture in England, have taken any steps to provide for suitable instruction in the higher and lower branches of arboriculture and silviculture, as advised by the Select Committee on Forestry in 1887?

MR. JACKSON: I have called for, but not yet received, Reports on this question. I must therefore ask the hon. Member to be good enough to defer it.

TREE-PLANTING IN IRELAND.

MR. HAYDEN (for Mr. HARRISON): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland in how many cases and to what extent the Congested Districts Board has availed itself of its power to undertake the re-afforesting of waste lands in Ireland; and whether he will use his influence to urge upon the Board the great importance of tree-planting in Ireland, and the yearly increasing likelihood of its proving remunerative in the near future?

MR. JACKSON: The Congested Districts Board have taken over from the Land Commission the carrying out of the forestry operations at Knockboy, County Galway. The lands being dealt with comprise 914 statute acres. This is the only case up to the present in which the Congested Districts Board have availed themselves of their powers to develop forestry in Ireland, but a proposal to purchase additional land is at present under consideration.

MR. HAYDEN (on behalf of Mr. HARRISON): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what advances have been by the Board of Works, under Cause 20 of the Tramways and Public Companies (Ireland) Act, which included the planting of trees amongst the objects to which, with the sanction of the Treasury, the Board of Works was authorised to make advances under the 31st section of the Land Law (Ireland) Act of 1881?

SIR J. GORST: Perhaps the hon. Member will allow me to answer that question, and to say that no advances have been made.

AN INSANE CONVICT.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that a convict named Clarke, late Postmaster and Churchwarden at Bringham, Norfolk, now confined in Portland Prison, has become insane; and whether he will consider his case with a view to his release?

MR. MATTHEWS: A prisoner named Clarke has become insane, and is now at Broadmoor. I am informed that there is no ground whatever for the suggestion that his insanity is due to prison treatment. The medical officer reports that it was probably congenital. During the time he was in a convict prison he never made a complaint to the authorities, nor did he send any petition to the Home Office.

ENNISKILLEN GAOL.

MR. JORDAN (Clare, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if the Prisons Board claim the area in front of the gaol in Enniskillen, extending from the gaol wall to the channel adjoining the county road leading south to Castlecoole; and, if so, is it the duty of the Board to keep it in proper repair and clean it; will they either do so, or hand it over to the Local Authority, the Town Commissioners, to put it into and keep it in proper condition; and is this gaol being now used as a prison, or is it intended that the authorities will discontinue its use as such, and permit it to fall into further dilapidation; if not, will they instruct an engineer to inspect and report on the condition and appearance of the outside front wall, doors, &c., with a view to due repairs?

MR. JACKSON: I am causing inquiries to be made in regard to the subject of this question, but have not yet received the information.

RENTS IN ENNISKILLEN.

MR. JORDAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that rents in many cases and generally were increased by the Land Commissioners in Enniskillen, county Fermanagh, last week; and if he will state the number of cases in which rents were thus increased, and the number in which they were reduced, at those sittings; and the number of appeals by the landlord and tenant respectively, both in the cases of increased and reduced rents?

MR. JACKSON: I am informed that at the recent sitting of the Land Commissioners' Court of Appeal at Enniskillen 82 cases were heard. They included 55 landlords' appeals, of which 28 were raised and 27 confirmed. Of the six cross appeals, one was raised and five were confirmed. Of the 20 tenants' appeals, 12 were confirmed and eight reduced.

DEEDS OF ARRANGEMENT.

MR. JORDAN (on behalf of Mr. CHANCE, Kilkenny, S.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether the provisions of "The Deeds of Arrangement (Amendment) Act, 1890," so far as relate to private arrangements, and especially Sub-section 5, of Section 2, have been disregarded; and what steps the Government proposes to take to ensure the observance of the Act?

MR. MADDEN: I have made inquiries into this matter. I find that a difficulty has arisen in carrying out the provisions of the Act, especially having regard to the enactments of the sub-section referred to in the question. The matter is too technical to be explained in reply to a question. But I have given the matter careful consideration, and I believe that the difficulty is capable of being removed.

PAYMENT OF RATES AS BETWEEN LANDLORD AND TENANT.

MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether with reference to the provision in Clause 2, Sub-section (2) (a) of the Local Government (Ireland) Bill, by which (notwithstanding any contract by the owner, whether in town or country, to pay the county cess or borough rate, or any part thereof) the whole of any increase beyond the present amount of thecessor rate is to be paid by the occupier only, the Government are prepared to introduce a Bill regulating the contracts between landlord and tenant concerning the payment of rates in every part of the United Kingdom?

VOL. I.    [NEW SERIES.]

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I must remind the hon. Member that the main outlines of our programme are now before the House, and I am afraid I cannot undertake to make any addition to it.

CARLOWAY PIER.

DR. MACDONALD (Ross and Cromarty): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he has received tenders for the construction of the pier at Carloway, in the Island of Lewis, some months ago, and how soon is he likely to decide to proceed with the work; and whether, in reference to the construction of the road from Stornoway to Carloway, effect is to be given to the unanimous decision of the district committee of the County Council as to the manner of its construction?

SIR J. GORST: My right hon. Friend has asked me to reply to this question. Tenders for the construction of the pier were submitted in December, and are now under the consideration of the promoters. In accordance with the usual rule the works cannot be commenced until the Provisional Order for their execution has received the sanction of Parliament, but every effort will be made to expedite the passing of the confirming Bill. As regards the road from Stornoway to Carloway the Secretary for Scotland has been in communication with the County Council, with the result that there is now practically an agreement as to the method of construction, and it only remains to settle the question how far a portion of the present road near Stornoway may be utilised.

THE YEOMAN USHER OF THE BLACK ROD.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether it is intended to take advantage of the opportunity afforded by the death of Sir Spencer Clifford to combine the duties of Yeoman Usher of the Black Rod and of Secretary to the Lord Great Chamberlain, as recommended by the House of Lords Committee of 8th August, 1889, with a view to effect a saving of £700 per annum?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As the hon. Gentleman is aware, the matter is not within the competence of the Government, but it is entirely within that of the House of Lords itself, and I am given to understand that their Lordships desire to carry out, as soon as possible, the intention expressed by the Committee to which the question refers.

PENSIONS AND SUPERANNUATION ALLOWANCES.

MR. FRANCIS STEVENS ON (Suffolk, Eye): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he would object to a Motion for a Return showing the total amount of the Exchequer issues in the year ending 31st March, 1891, in respect of pensions and superannuation allowances, indicating the total amount charged for the purpose on the Consolidated Fund; and the total amount issued for the purpose on account of Naval Services, Military Services, Civil Services, Customs and Inland Revenue Departments, and Post Office Services; and whether he would object to the inclusion in the Return of the total amount paid out of the local taxation account in respect of police superannuation, and of the total amount expended by Local Authorities during the year upon pensions and superannuation allowances?

MR. GOSCHEN: The information for which the hon. Member asks in the first part of his question is contained in the Report of the Appropriation Account, so that there would be no need of a Return. With regard to the information sought for in the second part of the question, I must refer him to my right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board.

FOOT-AND-MOUTH DISEASE.

SIR EDWARD BIRKBECK (Norfolk): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture a question, of which I have given him private notice—namely, whether his attention has been called to statements in the Observer with regard to the action taken by the Board of Agriculture in reference to the outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease?

SIR WALTER BARTTELOT (N.W.): I also wish to ask whether the hon. Gentleman has heard of an outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease at Edinburgh, and also at Ashurst, Sussex?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. C. Lincolnshire, Sleaford): In reply to the hon. and gallant Friend (Sir Barttelot), I regret to say that I received notice on Saturday of an outbreak having occurred at Edinburgh. I have inquiry into the circumstances of the case; but the reports I have received to the present time do not enable me to trace the origin of the outbreak. It is also true, I am sorry to say, that a break which occurred in Sussex a few days ago appears to have extended from Ashurst to a farm there, and to a neighbouring farm called the Bentley. In reply to the question of my hon. Friend behind me (Sir Edward Birkenhead), I have to say that my attention has been called to various statements which recently appeared in the paper relating to, to the effect that we are relaxing our precautions in connection with the break of foot-and-mouth disease. We have treated the matter with levity, reflecting severely on the conduct of the Board of Agriculture generally. There is no foundation for these statements, and I can only suppose that they are based upon a complete misapprehension as to the effect of some of the most recent orders of the Board and the circumstances under which they have been passed. It is true we have re-opened London Market and revoked the order for prohibiting the movement of animals from the market, for this reason: London must be fed, and if those who were continued to be sent to railway stations, in yards, at倾, lairs, and other places over which I should have no control, could have no control over them. We have therefore thought it necessary to re-open the market, leaving the animals free to be taken from the market to any destination within the County of London, but taking the most stringent precautions in which we are being most admirably served by the police, to prevent any animal from the market going beyond the limits of the County of London. The effect, I hope, will be this: that as will go freely into the market, and unhappily the disease should be brought into the County of London.

into it again we shall have them altogether under our control and be able to deal with it at once.

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH : I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman, with respect to the outbreak at Edinburgh, whether he can inform the House if he has any reason to suppose it is connected with cases which have arisen in London, or whether it is an independent outbreak?

MR. CHAPLIN : As far as I have been able to ascertain up to the present time the outbreak in Edinburgh is regarded as quite independent of that which took place in London; but as the right hon. Gentleman knows very well, it is quite possible that the disease may have been conveyed from London to Edinburgh without there being any indication of it.

MEETINGS AT WORLD'S END, CHELSEA.

MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I beg to ask the Home Secretary whether his attention has been called to the fact that a meeting which was being held at World's End, Chelsea, on Sunday was suddenly attacked and broken up by the police without any warning being given to the speakers, and notwithstanding his answer on the 23rd instant to a deputation that such meetings would not be interfered with?

MR. WHITMORE : I would also, before the right hon. Gentleman answers that question, ask whether it is not the fact the meeting that day was disorderly and obstructed the traffic; and whether the police did not interfere with it until the disorder and obstruction caused by it compelled them to do so?

MR. MATTHEWS : What I said to the deputation on the 23rd instant was that if we think the meetings at the World's End were of the same character as those which preceded August last, and were accompanied by no disturbance of the peace and no obstruction to the public thoroughfare, the police would not interfere; but I added that the police would be neglecting their first duty if they did not interfere with such meetings as had taken place there since September last. I am informed that yesterday the police had orders to avoid interference with the meeting if possible, and an Assistant Commissioner attended in person to enforce these orders. The police were not sent for, and did not interfere at all until the number of persons assembled had so largely increased that the thoroughfares were blocked and there were much noise and disturbance. The Inspector then requested the speaker to desist, calling his attention to the obstruction and disturbance, and informing him that there was illness in several neighbouring houses. The speaker refused to desist, and the policemen then caused the central group to move on and cleared the roadway. I am informed that inhabitants in the neighbourhood were for some time prevented from leaving their houses, and that a clergyman, whose mission room is at World's End, was unable to get there.

COUNTY COUNCIL ELECTIONS.

MR. LABOUCHERE : In the absence of the President of the Local Government Board, I wish to ask the Home Secretary what law there is that justifies a Deputy Returning Officer counting votes at a County Council Election at his office instead of at the polling place, as is now being done at one of the divisions of Norfolk?

MR. MATTHEWS : I must ask the hon. Gentleman for notice of that question.

MR. LABOUCHERE : But it is going on now.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

THE SCOTCH EQUIVALENT GRANT.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN (Stirling Burghs): I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he will undertake not to take to-night Vote 4, Class 7, of the Supplementary Estimates, relating to local taxation (Scotland), the reason being that it is so obviously mixed up with the subject of the Bill he proposes to bring in that we could hardly vote the money until we have seen that measure?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : I do not see that the connection which the right hon. Gentleman speaks of exists, at all events, to the extent he thinks it does; but I hope hon. Gentlemen opposite will allow us to bring in our Bill as soon as we can, and that the right hon. Gentleman will do his best to facilitate the proceedings so that the Bill may be printed as soon as possible. I cannot give an absolute promise that we will not take the Vote to-night, but I think it is improbable that it will be reached.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : It will be very inconvenient to many of us to be obliged to wait for the chance of its coming on; but, if the right hon. Gentleman would say it will not be taken, we need not do so.

MR. BALFOUR : The fact of the matter is that the House itself will be greatly inconvenienced unless we can get through the Supplementary Estimates in the course of this week. As the right hon. Gentleman knows, we have only Monday and Thursday in which to do so, and if the financial business is postponed it will be necessary for the Government to ask for the time of private Members at a much earlier date than they would otherwise desire to do; but on that condition I should have no objection to acceding to the request of the right hon. Gentleman.

THE GRESHAM CHARTER.

MR. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Bright-side): I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, for the convenience of the House generally, whether he will afford sufficient time for the discussion of the Gresham Charter, because the stoppage of other business one hour before the usual time would not afford adequate opportunity for debate?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : Well, Sir, as the right hon. Gentleman is aware, a question was put to me by an hon. Friend of my own on this side of the House upon the subject a few nights ago, and I then pointed out to the House that this was not a discussion which would be, or could be, brought to a premature conclusion under the Twelve o'Clock Rule; and that, therefore, although it might involve our sitting an hour or two later and might be inconvenient, yet the discussion would reach its full term. I have every desire to meet the wishes of the House, but I cannot create time, as the right hon. Gentleman knows. We are already hampered for time in consequence of the anxious desire of hon. Gentlemen opposite to discuss our Bills before they are introduced; and we have not been allowed to introduce some of the most important of our measures; I am, therefore, afraid that I cannot at present give the right hon. Gentleman the promise for which he asks.

THE DIPLOMATIC VOTE.

MR. MORTON : May I ask Lord of the Treasury whether he to go on with the Diplomatic Vc Supplementary Estimates?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : Yes ing to the arrangement com Friday, that will stand first or next.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

SUPPLY — CIVIL SERVICES REVENUE DEPARTMENTS, SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

CLASS VI.

Motion made, and Question p

"That a sum, not exceeding ££ granted to Her Majesty, to defray th which will come in course of paymen the year ending on the 31st day 1892, as a Grant in Aid of the Capi Pension Fund created under the pro the National School Teachers' (Irels 1879."

(6.40.) MR. SEXTON (Belfa This, Mr. Courtney, is a Vote considerable interest, if not to Members, who are now leav House in such numbers, at any Irish Members. By this Vote i posed to take the whole of l equivalent, for the current year grant given to England for free cation. It is proposed to take th sum of £90,000, and apply it, any immediate purposes, but in the National Teachers' Fund. I question of the application of thi has been lying over since last y was frequently mentioned in the in the later months of last Sessi now, when we are in close pi to the end of the financia we find we are obliged t with it, not by a Bill, but by a Supply. I feel obliged to confe whilst a Vote in Supply is a very and convenient mode for dealin money, when the principle of e ture has been already affirmed, y conceive nothing more inconve prejudicial to the privileges, or tive of the rights of Members present a new proposal, never :

or even debated, and perhaps to carry it into effect by procedure in Supply. If it were a Bill, we would have an opportunity of proposing useful Amendments which might have a chance of acceptance; but under this procedure, if we think the sum is not enough for the purpose we cannot move to increase it, and we cannot reduce it if it were thought that the amount was needlessly large. Again, Sir, it will not be denied that the information on the face of this Estimate is of the most meagre possible kind. There is a foot note in which we are told something which we know already, and upon which we do not require to be informed. We are told where the money comes from. Members are well aware that this money is 9 per cent.—Ireland's share—of the Free Education grant. But upon what we do require to know we receive no information. We are not told what circumstances have arisen to render necessary the appropriation of this great sum to the particular purpose in question. It is only a week ago that the right hon. Gentleman told us that—

"Either the payments into the fund had been too small, or the payments out of it had been too large."

Now, that might be a description of any fund that had ever been found to be in an unsatisfactory condition. What we want to know is, which is it? Have the payments been smaller than was originally expected; or have the payments out been larger? The right hon. Gentleman has truly said that the fund showed a tendency to get into bad water. Surely we are entitled to more information. Is it in bad water now? It has been suggested that the State is not responsible for the condition of this fund. Why, Sir, this fund was founded by a public Act of Parliament in 1879, and by that Act £1,300,000 was taken out of the Irish Church Surplus Fund, and applied in aid of this very fund now before us. Under that Act an elaborate system was devised. Three-fourths of the teachers' premiums were to be paid out of the Church Government subvention; the other fourth was to be supplied by the teachers who joined the fund. Who is it who is responsible for the Vote? If anyone will turn to the Estimates, and look at the Vote for the Treasury and subordinate Departments, he will find that one of the subordinate Departments is the office of this very Pension Fund. The superintendent of the pension office is a gentleman who receives £200 a year, and who is besides an actuary. So that you have an official actuary recognised in one of the great Departments of State in charge of this pension office in Dublin. It was his duty to see that the fund did not get into backwater, or even into the tendency to get into backwater. He should have warned the Government, and the Government should have warned this House, that the fund was getting into an unsound condition. I see in the Estimates we are told that the receipts of the fund are not in excess of liabilities as declared by the recent valuation. Why did not the recent valuation disclose that? I would suggest we ought to have a copy of the recent valuation; at least, we ought to have the substance of it. I now ask whatever Minister rises to reply, to inform us as to its precise effect. Moreover, when did the deficiency begin to arise? What is the amount of it at the present moment? I particularly wish to know whether, if we agree to apply this £90,000 to the Pension Fund now, we may assure ourselves that the fund will be in a sound position, and that we shall not be told at the end of another five years that the fund shows a tendency to get into backwater, and that some money is to be devoted by the Government to the fund for the purpose of assisting it. I think I am entitled to say that it is hardly treating Irish Members fairly in regard to a matter of finance, when it is only in a speech upon the Debate that the Chief Secretary tells us incidentally what he intends to do. We have received numerous letters from Irish teachers upon the subject. One teacher, writing on the 28th February, said, with reference to the report that the Chief Secretary intended to hand over the £90,000 accruing since September last to the Pension Fund—

"It is not fair, as it was meant that the teachers would charge no school fees. They will be at a loss for the half-year ending 31st March, so that they are entitled to be compensated in lieu of the school fees."

The suggestion here made is that upon the announcement of free education last year some of the teachers ceased collecting school fees—depending upon the establishment of free education. Their income for the present year is consequently seriously diminished. I would like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he has inquired of the Commissioners of National Education if within the past half year an expectation amongst the people has led to the cessation of school fees; and whether, if so, he has any proposal to meet the case? I do not myself oppose the principle of the allocation of this fund in aid of the Pension Fund, but I submit that as some teachers may have incurred loss, we are entitled to have the most specific information given as to the circumstances of the Pension Fund.

*(6.52.) THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir JOHN GORST, Chat-ham): I will give the hon. Member the fullest information I possibly can in reply to his questions. The fund was created, as he indicated, by the appropriation of £1,300,000 out of the Irish Church surplus, to which was added a contribution by the teachers themselves. About three-fourths of the fund consists of the Irish Church surplus and accumulations, and about one-fourth consists of the contributions made by the teachers themselves and the accumulations. The whole difficulty has arisen from an unfortunate, and I must say I think a mistaken, actuarial valuation made in the year 1885. That was at the end of the first quinquennial period of the fund. The Report made at that time to the then Government showed that the assets of the fund, on the 31st December, 1884, amounted to £1,664,872 and the liabilities to £1,468,285 only, showing a surplus of assets over liabilities of no less than £196,587. The Government of the day, 1885, had to deal with that surplus. It clearly belonged to the National School teachers of Ireland. It had to be allocated in some way—either by reducing the amount of the subscription, or by increasing the benefits which had been provided by the Act of 1879. The Government of 1885 decided to take the latter course, and they changed the scheme of the Act of 1879 by promising the National School teachers of Ireland certain extra benefits.

COLONEL NOLAN: What was the date in 1885?

*SIR JOHN GORST: The hon. Member asks a question which I shall be glad to answer later. This was what was done. In the first place, provision was made for a return, to the representatives of a teacher who died, of the premiums which the teacher had paid towards his pension, and which according to the scheme of 1879 would have been lost to the teacher's representatives in case of death; and the cost of this was supposed to amount to £35,000. Then there were the claims of members of certain abolished classes of teachers to somewhat increased pensions to be considered. These claims were admitted, amounting to a capital liability of about £3,500 more. Then there was a rule introduced that male and female teachers should be allowed to retire after 40 years' service upon their maximum pension, reckoned from the age 21 in the case of males, and 18 in the case of females. This concession was calculated to involve a capital liability of about £150,000. Therefore, by these concessions which I have enumerated, nearly the whole estimated surplus of £196,000 was disposed of. The new rules were in operation for another quinquennial period, and then there was another actuarial valuation made. And it turned out, that so far from the fund being then solvent there was a deficit in it.

An hon. MEMBER: Was the valuation made by the same actuary?

*SIR JOHN GORST: I believe so. The actuarial valuation brought out in 1891 that the liabilities were £195,000 more than the assets, so that whereas at the end of the first quinquennial period there was a sum of £196,000 to the good, at the end of the second period there was £195,000 to the bad. Of course the merits of highly technical actuarial calculations form a subject upon which Members of the Government, and, I daresay, Representatives from Ireland are not properly qualified to express an opinion. Therefore the Government, with this extraordinary variation between the first and second actuarial valuation, appointed a Committee consisting of three actuaries, one being the actuary who made the first Report—and, I believe, the second Report also—and two being independent actuaries. They are now preparing a Report which has not yet been submitted to the Government. Therefore I am as much in the dark as hon. Members from Ireland are as to how this extraordinary difference between the first and second valuation arose. But when the investigation is completed Her Majesty's Government will carefully consider the Report, and will see how this important fund can be brought into a condition of solvency.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: They may bring out a surplus.

SIR JOHN GORST: I do not think that is likely; but, of course, it is possible. However, when this careful valuation is made, the Government will take the matter into their careful consideration to see that such steps are taken as can be taken to put the fund into a condition of solvency. With regard to the dates in 1885, I may explain that the valuation referred to the condition of the fund on the last day of 1884, and it was received in the middle of 1885. I am afraid that the question as to exactly what Government was in Office is rather doubtful. The probability is rather in favour of the last Government but three. I do not commit myself to a positive statement on that matter, but it was not the present Government, and not the last Government but one, but either the last Government but two or the last Government but three. Then there was this sum of £90,000, which was due to Irish education in some form or other as an equivalent to the English free school grant, and it was represented to Her Majesty's Government that it could not be applied to free education in Ireland, because the fees had already been paid for the current year. The Government could not find any object on which it could be spent which seemed more in the interests of Irish education than applying it to this fund and putting it in a condition of solvency. By the rules of 1885, the teachers received greater benefits from the fund without being called upon to subscribe more to secure them. The object of the present proposal is to continue those benefits at the low subscription under the Act of 1879. I am sorry that more time has not been given to the Irish teachers and Members of Parliament to consider the matter. There is a great deal of force in the suggestion that the matter should be dealt with by Bill, but it is necessary that the money should be disposed of before the 31st of March of this year, or it will have to be paid back to the Consolidated Fund and go towards the reduction of the National Debt. There is, therefore, scarcely time to pass an ordinary Bill on the subject, and I thought hon. Gentlemen from Ireland would accept it in the form of a Supplementary Estimate, which would be equally conducive to their interests.

(7.5.) COLONEL NOLAN (Louth, N.): I cannot quite understand the position with regard to this money which belongs to the Irish teachers, and has been simply confiscated by the Treasury. This sum of £90,000 became due last year, and we were told that it was the equivalent to the £500,000 or £600,000 which was the proportion of England. The then Chief Secretary for Ireland said:—

"I have a delightful scheme by which this sum will come into my fund for making my Land Act perfectly secure."

We Irish Members protested against the money being confiscated in that way, and the disposal of the money was postponed till this year. Now it ought to go to the teachers in some form or other. They may give it in the shape of class salaries, pensions, or capitation grants as they choose; but they are not going to do that. The Government have no right to dispose of this money as they are proposing to do. This fund was started in 1879 with £1,300,000 from the Irish Church surplus and went on well till 1885, and then the Treasury comes forward and says it will increase the benefits to the teachers. I do not know which Government it was, but it is a significant fact that whenever there is a dispute as to Ireland's share of any advantages Ireland always goes to the wall. In 1885 you made us a present of £196,000, and now you want to take it back again, which is the way you always behave towards Ireland. You have no right to give and take in this manner. Last year you told us that Ireland was to get a proportional share of the Grant, and now you are giving us none at all. You are putting the £90,000 into a reserve fund of the Treasury, and the teachers will get no benefit from it. Then what is the cost of administering the Fund?

MR. JACKSON: There is no cost of administration.

COLONEL NOLAN: In 1885 you pretended to make a gift to Ireland of £196,000; what right have you in 1892 to take this £90,000 to make up that original sum without the consent of the Irish Members? If I can get any of my hon. Friends to support me I shall be inclined to vote against this £90,000. I do not believe it will be confiscated on the 31st of March. It is confiscated already. The teachers lose it actually either with or without the consent of the Irish Members, and I rather think the latter way is the better of the two.

*SIR JOHN GORST: In 1885 fresh rules were made under Section 10 of the Act of 1879, which empowers the Treasury, at any time after the passing of the Act, with the consent of the Lord Lieutenant, to make rules from time to time for the administration of the Act. These are the rules which prescribe the amount of benefit to be given to the teachers under the Act. The new rules of 1885 gave the teachers greater benefits, the Treasury being under the impression that the fund was more than solvent. The fund was, however, found to be less than solvent on an actuarial examination in 1891, and it was found that unless something of this sort were done, some capital sum carried to the relief of the fund, teachers entering the service in the future would have less benefits than those at present in the service are receiving. The fund was created out of the Irish Church surplus, and the investment of the fund is prescribed by the Act, so that the Office of the Treasury is purely ministerial in carrying out its provisions. It is only on the fund created by Parliament that the teachers have any claim, and therefore if that fund is insufficient without a subvention of this kind it becomes the duty of the Treasury to make fresh rules which would give less benefits to teachers.

*(7.15.) MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): The statement of the Secretary to the Treasury was perfectly clear, but I do not think it will be very satisfactory to Irish Members. The Actuarial Report in 1885 showed a surplus of £195,000, but we are told that the Actuarial Report in 1890 showed a deficit of £190,000, and now there is another Actuarial Committee sitting to inquire into its actual state. Will this £90,000 make the fund solvent? At any rate it will help in that direction, and I must not be taken as objecting to it. I want to point out that we have one precedent for dealing with this fund. Last year the Constabulary Pension Fund was found to be in the same condition—insolvent. But the Government did not take any money of this kind to make it up; the Government made it up themselves. I think the Irish teachers are entitled to this money, and if there be a deficiency in the Fund I do not say that this is not a good way of meeting it. But I should like some explanation from some Member of the Government as to the difference in the treatment of the two Funds.

(7.20.) MR. J. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I want to know if there is any precedent in the history of Parliament for calling upon a Committee of this House to vote a large sum of money to make good a deficiency in a fund when nobody knows if there is a deficiency at all? I understood the Secretary to the Treasury to say that the actuary who made the valuation in 1885, and the one in 1890, producing such utterly different results, is one and the same individual. If that be so, no reliance can be placed on the valuation of that gentleman. We are left entirely in the dark as to the deficit, and the Government has appointed a committee of this gentleman and two others to look into the matter. Yet we are asked to vote this £90,000 to make up the deficit while that committee is still sitting, and has not yet reported. The Government has given us no reason for believing in this deficit at all, and it is most unjust to the teachers to take the money and apply it in this way. If the Government had been able to deal with the money when it dealt with the grants to England and Scotland the teachers would now have been in the enjoyment of it; and if the fund had then been found to be insolvent, does anyone doubt for a moment that it would have been held to be the duty of the Government to make up the deficiency which had arisen entirely from their maladministration. The Irish teachers are admittedly the worst paid in the three countries, and that makes it a greater hardship that this money should be disposed of as the Government proposes. Last year the principle on which the Chancellor of the Exchequer laid it down that this money was to be distributed to the three countries was most unjust. On what ground was it decided that Ireland was only to have 9 per cent. of the total sum? The Government proclaims itself Unionist and determined to keep Ireland part of the United Kingdom, but when it comes to distributing money they are Separatists, and set up a totally different principle to guide our finance. The right hon. Gentleman, instead of taking the number of children to be provided for and giving the grant at so much per head on the school attendance, as in the other two countries, asks us to accept from him what are the relative contributions from the three countries to the Imperial funds, which contributions are calculated by him in the dark, and which he gives us no means of checking. We are told over and over again that Ireland is to share to the fullest extent in all the benefits of a division as part and parcel of the United Kingdom. Here, because she is the poorest part of the Kingdom, and, according to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, only contributes 9 per cent. of the Imperial funds, her school children are to get a very much smaller grant per head than those of the other parts of the Kingdom. I want to know on what ground he justifies that proportion. Scotland is treated far more justly than Ireland is. The principle which underlies the distribution is the principle of separatism in finance. When the question of the distribution of money comes to be considered, the Government are Separatists and not Unionists; they act as Separatists in the matter of finance, and in that only. Instead of giving the grant at a rate per head of the children attending school, as they do in England, they act on the principle of the relative contributions of the three countries, and even then they give us no means of checking the figures. In conclusion, I have only to say that in my judgment the appropriation of this £90,000 to make good a mistake of the actuaries in regard to the Teachers' Pension Fund is a great injustice to the teachers of Ireland. The Government are responsible for the mistake that has been made, and I hold that it is their duty to make good any deficiency out of Imperial funds, <sup>(7.35.)</sup> SIR JOHN GORST (Chatham): I am anxious that the House should understand how this matter stands. As to the question of the proportion which Ireland ought to have, I admit that it is, upon the whole, a very large question, and I must decline to go into it.

This is not the time when such a matter can be approached. But I wish to state to the House that the figure before the Committee was based upon the very best information which was accessible to the Government, as to the proportion of revenue paid by the three parts of the United Kingdom respectively.

MR. J. DILLON: Is it based upon that principle?

*SIR JOHN GORST: It is based upon that principle. The Chancellor of the Exchequer is most anxious to have the matter investigated, and it is not the fault of my right hon. Friend, nor is it the fault of the Government, but because of the opposition coming from other quarters of the House, that an independent Committee has not been appointed before now to ascertain the justice or otherwise of the amount to be paid to Ireland.

MR. J. DILLON: It is the principle I object to.

*SIR JOHN GORST: That is quite another matter. With regard to the fund, there is little doubt that it is at present insolvent. The actuarial calculations in 1885, after the fund had been only five years in operation, was necessarily based a good deal on conjecture or opinion rather than upon fact; but the calculation made in 1891, after more than ten years' experience, was to a much greater extent based on fact as distinct from opinion, and therefore it is more likely to be correct. However that may be, I can assure the House that every single penny of that £90,000 will go to the benefit of the teachers, whatever may be the results of the investigation of experts. Supposing the fund is proved to be solvent, then the whole of the £90,000 will go to the benefit of the Irish teachers; and if it be insolvent, the money will go to relieve the teachers from the reductions which they might otherwise be compelled to submit to. I think it only right that the House should understand the question, and I think I have made plain the reasons for submitting the Vote now before the House.

<sup>(7.42.)</sup> SIR UGHTRED KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: It is gratifying to find that the whole of this money should be going to the teachers. But, at the same time, it is right that attention should be called to the loose way in which public money is being dealt with. I think this should not be left to Irish Members, and that the House has reason to complain that, although the Government and the House are alike in the dark as to the state of this fund, a Vote should be asked for.

(7.50.) MR. SEXTON: I must confess that this whole arrangement looks excessively awkward. Three explanations have already been placed before the House, and it is difficult to understand any one of them. I should say that if the English Government persist in managing Irish affairs in this fashion, Irishmen will be justified in the impression that they can manage their affairs better themselves. I do not admit the distinction the Secretary to the Treasury attempts to draw between school teachers and the Constabulary, and I contend that the school teachers are just as much officers of State as any other body of men, and that they should be treated accordingly. In fact, there is a large amount of suspended judgment in regard to this Vote, and I think it is perfectly plain that we cannot pass it to-night, considering the important fact that the representations upon which it has been presented are, to say the least of it, inexact. I think the Vote ought to be adjourned until such times as the Report of the Committee of Experts has been placed before the House, and I must protest against the Vote until we have some assurance that the teachers will benefit by the Vote.

- SIR JOHN GORST: I wish the Committee to understand that under any circumstances, whatever may be the result of the investigation, the whole of the £90,000 will go to the benefit of the National School teachers.

(7.55.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I understand from the statement of the Secretary to the Treasury that this money is not to benefit a single teacher. Is it not a fact that no existing teacher will get one single penny of benefit out of this £90,000? Let the House recollect that the money ought to be given to the Irish teachers in exactly the same proportion as it was given to the English teachers. It appears from the statement of the right hon. Gentleman that the Irish teachers are not going to get any benefit from the grant; not one single penny of benefit are they likely to derive.

Sir Ughtred Kay-Shuttleworth

If you apply the money in this manner it simply means that it is going to make out Treasury balances. I think the teachers, roughly speaking, ought to get £8 or £9 apiece as back money. If you give this £90,000 to the Irish teachers, almost exactly as you have given the money to the English teachers, then you will be doing justice.

MR. JACKSON: With respect to the opinion of the class of persons interested in this matter, I think it right that I should read to the House the following telegram, which I have just received:—

"The Executive Committee of the Irish National teachers authorise me to state that they heartily endorse the allocation of the £90,000 to the pension fund."

From that it appears that the National School teachers highly desire the allocation of the £90,000 to the pension fund; and probably that may assist the House in coming to a decision on the matter.

*(8.3.) MR. WEBB (Waterford, W.): Our contention is that the Government find that a mistake has been made; it is the Government that ought to pay for that mistake; and the £90,000 ought to be paid additionally to the teachers. The manner in which this is brought before the House is very extraordinary. First we were told that there was a deficit in this fund, then we are told that this was very doubtful and that there is a Committee sitting upon it; and now, when it suits the convenience of the Government, we are told that there is no doubt whatever about it. If there is no doubt whatever about it I do not understand why a Committee should be appointed at all. It has been asserted by the Government that they have not the same responsibility towards the National School teachers as towards the Constabulary of Ireland. We know the Constabulary is considered a more important force in Ireland in the government of the country than the teachers. That the people should become better educated and better able to do for themselves is a matter of small importance. As to the treatment of the Irish National teachers, during the last ten years I have myself known instances where National teachers, because they had opinions of their own as to political questions and political reforms which were afterwards carried out by the Government, were obliged to give up their situations and leave the country. It is idle to say that the Government are not as much responsible to them as to the Constabulary. I trust this Vote will not be allowed to pass without being brought to a Division.

(8.5.) MR. PIERCE MAHONY (Meath, N.): The right hon. Gentleman has just read a telegram which he has received from the Irish National teachers approving of the allocation of this money to the Pension Fund. Perhaps he could also tell us whether the National teachers of Ireland or their Association are aware of how this money is to be applied—whether it is to be applied to the Pension Fund or not?

MR. JACKSON: Yes, I should say they are.

MR. MAHONY: Might I ask are they aware of the alleged deficit in the Fund? What we are asked to believe is this: that an Association representing the existing body of the National teachers of Ireland wish this sum of money to which they are entitled as individuals to be used for the benefit of teachers in the future—that they wish it to be used for the benefit of a Fund from which they will not derive one single halfpenny. That may be a very praiseworthy state of mind of the Association, but I, for one, have very serious doubts on the subject. I do not believe that the National School Teachers' Association have at all realised how this fund is to be applied. I do not believe that they realise the fact that they as individuals will not benefit to the extent of a single halfpenny if this £90,000 is to be granted to the Fund. That is why the right hon. Gentleman said the Government were not responsible to the present teachers.

SIR JOHN GORST: What I said was that the new rules could not be altered as applied to the existing teachers, and that if this fund is inadequate a reduction would be made all round.

MR. MAHONY: We are now told that the Treasury of this great Empire makes rules with regard to certain servants.

SIR JOHN GORST: With regard to the beneficiaries, the Government make rules under an Act of Parliament regarding the beneficiaries of a certain statutory fund.

MR. MAHONY: The Government make rules with regard to certain of its servants. A Minister of the Crown gets up and says these rules cannot be altered as regards the existing servants of the State. One would naturally suppose that the Government, who were responsible for framing the rules, and who have no power to alter the rules regarding the existing servants of the State—that the Government of this great Empire would at any rate undertake that the servants of the State will receive what they are entitled to. The right hon. Gentleman does not say that if there was a deficit under these rules this House would not make it good. But what we are asked is quite a different matter. We are asked to take this sum of money, this £90,000 to which the National School teachers are entitled and ought to get, and transfer it to a fund which will benefit not the people entitled to this £90,000, but some future teachers in Ireland. I think it is most unjust to the present body of National teachers in Ireland, and I am confident that the telegram sent to the right hon. Gentleman was sent in ignorance of the facts, because the teachers in Ireland at the present moment are not in a position to understand the facts. There seems still to exist a very great doubt regarding this fund. But under any circumstances, whether a deficit exists or not, I do not see how it is just to the present teachers in Ireland to take away this sum of £90,000, to which they are entitled, and put it to a fund which will not benefit them individually, but some future teachers.

(8.15.) SIR JOSEPH MCKENNA (Monaghan, S.): I believe this to be absolutely a misappropriation of this fund. A fund that was intended for the immediate benefit of the teachers in Ireland is, by a Vote in Committee, to be allocated to make good a mistake made by an actuary in the Treasury some years ago. I think this actuary has proved himself unfit to make such calculations at all; and if his calculations in the first instance were wrong, and if they are right now, it does not alter, in my opinion, the appropriation of this £90,000, which was intended for the immediate benefit of the existing teachers. The late Secretary to the Treasury has read a telegram from the secretary of the teacher's body in Ireland or some other representative. I should like to know in reply to what communication that was read.

MR. JACKSON: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will allow me to say that no communication was made; that the telegram came to me quite spontaneously, and was received by me quite unexpectedly, and that is all I know about it.

SIR JOSEPH MCKENNA: I am sure the right hon. Gentleman has given entirely what has occurred; but I venture to think that the gentleman who sent it was entirely ignorant of the circumstances which surround this question; and, therefore, I think we should treat the matter as if the telegram had not been sent at all, and we must fall back upon our own common sense in this matter. I hope that when this Vote is put from the Chair every Irish Member in the House, on whatever side of the House he may sit, will vote against such a misappropriation, for it appears to me to be a misappropriation of this Fund.

*(8.17.) MR. HAYDEN (Leitrim, S.): We have been told, and we have no reason to doubt the statement, that there is a deficit of £195,000. The Chief Secretary and the Secretary to the Treasury say that unless this deficit is made good new rules would have to be made; but we are told at the same time that the rules cannot be changed; so that the existing teachers are concerned. But are we to understand that a deficit exists to the extent of £195,000, that the teachers are to suffer, and that the Government will not make it good? As regards the case of the Constabulary, it has been very well pointed out by the hon. Member for South Tyrone and the hon. Member for West Belfast that this fund was not a fund originally started by the Government, but contributed to by the police themselves, and therefore stands in the same position as the Teachers' Pension Fund, so far as Government responsibility was concerned. Neither the teachers of Ireland nor the people had anything whatever to say to the administration of this fund, and I do not think that either the teachers or the Irish people should be made responsible for it. I think, before this Vote passes, it ought to be made clear whether the Government intend to make good the deficit, and whether steps should not be taken in future to see that the fund was kept in a sound condition?

*(8.20.) MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.): I entirely agree with the hon. Gentleman who has just spoken. The remedy which the Government propose is the old one of robbing Peter to pay Paul. I do not think the House ought to consent to any such bargain with them. As has been pointed out by more than one Member of the House with regard to their dealing with the police, wherever the money came from, the Government always took care that those who were breaking men's heads should get their pay, and there have been a large number of men pensioned for breaking people's heads, and for no other reason that I know of. And it has been often pointed out that while the police are paid big salaries and pensions the poor teachers, who are endeavouring to develop the brain-power of the people and give them an education, are utterly neglected. With nothing except coercion from the present Government during the past five years, the people have been told that they are not fit for Home Rule; but I think that the mismanagement of this Fund shows that the British Government is not fit to administer the funds of the country at all. What would be the action of the Government if this happened in a Board of Guardians in Ireland? I have known several Boards of Guardians, composed of men who gave their services voluntarily to the public service, who came long distances at their own expense to attend the Board meetings, and the Boards got into debt. What was the procedure? Why, they were suspended at once. They were not paid large salaries, like Members of the Government, for looking after the public interest, but they were suspended peremptorily by an order from Dublin Castle. And the coming County Councils that are going to be newly appointed are to be put into the dock for less than this. I should like we had the power to put the Government in the dock for such administration as has been disclosed in this House to-night. I shall resist the passing of this Vote until the assurance is given that this deficit is to be made good. I am quite of opinion that if the gentlemen—the associated Irish teachers—on whose behalf this telegram has been sent to the Chief Secretary, were aware of the fact that this money is gone astray and that they are likely to be deprived of it entirely, they would not have sent any such telegram. I shall not trespass on the time of the House any longer, but I hope every hon. Member in the House will press this question until we get an assurance that the Government will make good the deficit. If the gentleman who was in control of this fund was in a City counting-house and could not account for his employers' money they would put the detectives on his track, and keep him under observation until they got satisfactory evidence on the subject. We have got responsible Ministers under observation, and we will keep them there until we have got sufficient satisfaction on the subject.

(8.25.) COLONEL NOLAN: I look upon this case as one calling for the most careful investigation. This is one of the few cases that come before the House of Commons in which Irishmen can actually obtain money for a very valuable class in Ireland, and a considerable sum—£90,000—by forcing this question on the attention of the country. I suppose the telegram from the National Teachers' Association was from some members sitting in Dublin, and who had got some short account that £90,000 was to be allocated for the Pension Fund, and they thought they would relieve their feelings by trying to get a larger pension. I do not believe—I say it is impossible—that the report of this Debate that occurred here up to eight o'clock could have reached them; and they have evidently sent this telegram in sublime ignorance of everything that has happened in this House. I always suspected that this £90,000 would be collared; I always suspected that some of this £90,000 would be taken away from the teachers. The teachers have not had their suspicions aroused; but if they heard the position taken up by the Secretary to the Treasury to-night I think they would alter their opinion. In 1879 certain calculations were made, and in 1885 the Treasury suggested that it would be well if the fund could be stretched out a little more. Then as regards these quinquennial periods, the Secretary to the Treasury has not been exactly frank with us.

SIR JOHN GORST: There was a quinquennial period in 1884; in 1885 new rules were made. They came into force in 1886, and the new quinquennial period was therefore 1891.

COLONEL NOLAN: The actuary has made no suggestion that his calculations in 1885 were wrong; but supposing they are wrong, they have no right to take this £90,000 simply to rectify the error of one of their own officials. I do think this £90,000 ought to be given to the teachers. It will really be a great deal to them, and will help to place them on a footing of equality with the English teachers.

*(9.5.) MR. LENG (Dundee): I should not have interfered in the discussion upon Irish Estimates if I did not feel that this was not entirely an Irish question. We are suffering from the strange fatality which has attended all proposals resulting from the vicious system of finance introduced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in creating a surplus by levying taxes before knowing that its object was approved by the country, and then fishing for other purposes to which that surplus might be applied. We Scotch Members spent a whole night last week in discussing the equivalent grant for Scotland, and then towards midnight it was found that our whole time had been wasted; and here to-night it must be admitted that the Committee is in a financial muddle. We are told that there is a deficit of £195,000 on the Report of an actuary in the service of the country. But the Government are not satisfied, or they would not have appointed two other actuaries to make inquiries. If all three were to be unanimous, it would be an exceedingly suspicious, and almost unprecedented, circumstance. It may prove that the deficit is less, and if so this Vote will be too much; or it may prove that the deficit is even greater than has been reported, and then this Vote will not be enough. But whether the deficit is too much or too little, I agree with hon. Gentlemen from Ireland that this money should not be applied to the Pension Fund, but should be devoted to educational purposes, and that before the money is so allocated further explanations are required.

(9.12.) MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): In the course of the few remarks I made a few nights ago on the introduction of the Government Bill, I stated that I should not oppose the appropriation of £90,000 for increasing the National Teachers' Fund, and I feel, therefore, it is necessary for me to offer some explanation of the Motion I am now about to make for reporting Progress. It is in no spirit of opposition to the appropriation of the £90,000 that I make this Motion, but because I object to taking a leap in the dark as we are invited to do by the Government this evening. There is every reason for delay. A sort of appeal ad misericordiam has been made to us on behalf of the teachers; but I hold it would be the falsest economy to devote this sum to bolstering up a fund which needs to be investigated. No damage can be done to the teachers by withholding this grant for a little time; for the £90,000 will still be there, and will be increased by interest while it is invested. What the Irish teachers want is a fund administered on a solid basis. They wish to have established a permanent, solvent, and properly-managed fund; and if the £90,000 be added to it, when it has been placed on a solid basis, it will be a substantial advantage to the teachers; but according to the proposition now made it would only be a something thrown in to fill up a gap. For these reasons I beg to move that you now report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. J. O'Connor.)

(9.20.) MR. JACKSON: I do not believe the hon. Member thinks for a moment that the Government will consent to report Progress. The case has been stated with great clearness by the Secretary to the Treasury; but hon. Members opposite have seemed to lose sight of or to ignore the fact that if this fund has been brought into this condition, it is because too large an amount of benefit has been given to the teachers who have been admitted to it. It is quite clear from the Act that it is our duty from time to time to have these actuarial valuations made, and it is also clear that it is open to the Treasury from time to time to vary, revoke, or alter the terms and rules regulating the distribution of the pensions. There can only be two alternatives: either we must use this money to add to the Pension Fund, or changes must be made which will give to the teachers less benefit. I have already stated that I am informed that the Teachers' Association endorse the allocation of the £90,000 in the manner now proposed, but I think the Member for West Belfast was not in his place when I read the telegram.

MR. SEXTON: I have heard of it.

MR. JACKSON: I only mention it because the hon. Member referred to a letter received from teachers taking a different view.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the teachers who signed that telegram are aware of the unsatisfactory state of the fund, as it has been stated here?

MR. JACKSON: I have told the Committee all I know on the subject of the telegram, which came quite unexpectedly; but I think the question is one of such interest to the teachers that they will have already very closely followed what has been said upon the subject. After listening carefully to the speeches made this evening, I see no reason for reporting Progress, or for altering in any degree the proposed allocation of the grant. It belongs to the teachers only, and the Fund cannot be diverted to any other purpose than for benefitting them. It was intended, when the Act was passed, that the interest on £1,300,000, plus the contributions of the teachers themselves, should be so dealt with that the benefits to be given should not exceed the resources of the fund so constituted. Up to 1885 the experience was short, and the actuarial valuation then made showed that there was a surplus. For some time past the teachers desired, and they still desire, as hon. Members from Ireland must be aware, to get larger benefits from the Fund, and that in many ways modifications should be made. There is no doubt that in 1885 the Treasury, believing that the condition of the fund justified some relaxation of the rules, assented to some increased benefits being given to the teachers. There are many ways in which the question of solvency can be affected, and I may mention what has been the result of increasing the age at which teachers are admitted. It is obvious that if they are admitted at a later age than formerly, the tendency is to limit the period of years during which they will be on the Fund. There has been a growing tendency for teachers to pass examinations so as to enable them to get into the second and first classes, and the proportion of teachers in the first, second, and third classes is so much altered from what it was that there is in the Fund a very much higher percentage of the first and second class, and a very much less percentage of the third class.

MR. SEXTON: Do they not pay into the fund according to their class salary?

MR. JACKSON: No; they do not pay according to their class salary, and that is rather important. In the Act the number of the first and second class is limited, and the result is that supposing the number of the first class was limited to 150, although there may be 400 of the first class on the Fund, only 150 can contribute towards it, according to the first-class salary. Supposing a teacher is classed as a first class, and in receipt of a first-class salary, if he does not contribute to the Fund as a first-class teacher, and supposing he retired, and was pensioned during that period, he would only be pensioned in accordance with the second class, he having contributed as a second-class teacher. But it must be borne in mind that the limit is only as regards contributions to the fund, and not as to the number of pensions to be given.

MR. SEXTON: Does the right hon. Gentleman say that a man who can pay only at the second-class rate may get a first-class pension?

MR. JACKSON: I mean to say that he may have paid at the second-class rate up to last year—I am putting this as a mere illustration, and not binding myself to any particular order—and then this year get into the first class; and if then he happened to be pensioned, he would be pensioned on the first-class rate. When the valuation was made in 1885 and it was found there was this surplus, there was an anxiety to give the teachers the benefit of this improvement in the Fund. Now, further experience goes to show that the additional advantages given at that time have been just sufficient to turn the scale in the opposite direction. I have given very anxious consideration to the question. I think it is of great importance that we should take this opportunity of making this contribution to the Fund. There is no doubt the question will have to be faced as to what is going to be done with regard to the Fund. No doubt the Fund shows a deficit on the valuation; but the Treasury, in order to be quite certain about the matter, have decided to have the actuarial valuation again checked. I do not think there is the smallest hope that they will be able to show that the valuation that has been made is otherwise than a correct one. It will be some time before we can know the result of the further examination that is being made; but I put it to hon. Members—assuming what I have said to be correct, that there has been a disposition to give more to the teachers than the fund would bear—is there any purpose to which we could devote this money that would be more agreeable and more satisfactory to the teachers themselves? It is desirable, if we can, to maintain the advantages that have been given to the teachers under the old rules. It is very undesirable, I think, to alter these rules if we can avoid it; but the alternative is either to make this contribution now or endeavour to modify, it may be, the conditions under which the Fund has been administered so that there should be brought about a state of solvency. With regard to the school fees, it may be that they will have to continue even for a while longer—certainly until we get our Education Bill passed. I do not know what may be the view taken in the future, but I do feel it is incumbent upon us, now that we have found out the position we are in with regard to the Fund, to make this contribution to it, and this is the view of the Teachers' Association. I believe this is a wise allocation of the money, and I hope the Committee will not agree to reporting Progress, but allow us to take the Vote.

(9.35.) DR. CLARK (Caithness): I think the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman are rather in favour of reporting Progress, because the Government have no right to ask us to vote this money until they are satisfied it is really required and until they verify their facts. When they have verified their facts and know the exact amount of money they want, then they can come to Parliament and ask us to vote the money. I think this is the first time since I have been in the House that I have seen a real Irish financial grievance. I will also support the Motion on another ground. I think the Government would have been wise if they had adopted the precedent of the Irish Constabulary Pension Fund, and voted the money in the same fashion.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The Motion before the Committee is to report Progress. If the discussion on the Vote is to go on, the Motion to report Progress should be withdrawn.

DR. CLARK: I was going to argue that it is desirable for the Government on many grounds to withdraw this Vote altogether and bring it up in another shape. The statement of the Chief Secretary for Ireland is rather in favour of reporting Progress. Let the Treasury wait until they have verified their facts and figures, and then come before us and tell us what they have done.

(9.40.) COLONEL NOLAN: I think there is a good case to be made out for postponing the Vote, to give us an opportunity of knowing what the teachers of Ireland think of the matter themselves. I think it would be better for the Secretary to the Treasury to withdraw the Vote now. It is so unbusiness-like on the part of the Treasury to come down here and ask us to come suddenly to a decision on a question of figures, when we have heard for the first time of these actuarial calculations. We have only gradually extracted from the Treasury a good many of the financial facts. We have drawn them out one by one but we do not yet know the whole facts of the case. If the Vote was postponed for three or four days and all the figures were laid on the Table, we would then be in a better position to come to a decision. The Government may frighten the teachers, but I do not think they will frighten the Irish Members. We know that in the long run the money will come back to the teachers in some way or other. I think a very fair case has been made out for postponing this Vote. We have not the materials in our possession for forming a correct conclusion upon the matter. The Government themselves are not thoroughly well informed, and perhaps, in a day or two they will be properly coached by the officials of the Treasury.

(9.43.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I hope hon. Members will not press this Motion. The way matters stand is this. I do not propose to traverse again the grounds so admirably mapped out by my right hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury. This money will go to the Irish teachers, whether the Fund be insolvent, whether it be solvent, or whether it be more than solvent. If it be insolvent, the money will go to diminish the insolvency; if it be solvent it will go to increase the benefits to the teachers; if it be more than solvent, it will still go to the same excellent object. Whatever the condition of the fund, and whatever the actuarial calculations ultimately determined upon by the various experts, this £90,000 will go to the Teachers' Pension Fund in augmentation of the money they would otherwise derive. That, at all events, is perfectly clear, and I do not propose to dwell upon it any longer. Now, what hon. Members say is this—“There is an inquiry going on to investigate the precise amount of the deficiency. Wait until the inquiry has come to a conclusion before asking for a Vote of this money.” These calculations are of so difficult and laborious a character that there is not the slightest possibility that they can be completed and in the hands of Members before the end of the financial year. I do not pretend that the £90,000 is not due to Ireland. I think it is due to Ireland. I think it extremely doubtful if the thing is hung up whether the Vote will go to the teachers at all. The teachers, as teachers, have no claim to it whatever. If you are going to follow in Ireland the precise analogy of England it will go to the parents, and not to the teachers. There are in Ireland large bodies of public opinion desirous of promoting technical education among other most valuable objects. Let it be understood if this Vote is adjourned it will not come on in the course of the Parliamentary financial year, and the money will this year go to the extinction of the National Debt. There is no question about that, and when, either in this Session or some subsequent Session, this House took into consideration the things to which this money shall be voted, there is no security or probability that it will necessarily go to the particular object to which this Government desire to vote it. Under these circumstances, I ask hon. Gentlemen not to postpone indefinitely the decision of this question to-night. There is other very pressing and important Business of interest to Irish Members before us, and I would ask them to be content with a Debate which has proved this, at all events, conclusively : that whatever is the state of the Fund the Irish National teachers will benefit by this allocation, and let us pass to other not less interesting and important matters.

(9.47.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): The Government have changed their ground considerably since the opening of the Debate. When this Debate opened to-night, the evidence before us was a positive declaration that a deficit had arisen which this grant of £90,000 would partly meet. Now, the First Lord rises and delivers a strictly hypothetical statement. He says, "If there be a deficiency this grant will go to meet it."

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no doubt there is a deficiency.

MR. SEXTON: He put it in the form that if there is any deficiency this money will go to the teachers. That is what I do not see. These teachers are entitled to certain benefits. They will receive no new benefits unless new rules are made. What assurance have we that new rules will be made?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: This £90,000 may be considered as added to the £1,113,000. The Treasury are bound to make rules by which that £1,113,000 will be allocated to the teachers.

MR. SEXTON: There are two sets of rules. The teachers are entitled to certain benefits, and these benefits must be made good by the Treasury. ["No!"] Does the Chief Secretary mean by that "no," that after men and women have been paying into this Pension Fund you can alter these rules so as to take away the benefits conferred on them? I say that is impossible. There is a contract, amounting to a statutory contract, between the Treasury and the teachers, and it would be impossible to alter it.

VOL. I. [NEW SERIES.]

We have no means of satisfying ourselves, if we were to vote this money, that it would secure the teachers any further benefit. That would be at the discretion of the Treasury. We know how plausible the Treasury is at the moment when it is seeking a concession, and how slippery it is afterwards. I am sorry the First Lord has made an attempt to overbear Members of Parliament by threatening us that unless we consent to pass this Vote the money will not go to the teachers. What right has the right hon. Gentleman to take to dictating to the Committee?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The postponement is asked for on the ground that the investigation is not terminated, and it will not be terminated before the end of the financial year.

MR. SEXTON: Is it not strange that the right hon. Gentleman is able to say the valuation will not be completed before the 31st March? Upon what day were these gentlemen set to work? Where is the letter appointing them? How long have they been at work? How long will they be at work? Did the actuary who made the calculation of 1891 make any Report? If he made a Report that the fund is £90,000 to the bad, let that Report be produced. I suppose all the business at the Treasury is not by word of mouth. There is, I suppose, some written correspondence. I hope it will not be considered too much to ask that proof of the deficiency of last year should be placed in our hands. I think I can throw some light on the telegram which the Chief Secretary read. I take it that the telegram came from the Executive Body of the National teachers in Dublin.

MR. JACKSON: Yes.

MR. SEXTON: That is a body of 20 gentlemen living in Dublin who have sent the telegram without sufficient information, and probably because those gentlemen were aware that last year the right hon. Gentleman, who is now First Lord, proposed to apply this £90,000 to his Irish Land Purchase Act reserve fund which has not worked at all. The teachers naturally preferred that the money should be given to the Pension Fund rather than to the Purchase Act reserve fund. I beg the Committee therefore to discount the telegram from the Executive of the National teachers. I would respectfully ask the First Lord if he can see his way to accept the Motion to report Progress. I cannot honestly vote away £90,000 without knowing why. Let him consent to the adjournment, so that he may procure some general memorandum from the three actuaries, or else show us the document upon which the actuaries calculated last year that the fund was in an unsound state. If he does so, I do not think he will find the progress of Business has been injured.

(9.55.) MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I say we have no information to justify the statement that there is any deficit at all. The actuarial calculation of 1883, which was very elaborate, is now in the Library. The actuarial valuation of 1891 has been carefully concealed by the Government, until it suited their purpose to quote it; and they have quoted it without putting it on the Table, or supplying Members with the information it contains. It is very curious that we have not seen this document showing that there is a deficiency. The right hon. Gentleman, now the First Lord, when he was Chief Secretary, made a statement as to the capital of this fund in the month of May, and from that it appears that the interest alone on the £1,300,000 was £39,000, showing a surplus of £2,000 on that item alone. Besides that, you were receiving from the National Debt Commissioners £8,000 by way of interest and premiums to the extent of £9,000 a year. Therefore, you had a surplus of £20,000, and that fact is borne out by this, that you transferred from income to capital account last year no less than £27,000.

MR. JACKSON: I think the hon. Gentleman overlooks the fact that what he has quoted is the question of receipts and expenditure. The question of solvency depended upon the actuarial estimate of what will happen to the Fund in the course of years when certain charges fall upon it.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: The explanation appears to be a little elementary. Any-one can make this calculation for himself. I have been at the trouble to check the calculation of 1883, and I think I can see one or two points on which the actuary has made a mistake. I am not at all satisfied that the actuarial estimate laid before the Treasury for the year 1891 is any more accurate than the actuarial estimate made in 1885. Before I am asked to vote on the strength of it, I should like to see the actuarial estimate examined. The First Lord of the Treasury says this £90,000 is to go to the teachers.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I said it belongs to Ireland, and that we propose to give it to the teachers.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: The right hon. Gentleman appeared to lead the House to suppose that he was speaking in the interest of the teachers. He was not doing so. He was speaking in the interest of the Government, as shown plainly by the words of the Act. The 7th section says—

"If at any time the Pension Fund shall be insufficient for the repayment of the advances by the National Debt Commissioners for the pensions payable to the teachers, the Treasury, upon being informed thereof by the Commissioners for the reduction of the National Debt, shall issue the amount of such deficiency out of the Consolidated Fund, and the growing produce thereof, and the Treasury shall certify such deficiency to Parliament."

So that, in reality, this apparent anxiety for the interest of the teachers is merely an anxiety to save the Treasury; and in order to enable the Treasury to perform this little evolution we are asked to vote in the dark a sum of £90,000, which it is admitted ought to go to benefit the position of the teachers, but which the First Lord thinks will go to pay part of the National Debt. It is mere affectation for the First Lord of the Treasury to say that whatever happens to this Fund the teachers can suffer. You have entered into a contract with every one of them. The interests of the teachers will not be hurt in any way if this question be held over till we have an opportunity of seeing the actuarial report.

(10.2.) SIR UGHRED KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH (Lancashire, Clitheroe): It seems to me that the Government are in this position. They find themselves under two obligations to Ireland. The first obligation is to give to Ireland, in some shape or form, this grant of £90,000, or whatever sum may be her fair proportion equivalent to that given to England in the form of the fee grant. The other obligation is to keep this Teachers' Pension Fund in a state of solvency. If this Fund were to break down it would be a great disappointment to a large number of teachers, and the Act says that under certain circumstances the Treasury is to meet any deficiency out of the Consolidated Fund.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The clause to which the right hon. Gentleman refers is one dealing with the capital sum. There is a schedule stating certain benefits which the teachers are to receive, and that would appear to involve an obligation on the Treasury, but if hon. Gentlemen will look at Clause 11 of the Act they will see that it provides—

"That the rules and schedules of this Act may from time to time be revoked, varied, and added to by the Lords of the Treasury."

The duty of the Treasury is simply to see that any teacher gets such pension or benefit as his contributions to the Fund may justify, and that the rules under which teachers receive benefit from the Fund shall, if necessary, be varied in such a way as to keep the Fund solvent, not out of the taxes or funds voted by Parliament, but out of the £1,300,000 of the Irish Church surplus.

SIR JOHN GORST: The clause is no obligation at all—it only applies to such advances as are made from time to time out of the Consolidated Fund, which are to be repaid to the Consolidated Fund. The Act provides—

*"That the Commissioners for the reduction of the National Debt may from time to time until the payment of the whole of the said capital sum of £1,300,000 make advances for the purposes of the Act, and may apply for that purpose any funds for the time being in their hands. All such advances shall be repaid to the Commissioners out of the pension fund, with interest at the rate of 3*1*/2 per cent. per annum. If at any time the Pension Fund shall be insufficient for the repayment of such advances, the Treasury, on being duly informed of it by the Commissioners, shall issue the amount of such deficiency out of the Consolidated Funds of the United Kingdom or out of the growing produce thereof."*

The 7th clause is a provision for advances by the Commissioners till the Irish Church surplus is realised, and for the subsequent repayment of such advances.

SIR UGHTRED KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: The right hon. Gentleman does not answer my point. Supposing this Fund were to be in a much worse state of deficit than was reported last year, do right hon.

Gentlemen opposite mean to say that all they would have to do would be to so whittle down the rules that the expectations held out to the teachers would be falsified? Is it not a fact that they must come to Parliament to make the Fund solvent? It does seem to me there are two obligations: an obligation to pay Ireland an equivalent sum in respect of the fee grants in England; and the other, an old obligation, to keep the Pension Fund solvent. They are trying to meet both obligations by one payment. That is very ingenious on the part of right hon. Gentlemen, but I am not surprised that hon. Gentlemen from Ireland do not look upon the matter in quite the same light.

Question put.

Ayes 106; Noes 132.—(Div. List, No. 10.)

Original Question again proposed.

(10.20.) MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I think it would be well if the Vote were postponed in order that the Committee may have time to get some knowledge of the actuarial report which is now being prepared. No harm can be done by delay. It is very strange that a Fund which was £196,000 to the good in 1885 should be £195,000 to the bad now. The Chief Secretary read a telegram from the Executive of the Irish National Teachers' Association, but we are prepared in the interests of that body to take the responsibility of postponing the Vote. The question of this £90,000 also involves another consideration. The right hon. Gentleman in his argument assumes that there will be a deficit in a very short time; that the actuarial valuation when properly worked out will show a deficit of £195,000; but, Sir, the Government are not sure of that, and I think the Committee is entitled to a fair statement on the matter. The Treasury are not in a position to give us such a statement to-night, and they should, therefore, allow the Vote to be postponed for a week, during which time independent actuaries, of whom there are many connected with large insurance companies, might be employed to work out the calculation. The Chief Secretary was the only Member of the Front Bench who endeavoured to give some explanation of how the deficiency arose, but he was dealing hypothetically with a certain state of things. We want to see exactly how the fund stands. If there is a necessity for £90,000 and the teachers are entitled to it I should be inclined to vote for it. I hope the Government will not press the Vote on to-night, but will bring it forward again when the Irish people, and especially the teachers, will be in a position to judge how the Fund stands at the present moment.

(10.30.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I take the result of the last Division as showing that, though we are in a minority, we are at the same time sufficiently strong to be recognised in this House. The Division has only resulted in a majority of 26 to Her Majesty's Ministers, and I think that fact in itself should be sufficient to remind them to stay their hand. I would suggest that the Report stage in connection with this matter should not be brought on for at least a fortnight, and that before then the figures should be placed in the hands of hon. Members showing what the actual state of the fund really is. This I think would be a proper course for the Government to adopt, having regard to the confusion that exists in the minds of most hon. Members in regard to the figures.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no objection to the Report stage being postponed for a fortnight, as is suggested by the hon. Member; but what I desire to say is that, after the prolonged debate, and, to say the least of it, the exhaustive debate which has taken place, I think the Vote should now be allowed to be taken, so that the House may proceed with some other business.

(10.40.) MR. MAHONY (Meath, N.): I think it must be plain to every Member of the House that the Government are obliged to make good this deficit, and I do not see why the Irish National School teachers should lose in consequence of the default of the Government. I think the Irish National School teachers are being unfairly treated, and that in all the relations of the Government with them their interests have not been fairly considered. I think that the Government are much to blame in this matter, and that there is every reason why they should make good the deficit out of Imperial Funds. If there is any new statement which the Government have to make before we go to a Division, of course we should like to hear it. But if that is the position of the Government, that they cannot alter these rules as regards the present staff of teachers, then the present staff of teachers—

MR. A. J. BALFOUR rose in his place and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

Question put, "That the Question be now put."

(10.45.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 146; Noes 113.—(Div. List, No. 11.)

Original Question put accordingly,

"That a sum, not exceeding £90,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1892, as a Grant in Aid of the Capital of the Pension Fund created under the provisions of 'The National School Teachers (Ireland) Act, 1879.'"

(10.50.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 157; Noes 120.—(Div. List, No. 12.)

Resolution to be reported.

CLASS VII.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I do not intend to oppose the grant of this money, nor do I complain of the money spent last year in relief of distress in Ireland. My observations refer rather to details of administration of the money than to complaint as to the amount of relief afforded. As far as I have been able to ascertain the distress was fully met and adequately dealt with. I do not believe any people in the West of Ireland were left in a state of destitution, and I am perfectly prepared to give credit to the Government for that. Now, Sir, the circumstances that surrounded the institution of these works for the relief of distress leads me to observe that, although representing one of the districts in which most of the money was spent, I had no opportunity of addressing the House on the subject last year. When the knowledge came to us twelve months ago that the West of Ireland was threatened with one of those famines which have unhappily become an institution in Ireland we made an appeal to the Government to investigate this matter, and to take immediate steps for the relief of this distress. Sir, as on previous occasions, our early representations were met with contempt and derision, and it was said that we were raising the cry of pauperism. I can recollect the cruel and insulting articles that appeared in the Times, and the speeches delivered by some gentlemen connected with the Government treating our warnings with contempt. It was not until a somewhat serious and prolonged agitation had taken place in the West that we could induce the Government to take any steps. The then Chief Secretary was engrossed in that recreation in which he is so accomplished a master, and we could not even discover his address. It was only after repeated meetings, and after speeches of a strongly condemnatory character, that the right hon. Gentleman awoke to the seriousness of the situation in Ireland. The present Chief Secretary went to Ireland carrying with him a small box or basket of potatoes, which somebody stole and substituted others. He returned to this country and represented our statements as grossly exaggerated. The events that have occurred since, and the enormous expenditure, of which this Vote forms part, prove that we understated rather than overstated the case. After a strong appeal from the Member for Newcastle, in answer to urgent invitations, and goaded to some extent by the reproaches made against him, the Chief Secretary made a desperate resolution, and for the first time in the five years of his government of Ireland he marched away from Dublin, and, with feelings something like those which animated Stanley when he embarked on the Congo, he advanced to the Shannon and crossed that terrible river. I was in America at the time, and day after day I read columns of telegrams describing the progress of the right hon. Gentleman as if it were a march of an army in a hostile country, and it seemed wonderful to the Americans that there was no terrible loss of life or injury to limb. I never thought there was anything to fear, and I think the Chief Secretary made a remarkably good departure in acquainting himself with the people and with the country that he governed. The sights he saw led to his mind being aroused for the first time as to the true condition of the people in those districts, and the fact of his going through had a good deal to do with the very liberal scale on which relief was afforded to those people. As regards the distribution of that relief, I cannot resist the conviction that it was, to a considerable extent, affected by the nature of the right hon. Gentleman's reception. The Magistrates behaved in the most reprehensible fashion by telling the people that if they did not give the right hon. Gentleman a warm welcome they would suffer. I believe that in some districts the right hon. Gentleman was welcomed with a small and miserable appearance of hospitality, and that the people received more than their due share. That is a very unfortunate thing, and unfortunate that any impression should have been left in the minds of the people that this relief was employed for the purpose of furthering political objects. I am sure the people of this country would not approve such a proceeding. You can always get a good idea of what is in the mind of the Government by studying The Times. They sent a special correspondent down to the West towards the close of last summer, and he gave a most magnificent account of the result of these relief works, and described the gratitude of the people, and threw a flood of light upon the views of the official classes in Ireland. As regards the administration of the fund, it was placed mainly or altogether in the hands of the police. One of the extra items in this Vote is £1,400 as extra pay to the police for acting as gangers, time-keepers, overseers, &c., in connection with the relief works, and of that item I should like some explanation. If the work of overseeing and time-keeping on the relief works was done by constabulary men and officers, who were amply paid for all their work, the sum of £1,410 for distributing £30,000 is an enormously excessive amount for extra pay to these men. The First Lord of the Treasury consulted the Catholic priest, and gave them a large voice in putting men on the relief works, and to that extent neutralised the mischievous influence of the police; but, making due allowance for that fact, the use of the police was not a wise or proper course. There is another matter connected with this system of relief works which is worth bringing under the attention of the Committee. I represent one of the poorest districts in Ireland, and the right hon. Gentleman has treated my district in a liberal fashion. In the first place, he ran a railway right through the middle of it, which I never asked him for—if I had asked him for it, I might not have got it—and he has greatly benefited the people. He disbursed £13,000 in the Barony of Swineford, which includes one of the poorest populations of Ireland. When these famines occur, and anyone comes down amongst the people—as the right hon. Gentleman did, much to his credit—who has the power of giving them relief, it is impossible for his humanity to resist the demand made upon him by the condition of these people. But what I have always urged upon this House is, that the system of waiting for a famine to come and then bringing in a Bill for relief is one of the most wretched, degrading, and hopeless systems ever undertaken by an Executive Government. Yet this has been going on in our unfortunate country for the last hundred years. Nothing is done in the intervals to take away the root of the evils; and when distress recurs, we are compelled to raise an agitation for relief; and no Government system of relief was ever applied to a people without leaving behind it frightful demoralisation. The whole financial system of the West of Ireland is thoroughly rotten. If we take the Union of Swineford, we find a population of 53,700 people, with an annual valuation of only £1,000; and it is a remarkable fact, full of sorrowful significance, that in that Union the population is not decreasing, although emigration is taking place from other districts. As to the economic condition of this district during the last ten years, I may say that before this latest distress I had a calculation made which showed that there had been spent there from external resources £110,000 in public charity and relief works within ten years; and that in the same Union, within the same time, £300,000 had been paid in rent largely taken away by the absentee landlords. Was there ever heard of in the whole world such folly as this? Look, again, what happened this year. The right hon. Gentleman spent £26,634 out of this fund, and very probably £4,000 out of the other fund which he collected from the public. I do not suppose that he spent less than £10,000 or £15,000 on the railway, and at least the sum of £35,000 has been spent from the Public Exchequer and private charity from outside sources to keep the people alive in that Union; and yet the landlords, who do not subscribe to these charities, have taken their rents out of this money. It is a most deplorable system, and it is humiliating to us to have to come to this House as paupers when we know that that this is an artificial condition of things. Yet I was threatened with the bayonets of British soldiers and the batons of policemen because I endeavoured to address my constituents on this subject. I was forbidden by a Magistrate to point out to them that they were bound in duty, as well as entitled in morality, to hold for their children and their wives the products of their labour. The right hon. Gentleman sent his troops down at great expense to stop me; but he had to come down afterwards and spend public money there. I am glad to have this opportunity of telling the English House of Commons that it is a fraud on the charity of this country that the absentee landlords of Swineford, and other districts in the West of Ireland, should be allowed to take their rents out of the charity of the English people. I am aware that the right hon. Gentleman in his answer to me will point to the Congested Districts Board, and say the course I have urged has at last been adopted by the Government. I am glad that such a Board has been brought into existence; but I warn the right hon. Gentleman that, as in the case of these relief measures, so in the case of the Congested Districts Board, until you stop the leakage, and do something to bring about a proper economical basis on which to build your structure in the West of Ireland, you are defrauding the people of this country by pretending that these measures can do any permanent or lasting good; while all you are really doing is to increase the security for the rents of the landlords. I am now, as I always have been, ready to meet with friendly criticism any scheme for improving the condition of our people. I do not care where it comes from—a Conservative or a Liberal Government; but I feel it my duty to point out the economical unsoundness of the present schemes, and I think nothing can be done for the population of the West of Ireland, with any hope of producing good fruit, unless you begin by purchasing, at a fair valuation, the rents of those landlords who are the curse of that country, and have been the cause of its poverty.

(11.38.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR : I cannot congratulate either the Committee or the hon. Gentleman upon the performance we have just witnessed. (Cries from the Irish Members of "No performance," "the truth," "speech.") The hon. Gentleman speaks not so much as a despairing philanthropist as a disappointed politician. He cannot forgive me for having been one of the instruments by which, not with his assistance, but in his despite, relief, and immediate relief, was given to the West of Ireland. He cannot conceal the bitterness—(A voice : "Neither can you")—with which he learned that I had travelled through these districts, not guarded by a multitude of police, but without their assistance, and that I was welcomed by his constituents, as by others, in a friendly and generous spirit, and with a full recognition that my object was to make myself better acquainted with their needs; and that my purpose was not, as he seems in his generosity to suppose, to make political capital out of them, but to do something for the relief of the distress about which the hon. Gentleman talks so much and towards mitigating which he does so little. I do not propose to occupy the time of the Committee at any length in dealing with the charges of the hon. Gentleman, but it will be very easy to refute those which have any reference to my own action. The hon. Gentleman appears to think it was not until the Government had listened to the speeches he made in this House and the speeches the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Morley) made outside that we contemplated the possibility of distress in Ireland, or took steps to relieve it. That is the opinion of other hon. Gentlemen opposite.

MR. MAC NEILL : Yes. I mentioned that.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : The hon. Member's memory is enfeebled by partisanship when he makes such a charge. The facts are these. Before Parliament separated in August, 1890, we, on this side of the House, had sat up all one night, until our proceedings were lightened by the dawn of the day following that on which we began, in order to pass a measure connected with Light Railways, which would enable us to hurry on the employment of labour with a view to meeting impending distress. That measure was resisted by the hon. Gentleman's friends opposite.

MR. SEXTON : I, with several Irish Members, supported the Bill, and a very small minority resisted it.

MR. DILLON : The right hon. Gentleman had me under arrest at the time, or, at any rate, I was unable to appear here.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : I acquit both hon. Gentlemen, the hon. Member for East Mayo because circumstances over which he had no control prevented him from taking part in the proceedings. I do not remember what they were, and with reference to the hon. Member for West Belfast, though I think he joined in some of the Divisions against us, I amply recognise that he did render yeoman service towards the passage of a Bill intended for the future salvation of the poor people in the West of Ireland. But the broad fact remains, we conclusively proved by our action on that night that we contemplated the possibility of distress, and we were already preparing the means to meet that distress; and that, further, we were hampered in our efforts by hon. Gentlemen sitting on the other side of the House. What is the use of talking about the speeches of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle ; there is the broad fact recorded on the Journals of this House conclusively proving who were the friends of Ireland and who were her enemies, who were prepared to help her in her hour of need, and who were prepared to interfere with that assistance if they could only get a little temporary political benefit thereby. That is enough on this argument, but that is not all I could point out. Long before the speeches of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle all the arrangements for my tour in the West were made, and incessant communications were passing between myself and those whose duty it was to deal with distress there. But so much for the manner in which the Government were "spurred on." I now come to the proposition urged by the hon. Member that he, and he alone, has been the apostle of the true doctrine that the distribution of eleemosynary relief is demoralising. I venture to say that no man in or out of the House has urged that doctrine more earnestly and more frequently than myself. I can say that I have not contented myself with urging it in the House and in this country—I went down to the West, and I said it to the people at meetings there; I said it in discussions with priests and local leaders; I did everything in my power to impress on every man having any influence that to suppose that this House or any Government was to continue giving at quinquennial or decennial periods large sums of money for relief was to build hope on the most insecure foundation, and which, even if secure, held out no prospect of permanent amelioration in the condition of the country. I did not confine myself to speeches in this matter. The hon. Gentleman appears to think it is our pleasure to come forward and ask for a Vote from the House for the relief of distress every ten years, and yet to refrain from taking any steps for the relief of the poor population in the West of Ireland. Sir, I claim for this Government, alone among Governments which have existed in Ireland before and since the Union, that we have proposed and carried measures which have for their object the amelioration of the condition of this poor population. We have carried the Light Railways Bill, to which I have already alluded. We proposed it, carried it, and have given effect to it; and if anything is calculated to permanently increase the value of the soil, to improve the fishing industry, and to give to the people who live on that inclement seaboard a chance of competing in the race of life—if anything can give them that chance, it is the railways we have planned, constructed, and paid for.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

That is not the only proposal we have made and carried for dealing permanently with the West of Ireland. The hon. Gentleman has himself alluded to the Congested Districts Board. That Board has at its disposal large funds and ample powers. Its labours, unless legislation interferes, will extend over many years, and in them we have a right to hope that by ceaseless and continued endeavours a great effect will be produced in the amelioration of the conditions of life among those classes with which the Board has to deal. The Board was first proposed in the Land Act of 1890, an Act which I should have thought, on many grounds, had title to the gratitude of the Irish people. But I speak only of this establishment of a Congested Districts Board. Against the Second Reading of that Bill every man below the Gangway opposite voted, including, no doubt, the hon. Member for East Mayo, unless again on that occasion he happened to be otherwise employed. At all events, the whole Party of which he is a distinguished Member united to oppose a measure for dealing specially with the necessities of the West Coast. And after that the hon. Gentleman talks to us as if he had been preaching wisdom to deaf ears, as if he had been the author of a number of bountiful schemes to which we objected, as if he were the enlightened apostle of Irish progress and we the deaf and obtuse obstructives to his beneficent schemes for the welfare of the people. I have heard the hon. Gentleman in countless speeches descant on the woes and wrongs of Ireland, but never in any speech have I heard from him a practical proposition from the day he entered this House until now—unless I am to count among practical propositions the contribution towards the solution of the Irish problem he has been good enough to offer to-day. What is that contribution? It appears, in spite of all evidence ever given, in spite of all elementary principles of public morality, in spite of the obvious forces of economic law, the hon. Member sees no source for Irish regeneration, or amelioration of their condition, except in the refusal of Irish tenants to pay their rents. There alone he sees the dawn of future hope to light his countrymen to political salvation. He comes down to the House with this nostrum in his pocket, and accuses us who sit on this Bench of incapacity to found a constructive policy for Irish interests and of ignorance of Irish misfortunes. If anything is certain in this world, if there be one truth which the universal experience of mankind has conclusively established, it is that you cannot found the prosperity of a nation on national dishonesty and national disgrace. If we are to take the hon. Gentleman as a Representative of future statesmanship and as a Leader of that future Parliament he hopes to establish in Dublin, if we are to suppose he has laid down the great principles of public policy which are to direct the counsels of the Irish House of Commons, then, indeed, we have more reason than ever to despair of the future of the race he represents. I, Sir, have better hope for Ireland. I believe that deep as is the darkness which appears to have settled over the regions of the West, grinding as is the poverty which, in seasons of distress oppresses the people, nevertheless, partly by their own efforts, partly by the assistance we are able to give them, they will lift themselves out of that slough of poverty and despond, and will become, what I am sure they deserve to become, some of the most worthy, contented, peaceful elements of a great and united people.

(11.44.) MR. MAC NEILL : It is pleasant to observe that in the person of the First Lord of the Treasury we have not lost our old friend the late Chief Secretary for Ireland. Speeches of the kind we have just heard will be our charter for the next General Election. I always admired the late Mr. W. H. Smith, but never till now did I recognise that as Leader of the House he was a genius. He did not trade on the animosities between classes, but tried to infuse into our debates his own genial spirit, and regarded us, though opposed to him, as his Colleagues here. How different is the spirit we have just heard. Can any reasonable man fail to see in this exhibition the feeling of a disappointed politician. Again and again the right hon. Gentleman has said he did not go to the West in a political spirit, but his friends undoubtedly have endeavoured to make political capital out of his tour in these districts. The right hon. Gentleman has done me the honour to say that possibly my memory is weakened by partisanship, but at least one fact is strongly impressed on my memory. Does the right hon. Gentleman recollect that within the last few weeks a gentleman, full of years and honour, was gathered to his fathers, a gentleman whose counsel was sought on these matters—Sir James Caird—who said two-thirds of the holdings in Ireland are such that no economic rent can be exacted for them? This Debate cannot conclude to-night, but let me say a word on an incident upon which I may enlarge later on when I resume my speech. I met the right hon. Gentleman in Donegal, and very hard I found it to find him. No one seeking an interview with a Royal personage could have had more difficulty. At last I found the right hon. Gentleman, and first I had to ask a Resident Magistrate, who consulted an Inspector, and then applied to the hon. Member for Dover, who acted as diplomatic agent, and at length I was ushered into the presence. Then I found an interview or reception proceeding, which, I suppose, if I had not happened to be there, would have been described as an interview with leading representatives of the district. As a fact, I found the local land agent and the dispensary doctor, surrounded by a group of newspaper men, and in a little time I found that the thing was got up for political capital. Did not the right hon. Gentleman on 3rd October, 1890, write a letter to an American gentleman stating that the distress in Ireland had been got up for political purposes? But see with what little wisdom Irish affairs are governed when, shortly afterwards, he made application here for an enormous sum of money for the relief of that distress. That distress was first emphasized by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle, when he made a personal appeal to the Chief Secretary, but the latter would not allow the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle “to dictate to him where he should write his letters from.”

It being Midnight, the Chairman left the Chair to make his report to the House.

Resolution to be reported to-morrow,

Committee also report Progress; to sit again upon Wednesday.

SIR JOHN GORST: I hope the hon. Member will allow this purely formal stage to be taken. THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): I cannot at present say I am in a position to withdraw the Amendment of which I have given notice; perhaps it will be convenient at this point to report Progress. ## PRESENTATION TO BENEFICES BILL

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK: My Lords, the Bill, to which I ask you to give a Second Reading to-day, has already twice received your Lordships' approval, and is to-day precisely in the same form as when it passed this House last year. It is intended to deal with cases where the presentation to a benefice is vested in a large constituency : either a body of parishioners or other bodies, consisting of a large number of persons ; and it proposes that the parishioners, or others, should exercise their right of presentation by electing a body of trustees which shall exercise the right for them when a vacancy occurs ; it proposes also that the trustees shall be elected not at the time of the vacancy but beforehand, in order to provide against some of the disorder and excitement that has found a place on occasions when the election is made by a large body of patrons. My Lords, the provisions of the Bill are perfectly simple, and I need not delay your Lordships by saying anything more about them. I now beg to move that the Bill be read a second time.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>o</sup>."—(The Lord Archbishop of York.)

Motion agreed to ; Bill read 2<sup>o</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Thursday next.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT ACTS OF ENGLAND AND SCOTLAND REPEAL BILL [H.L.]—(No. 25.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD DENMAN : My Lords, on the very first introduction of the Local Government Bill I laid a Bill on the Table of this House and required it to be read a first time, when the noble Marquess, the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, got up and said that there was no instance of a Bill, that had been passed, being repealed in the same Session. I ventured to remind that Minister that the Jews' Naturalisation Bill was brought in by the Duke of Newcastle, when he was Prime Minister, and, at his request, was repealed in the same year. My Lords, I thought that would have entitled me to have my Bill printed. But, my Lords, things are carried with a high hand in this House, and the Clerks seem to think they may stop one on every occasion. Sir William Rose tried to stop me from endeavouring a second time to restore the Court of Common Pleas, but I was enabled to plead the cause of that important Court a second time. My Lords, I am not one who is easily discouraged. The reason why I have brought this measure forward to-day, and no sooner, is that the County Council was going on, and it would have been very insulting to that body if I had said anything to show a distrust of them ; but, at the same time, I must remind your Lordships how, both in London and in the country, the extravagance of these bodies has become almost intolerable. The London County Council only opposed, by a small minority, a proposal that all the expenses of pulling down half the Strand should fall upon the rates. Well, my Lords, an instance occurred to me only the other day. In passing from Derby to York, by the Great Northern Line, at West Derby I met a County Councillor, who told me that on that day they had agreed to pay very nearly £500 to a lecturer upon agriculture. Well, my Lords, in our little club at Bakewell we had lecturers upon agriculture, and we paid them ourselves. My Lords, the stress upon these rates is becoming quite intolerable. In the East part of London there was a dinner to help the rates in the expense of a library. The illustrious Duke, His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, was in the chair; Lord Randolph Churchill had a place reserved for him on the left of the chair, and the Duke of Argyll on the right; but, as those personages did not appear, I had to sit on the right hand of His Royal Highness and the Bishop of Bedford on his left. Well, my Lords, His Royal Highness, in course of conversation, said to me, "We are going too fast." This is indeed the fact. We are travelling at a most rapid rate. Bills are passed through Committees, and they come here, and nobody knows what is passed. I am an old man, and I can hardly expect that anybody will second this, to show the opinion that some may entertain of the expediency of a change. At Derby, when this Local Government Bill was first passed, the Clerk of the Peace told me that the provision for including £10 owners and £10 occupiers had driven the overseers almost mad. For this election they are trying to make up the list to-morrow, and the election is to take place on Saturday; but there is too small a body to do the business of the office. In our county, from the absence of Mr. Arkwright, the whole County Council had to be put off for a day. We magistrates are able and willing to do our duty. The noble Marquess at the head of the State had an opportunity of addressing the people of Derby—he was placed in what is called the Drill Hall—and his great object was to show how recent were the powers of the magistrates over finance. My Lords, their conduct is irreproachable; and Sir Henry Wilmot, who is an Alderman, as I believe they call him, said to me, "I wish you could do away with this Local Government Bill." My Lords, he said to me, "You will have the same working men put upon the County Council that you had before." But, my Lords, you must remember that "in the multitude of counsellors there is safety"; and, if you have 50 men to do the work of four or five as many, you are incurring a good deal of danger. And I do assure you that it is like reviving the triennial Parliament. This is a little Parliament that is to be elected this week if they possibly can. Many householders have told me how much they have been annoyed by being canvassed for the County Councils; ladies also have told me that they have been extremely annoyed by being pestered to vote for County Councils—they would wish to vote for Members of Parliament whom they know, but not for a small body taken to swamp those of gentle birth—Methodists and others who are to become and be agitators. My Lords, I was very glad that the right reverend Bishop was yesterday refused the power of having reporters in the County Council Committees on technical education, because, from experience, I have found that the Board of Guardians of Bakewell is utterly subverted by the reports, and the length of speeches occasionally; and I do believe that it would be far better not to make this technical education so elaborate, because you have no proof that you will succeed. My Lords, I suppose I shall not have any Teller in proposing the Second Reading of this Bill. If so, I shall go my way; but I shall feel certain that that which is so unsuitable to Scotland, and works so ill in England, will not be received as a panacea for Ireland when it comes forward in another place. My Lords, I trust you will not think me an agitator—I am far from it. I wish to see a land of settled government; it is—"A land of just renown,

Where freedom broadens slowly down
From precedent to precedent."

Lord Denman

And the verse before that is—

"It is a land which free men till,
Which sober suited free men chose :
And where, begirt by friends or foes,
A man may speak the thing he will."

My Lords, that has not been my case—but I make no complaint.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2."—(The Lord Denman.)

Motion objected to; and, on Question, resolved in the negative.

House adjourned at a quarter before Six o'clock.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

SOUTHAMPTON DOCKS BILL.

(by Order.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(3.6.) MR. NORRIS (Tower Hamlets, Limehouse): In moving the Second Reading of this Bill I will be as brief as is consistent with the interests of those I represent on this occasion. It is a Bill that seriously affects the interest of the town of Southampton, indeed I may say the County of Southampton, and especially it interests the railway and dock undertakings of the port. The proposal in the Bill is the sale of the property of the Dock Company to the South Western Railway Company, and I understand the opposition which emanates from the representatives of dock interests in the North of England rests on a question of principle, but of course it is easy to argue how a general principle does or does not apply to a particular case. The hon. Members who have given notice antagonistic to this Bill represent two Northern boroughs, and I cannot for the life of me see what they have to do with the arrangements of the Southampton Docks. The great dock interests of London have exhibited no opposition; recognising this as a means by which the Southampton Dock Company can get out of its financial difficulties. It is not the Railway Company which is the principal promoter of this Bill. It is not in any sense from a desire to create a railway monopoly the Bill is promoted, it is the only feasible means for the Dock Company to relieve itself from serious and increasing depreciation. The Railway Company are holders of £50,000 4 per cent. mortgage debentures and £250,000 4 per cent. preference stock of the Dock Company, and at the same time they have advanced £30,000 by way of temporary loan, making a total of £330,000. They hold about a quarter of the whole property of the Company, and have therefore a large amount of power in the Company's affairs. A subscription of £250,000 was authorised for assistance in the construction of a new deep water dock. We have endeavoured, as far as possible, to keep pace with the demands of the times and the requirements of the port. We are on good terms with the Dock Companies on the Thames, and I cannot see why the North Country dockowners should oppose a Bill of such a reasonable character. The Railway Company has already a very large interest in the dock. The net revenue of the dock has declined during the last four years, and the opening of the new dock has not brought the increased traffic which was anticipated. The Company only paid 2 per cent. in 1891 on the 4 per cent. preference stock, and the revenue is still declining; and I may point out that a large portion of the stock is held by trustees for widows and children, and much is in the hands of working men. No dividend on the ordinary stock has been paid since 1890, when  $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. was distributed among the shareholders. This movement was initiated by the shareholders, and not by the Railway Company. I may also mention the severe loss the docks suffered in 1873 by the withdrawal of the Peninsular and Oriental Company. We have attempted to make good this loss, but we have taken nothing, certainly, from the Northern Docks. We employ a large amount of labour, as the hon. Gentleman opposite, the Member for Southampton, can tell you, and if the docks are closed, as, possibly, they might be if the money is not forthcoming, this important town and port of Southampton may be ruined, and the labourers there will be in a state of penury and destitution. I believe nearly every Railway Company in the Kingdom having coast communication has docks of its own; the Great Western and the North Western have docks, and the North Eastern has, or is endeavouring to secure, docks of its own. The London and Brighton Company has the port of Newhaven, and the South Eastern has docks of its own. Therefore, it seems to me very much like a dog-in-the-manger policy for these North Country docks to interfere in regard to what we are doing for the port and town of Southampton. I hope the Government will assist us in the endeavour to obtain a Second Reading of this Bill. It is a question of local interests and local self-government, and I hope those hon. Gentlemen who justify the principle of local self-government will support the Second Reading. There is no other principle involved here. In the circular sent round by our opponents—luke-warm opponents I hope I may call them—a lame pretext is put forward, and no strong argument against the Bill. They say that in 1872 there was a Joint Committee of the two Houses of Parliament, which gave utterance to the assertion of a certain principle, or the expression of a sentiment, in regard to the amalgamation of Docks and Railway Companies. But, as hon. Gentlemen will understand, we have advanced and progressed since 1872, and principles that then held good are different from those which obtain to-day. To treat this as a matter of general public principle seems to me a most unnecessary interference with local interests. It is little to the interest of the Railway Company, though, of course, they would not undertake the purchase unless they found that the two undertakings could be worked better and more cheaply, with advantage to the interests of all parties concerned. Without going into the history of the docks, I may say they have made the most laborious endeavours to keep the docks up to the requirements of the time. We are ready to receive the largest ships, and if the great Union Steamship Company, the Royal Mail Company, and others do not come to us, they certainly will not go to any of the ports represented in any way by the hon. Members for Whitehaven and South Shields. So I think their interference in our proposal is wholly uncalled for. At any rate, we are in an almost destitute condition. I might almost say we are pleading before the House in forma pauperis for the good of the property, for the good of the working classes of Southampton. I hope we shall have the support of the hon. Member for Poplar (Mr. Buxton), whom I see opposite, and others who interest themselves in labour questions. I think we ought to have the sympathy of those hon. Members who have in recollection the labour strikes at Southampton, and the position of working men there. We object to a Hybrid Committee, because reference to such a Committee must lead to a postponement of the carrying out of the proposal, and will entail much additional expense, which we are not able to bear. I do hope that the Government will justify their own principle of local self-government, and assist us in passing the Second Reading.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Norris.)

(3.15.) MR. F. H. EVANS (Southampton): I rise to support the Motion for Second Reading. The Bill is introduced by the Southampton Docks Company, because that company finds itself in the position of having a very large accommodation for shipping and not the means and appliances sufficient to attract the larger shipping, and make the undertaking pay. The borrowing powers of the company are nearly exhausted, and the means of raising money gone. Capital is required to complete the finest docks in the Channel. The hon. Gentleman who has just spoken has pointed out that a large amount of labour has been expended to keep the docks open. I cannot go so far as he has gone in the apprehension of the danger of the docks being closed, and I think even if the Bill were thrown out still we should find the Southampton Docks would be maintained; and I do not join in pleading in formd pauperis. The opposition to the Second Reading, so far as I can make out, is based on the general principle that Railway Companies should not be allowed to acquire docks. My own experience is that general principles exist in theory, and may be sustained so long as there is nothing to apply them to, but as soon as they are applied to individual instances, then general principles are likely to get more and more attenuated. If, in the present instance, the Dock Companies were opposed to the amalgamation, then there would be good reason for the House to hesitate before granting a Second Reading to the Bill, but that is not the case here. The Southampton Corporation have passed a resolution in favour of the Bill. The railway shareholders have passed a resolution in favour of the purchase, and the dock shareholders, by a very large majority, have agreed to the sale, and I do not see that opposition should come in on the ground of general principles to the carrying out of a measure which all parties are eager to have passed. I do not see on what principle the House should refuse a Second Reading to the Bill. It is not because the London and North Western do not happen to possess the Liverpool Docks. Surely hon. Members will not apply an analogy of that kind. It is not that the London and South Western Railway Company want to obtain possession to the exclusion of all other railway interests, for there are provisions to secure the public weal, so that the London and South Western Company will not obtain power of that kind. I agree with my hon. Friend that a Hybrid Committee will be an expensive solution of the difficulty. I prefer inquiry by an ordinary Select Committee, and I do hope that the House will, in the interest of the town of Southampton, which I represent, and in the interest of the Dock Company, which I also represent in this case, grant a Second Reading to the Bill to the advantage of all parties concerned.

(3.20.) THE CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES (Mr. COURTNEY, Cornwall, Bodmin): I rise thus early in the Debate to ask the House to consider the real point involved in this discussion, because the hon. Members who have spoken have shown considerable ingenuity in avoiding altogether what is the matter in dispute. We have had an interesting view of the force of general principles from the hon. Member who has just sat down, who seems to think they are only useful on platforms in view of elections, but are to be put aside when concrete cases present themselves for the application of those principles. There is no real objection to the Second Reading of the Bill, but there is involved a principle long recognised as beyond the immediate interest of a locality. We have a Standing Order of the House that in the case of any Bill which contemplates the acquisition of a dock by a Railway Company, that Bill shall not be referred to a Select Committee unless there is a special Report made thereon showing reasons for a departure from the general rule. That has been a Standing Order of the House for a long while. But a Joint Committee of the two Houses came to the conclusion that the Standing Order was not sufficiently strong, and that proposals of the kind, the acquisition of a dock by a Railway Company, and possibly the creation of a powerful monopoly, should be referred to a Hybrid Committee. Now, the question before the House is not really the acceptance or rejection of a Motion for Second Reading, but whether the Bill should be referred to an ordinary Select Committee of four Members, or whether it should go before a Hybrid Committee. Now, questions of general public interest cannot be sufficiently examined by an ordinary Select Committee, for no one appears before it to represent the wider interest beyond that of the locality, but before a Hybrid Committee there will be evidence and arguments on points affecting the general public interest, as well as the local interests. The hon. Member for Limehouse (Mr. Norris) has an apprehension that much more expense is involved in the examination by a Hybrid Committee, but I think he will find that examination before a Hybrid Committee is not much more, if at all more, expensive than examination by a Select Committee of four Members. This would be an expensive business, looking to the character of the opposition raised, if all the Dock Companies who are endeavouring to maintain their independence in competition were represented, but I am assured that the opposition will be brought to a single representation, and there is no intention to go through the reduplication of evidence. I do not think, therefore, there will be much additional expense, and I should recommend that the Bill be read a second time, and referred to a Hybrid Committee.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time.

Mr. J. C. STEVENSON (South Shields) : I beg to move the Motion standing in my name.

Sir JAMES BAIN (Whitehaven) : I beg to second the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Bill be committed to a Select Committee to consist of Seven Members, Four to be nominated by the House, and Three by the Committee of Selection."

(8.25.) Mr. NORRIS : Of course, in face of the representations made by the right hon. Gentleman the Chairman of Committees, and understanding from him that this course will not lead to delay or great additional expense, I will, with the concurrence of the House, fall in with his view.

Question put, and agreed to.

Resolved, That all Petitions against the Bill presented three clear days before the meeting of the Committee be referred to the Committee; and that such of the Petitioners as pray to be heard by their Counsel, Agents, or Witnesses, be heard on their Petitions if they think fit, and Counsel heard in favour of the Bill against such Petitioners.

That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers and records.

That Three be the quorum.

BELFAST CORPORATION (LUNATIC ASYLUMS, &c.) BILL.—(by Order).

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [29th February]—

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee to insert in the Bill clauses re-arranging the existing division of the City of Belfast into wards, so as to make it possible for all classes of its inhabitants to obtain representation in the Town Council."—(Mr. Sexton.)

Mr. Courtney

Question again proposed.

(3.28.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.) : Again I have to regret the absence of the Minister of the Crown responsible for Irish affairs on the discussion of this Irish question. I appeal to the House to adopt this very simple mode, strictly relevant to the Bill, of redressing a monstrous and undeniable grievance, the nature of which I can state in a very few words. The City of Belfast has, according to the last Census, a population of 273,055, governed by a Corporation consisting of 40 members. In that population is included 70,000 Catholics, who have no representation on the Corporation. It is obvious that, in a city with a population of 273,000 and 40 members of the Corporation, each member of the Corporation represents an average of 6,000 or 7,000, and yet this population of 70,000 Catholics—nearly a fourth of the whole population—is without a single representative among the 40 who control municipal affairs. This Catholic population live for the most part in one-quarter of the city, and have a special interest in the paving, lighting, sanitation, and other details of municipal service. It is therefore necessary that they should be represented on the Local Council by men in sympathy with their views and on whom they can rely. Is it not discreditable to this House that a state of affairs should be allowed to continue in Belfast the like of which does not exist in any other city in the United Kingdom? What is the cause of the grievance? Simply this: that the wards of the city were fixed 40 years ago, and they have never been redistributed since. In 1853, when the population of Belfast was 115,000, the town was divided into five wards. Since then Belfast has become a city with 273,000 inhabitants; and yet, though the population has more than doubled, the division into five wards remains, with two Aldermen and six Councillors to each—a state of things to which no parallel can be found elsewhere. Now I am asking for nothing new. A Royal Commission was appointed by a Conservative Government in 1879 to consider this question. The Commission took evidence on the spot, examined all the details exhaustively, and reported in 1881, eleven years ago. In this Report, the Commissioners recommended that the wards should be redistributed, and that instead of five there should be eight. The Corporation of Belfast, the promoters of this Bill, agreed that the wards should be re-adjusted, and that they should be eight in number, and it deserves to be noticed by the House that two other Municipal bodies, the Belfast Water Board and the Board of Guardians, submitted schemes in which they recommended that the five wards should be subdivided into 15. No one in Belfast then thought five wards sufficient, and yet here we are, in 1892, with the population of the city more than doubled since 1858, and still the division into five wards exists, with the anomalous and discreditable state of things that 70,000 inhabitants are left without a voice in the management of civic affairs. I have two reasons relevant to this Bill why the instruction I propose to give to the Committee should be granted. If I were asking anything irrelevant to the Bill, I should expect to meet with opposition, but I ask nothing beyond the scope of the Bill. The Corporation are asking for new powers of expenditure and control in regard to payments for children in industrial schools. I beg the House to observe that payments by Corporations in Ireland in this respect are optional. If payment were compulsory, I should have not a word to say—our endeavours would be directed to see that the Corporation did not evade the law; but a Corporation has a free choice in such matters as to when they shall pay anything and when they shall not pay anything. It should be further observed that the system of industrial schools in Ireland is denominational, every school being under Catholic or Protestant management, Catholic children being sent to the one class, Protestant to the other. Does any man expect me to admit that on a Corporation consisting of 40 members, on which the large minority of the Catholic population have no representation, due regard is had to the interest of Catholic children in those schools? I do not agree to anything of the kind, and I tell the promoters of this Bill that unless they will agree that representatives of the minority shall be allowed some voice in the allocation of funds to the maintenance of Catholic children, this Bill will be met at every stage with the most stubborn opposition. In the towns of Dublin, Cork, and Limerick there is a Protestant minority not so large as is the Catholic minority in Belfast—not a fraction of it, and yet in Dublin, Cork, and Limerick the Protestant minority have on the Councils a proportion of representation far greater than their share of the population. I know from my own knowledge that in Dublin this is so, and in Cork and Limerick there is a decent liberality shown towards the minorities, while in Belfast a shameful intolerance excludes and outlaws a fourth of the population. We are not prepared to grant the powers sought in the Bill, unless this instruction is granted and acted upon. The Corporation also ask for a new franchise, and to this point I would beg the special attention of the Chairman of Committees. By Clause 4 of the Bill they ask power substantially to appoint a large majority of the Governors of the Lunatic Asylum. I do not care whether they have a virtual majority or not. Under the present system the proposition is this: that a purely Protestant body asks power to nominate the majority of the Governors of an asylum in which the ratepayers of all creeds are equally interested and concerned; and I who represent the Catholics in Belfast, we who represent the Catholics in Ireland, demand that the large proportion of our contributions towards the maintenance of these institutions should find some representation among the 40 Protestant gentlemen who are to direct the mode in which the asylums shall be conducted. This is a new Franchise Clause, and therefore my Instruction is strictly relevant to the question that the Committee should, in the way I think I have shown, take immediate steps to secure representation for the Catholics of the city on the Governing Body, should do what the Royal Commission recommended eleven years ago should be done, should sub-divide the wards into eight, ten, or fifteen, not allowing a state of things to continue which gives to each ward a population equal to an ordinary Parliamentary Division. I do not think any gentleman will get up and say that in any other city in the Kingdom in the present state of municipal representation such a state of things exists. What is the policy of the Government displayed in their Local Government Bill? They propose to establish the cumulative vote over the counties in Ireland. And for what purpose? For this and no other purpose to give the Protestant and Conservative minority in the country a voice, a share in the government, of their county or local and fiscal affairs. This I ask you to give in the City of Belfast.

MR. JACKSON: Not for the Protestant minority.

MR. SEXTON: I know that in three or four counties the Catholics are in the minority, but is this done for these minorities? Have the minorities in the four Eastern counties asked for it? They have not. Let no one tell me that the benevolence of the Government towards the Catholics of Ireland is of that voluntary character that they rush to the rescue of the Catholics in those four counties where they happen to be in a minority. No; the proposal is in the interest of the Protestant minorities in the 28 other counties. Therefore, the Government propose to establish cumulative voting to give the minority the chance of representation on the County Councils. Further, you propose to give to the Lord Lieutenant power to cut up each county into electoral divisions, so that by the system of cumulative voting the Protestant minorities may be enabled to secure representation. Do the same thing in the City of Belfast. Cut up the city into suitable and equitable divisions such as obtain in every other municipal town in the Kingdom, so that 70,000 of the inhabitants out of 270,000 may elect at least one representative to the Governing Body. Is that an excessive, an unreasonable demand? Can the Government resist it when their own suggestion for local government is cumulative voting and the power of the Lord Lieutenant to mark out electoral divisions, so that an insignificant and infinitesimal minority may find representation in counties? I shall not trouble the House further, only adding that if the mandatory terms of my instruction are open to objection, and this has been suggested to me, I am willing to conciliate opposition—though there is no conciliating opposition of a certain character in Belfast—I am willing to alter the terms of my Motion declaring that the Committee "have power," so that a certain amount of discretion will be left to the Committee. Five years ago, when I urged an extension of the Municipal Franchise, I was bitterly opposed by the Corporation of Belfast in two Sessions. I was able to bring some leverage to bear then; the Corporation wanted a Private Bill, which the House refused to grant unless the Franchise Reform was granted, and it was granted. After fighting hard in this House for two years against this reform, the Corporation have ever since in Belfast pretended that they initiated the reform, and that I opposed it. I do not doubt, if the House passes this instruction, a similar result will follow, and the Corporation will claim credit for a reform as soon as it is granted, and which now they oppose. I earnestly appeal to every Member of the House to give his vote as the justice of the case requires.

*(3.40.) SIR EDWARD HARLAND (Belfast, N.): I quite hoped on Friday, when at the suggestion of the Chief Secretary the consideration of this Bill was referred to a Hybrid Committee, all points raised might, by the Committee, be fully gone into. I regret that the hon. Member for West Belfast should have introduced the question of religion into this discussion. There is nothing in the Bill touching religious differences, and the introduction of religion into political matters creates a large amount of ill-feeling. Within the four corners of the Bill there is no reference to the re-division of the city into wards, but I may say that so far as the Corporation of Belfast is concerned there is not the slightest objection to the re-arrangement of the wards in number and area, but we maintain that the Bill does not deal with that matter, and if it is a thing to be done then it should be done by another Bill, or by means of the Bill dealing with the general question of Local Government, in which Clause 30 provides the procedure for dealing with such a question. It is not desirable to trammel this Bill with any such considerations, and a Committee upstairs has not the machinery for redistributing the city wards. For such a purpose a Commission should sit and take evidence on the spot, and consider the whole thing thoroughly, and probably, seeing that Belfast has increased so largely, it might also be necessary to enlarge the boundaries of the city. (Mr. SEXTON: No.) Certainly it would have to be considered. These are serious matters, not serious in the sense that there would be opposition, but requiring very careful consideration, particularly in view of the wishes of the hon. Member that the arrangement should be such as to give his immediate religious friends the opportunity of taking seats on the Council. As to the distribution of seats, what difference can it possibly make to Belfast? Has anyone ever drawn attention to mismanagement of municipal affairs there? I will undertake to say there is not a city in the three Kingdoms where municipal affairs are better managed than they are in Belfast, and no city shows a more healthy and prosperous condition of affairs. Why does the hon. Member seek to introduce into this matter the religious question? Refer to the origin and history of Belfast, and we find that Belfast is not an Irish town—really not an Irish town in the view of Irish towns held by hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway opposite. Trace its origin from the time when it ceased to be a country town, the centre for such industries as are connected with an agricultural district, and you find that the manufactures of various descriptions which were taken up were not established by manufacturers and workmen in Ireland, for they did not exist. The prosperity of Belfast took its rise from the energy and labour of Scotchmen and Englishmen. Three out of every four of the inhabitants of Belfast are of Scotch or English origin, and they are mostly Protestants. It is the jealousy of the Catholic element which seeks to over-ride the Protestant feeling of the city, and just as Belfast has prospered under Protestant Government, so would it cease to prosper if Catholic methods of Government had predominance. No injustice is inflicted on the Catholic inhabitants; they pursue their industry under precisely the same conditions, so far as Local Government is concerned, as their Protestant neighbours; they have every consideration shown to them, and their children in industrial schools have exactly the same treatment as Protestant children in those schools. The hon. Member is raising an entirely false issue upon this Bill. We do not object to a revision of the city boundaries and wards, but we do submit that this is not the Bill by which this revision should be carried out. Let it be done either by means of the Local Government Bill or through a Special Commission, and do not hamper the Committee upstairs with matters it is scarcely possible they can deal with.

(3.47.) SIR JOSEPH McKENNA (Monaghan, S.): I hope the House has taken note of the objections offered to the Motion of the hon. Member for West Belfast, culminating in the statement that Belfast is not an Irish town. It is not, I think, the view that will generally be taken. Are we to have an imperium in imperio in Belfast? Is Belfast, with its 70,000 Catholic inhabitants, to be outside the principle that is embodied in the government of any other city in the Kingdom? I venture to say the House will never sanction such a theory as that put forward by the hon. Baronet. Have we not in our hands the Government Local Government Bill, in which the principles of Local Government are recognised, however the Bill falls short of our desires? And yet the Corporation of Belfast would take this city out of the provisions of that Bill. The hon. Baronet makes the astounding statement that Belfast is not an Irish town, and never have I heard a statement from a responsible Member of this House more calculated to sow widely abroad the seeds of discord and animosity. Unless some of the hon. Member's friends withdraw this opposition to the Instruction I hope we shall go to a Division, and that the result will show the appreciation of the House of this attempt to force exceptional legislation for Belfast.

*(3.50.) MR. JOHNSTON Belfast, S.: I support the opposition to the Instruction in the strongest possible manner. The introduction of the religious element into this discussion is due not to the promoters of the Bill, but to the hon. Member for West Belfast himself. The House must have taken note how from time to time, when measures for the promotion of the interests of Belfast have been brought forward, they have been met by persistent and consistent opposition from hon. Gentlemen opposite.

MR. SEXTON: As in the extension of the Franchise.

*MR. JOHNSTON: This arises from jealousy of the progress and prosperity of Belfast, and because Belfast is pre-eminently and distinctly Protestant. The prosperity of Belfast is largely due to its Protestantism, and though hon. Members may laugh at the statement, it is borne out by such historians as Macaulay, who traces the prosperity of Ulster to Protestantism. In contradistinction to the rest of Ireland, Belfast has increased in prosperity and population, and it is the habit of the hon. Member for West Belfast to claim credit for action on behalf of Belfast in recent years. I do not know that he lays claim to any credit for the increase in population, but he does claim to have assisted towards the prosperity of the city. Belfast, I trust, will continue in a prosperous career. Belfast is distinctly and earnestly a portion of the United Kingdom, strongly opposed to the revolutionary projects of hon. Gentlemen opposite, and determined to remain an integral part of the United Kingdom. The Corporation of Belfast will always encourage liberty and fair play to the Roman Catholics in that city. The hon. Member has told us that there are three or four counties in Ulster where Roman Catholics are in the minority, but he indignantly disclaimed the idea that they claimed to be represented on the Local Government; he made no claim on their behalf.

MR. SEXTON: Nothing of the kind. The hon. Member is, as usual, inexact. I said they had not asked the Government, and the cumulative vote had not been introduced in their interest, but in the interest of the minorities in the other counties.

*MR. JOHNSTON: The hon. Member comes forward as the champion of the minority in Belfast, but he repudiates the action of the Government with regard to minorities in other parts of Ireland. I trust the House will decisively reject the proposal now before us, and that we shall have the support of all Members who desire to see the integrity of the United Kingdom maintained. It is the fashion of hon. Gentlemen opposite to laugh at Protestantism—

MR. MAC NEILL: No, no.

*MR. JOHNSTON: The hon. Member for Donegal is himself the son of a Protestant clergyman.

MR. MAC NEILL: I am glad to have been the son of a Protestant clergyman.

*MR. JOHNSTON: I trust that the position taken by hon. Members opposite will be carefully regarded by the Protestants of Ulster. I hope the House will decisively reject the proposal before us.

(3.57.) MR. JORDAN (Clare, W.): On Friday the principle of this Bill was affirmed by only a small majority, and now the hon. Baronet (Sir E. Harland) has given away the principle on which opposition was raised to the present proposal, for he says the Belfast Corporation have no objection to the revision of the wards. But still opposition is made, not on the merits of the proposal, but founded on arguments of religion and race. The hon. Baronet, not being an Irishman himself, declares that Belfast is not an Irish town. But he lives in Ireland and he is "making his pile" in Ireland through Irish trade and energy. The hon. Member for South Belfast ascribes the prosperity of Belfast to its Protestantism. I am not one of those he accuses of laughing at Protestantism, and, for myself, I am a Protestant first and a politician afterwards. I claim to be as sound a Protestant as any Representative of Belfast, but I hate injustice, and I say it is a scandal to the Protestantism of Belfast that the Catholic citizens should be unjustly treated. The prosperity of Belfast has been largely due to exceptional circumstances. It has been partly due to the bounty on the linen industry; it has been partly due to the long prevalence of the Ulster custom in the land tenure of the province, and there are other exceptional circumstances in addition to the undoubted energy of the Protestant population. There is no one prouder of the success and prosperity of Belfast than I am; but I am sorry to say, Mr. Speaker, that the majority of the Belfast people are ungenerous, illiberal, and prejudiced in the highest extreme. Belfast sends to this House Representatives as narrow as itself, and they tell you—"This is the great Belfast we are building." In their narrow self-importance the Protestants of Belfast refuse the least justice to their Catholic fellow-townsmen, though, I ask, what have they to fear? Why, Sir, they have everything to gain by giving this justice. If you in Belfast persist in acting in this illiberal manner you will create a force outside Belfast antagonistic to you. Where is the danger to the Belfast Protestants or their property in showing fair justice to the 70,000 Catholics in the city? Have the Catholics no interests, no property, no liberties to protect? Some of them are extremely wealthy, and are well known to the merchants of London and Liverpool, and yet not one of these men, who have helped to build up the prestige of Belfast, is admitted to the Municipal Council because he is a Catholic. Protestantism ought to be ashamed of itself in this matter. Could any fair representation of these 70,000 Catholics on the Council override the representation of the 200,000 Protestants, or injure their interests in any way? If I thought that Protestant interests, or property, or capital would be jeopardised by asking you to allow Catholic interests to be represented on the Council I would not support the proposition. But I have no fear on the matter. If it be right that the privileges of Catholics should be extended we should throw aside our race prejudices, our religious and political prejudices—be just and fear not, and allow this Instruction to be carried.

are not represented on the Council, and I should be glad if they were. But why should Belfast be singled out for special treatment of this sort? If Manchester or Liverpool came before this House to ask for power to deal with their lunatic asylums, would anybody think of tacking on to their Bill a Parliamentary Instruction that they should enlarge their boundaries or change their wards? Belfast is singled out for this hostility because of the jealousy of hon. Members below the Gangway. It is a standing monument to the benefit of the Union, and, therefore, you propose to subject it to special treatment which no great city in England would submit to. Surely the Catholic inhabitants of Belfast vote now; they have equal voting power with the Protestants. I put this point strongly before the House: that Belfast ought not to be singled out for special treatment in this matter, but that the Bill should go before the Select Committee in the usual way.

(4.15.) MR. PICTON (Leicester): The hon. Member for Londonderry referred to Liverpool, and says that there is no reason to suppose that if Liverpool came for a similar measure you would treat it in the same way. The case of Liverpool is remarkably interesting. It is a larger town than Belfast, but the proportion of Catholics and Protestants is about the same, the former being about one-fourth of the inhabitants. Now, Sir, suppose that the ward arrangements were so jerrymandered that the Catholics never had a single representative on the City Council. I am persuaded that the House would not permit any more duties to be thrown upon the Council till some reform was made. This country, Protestant as it is, would be ashamed to have a city like Liverpool so arranged as to carefully exclude from the City Council any representative of so large a proportion of the inhabitants. Anything which is wrong in England is wrong in Ireland, and ought to be remedied, and I think this is a very good time to deal with the matter, inasmuch as additional duties are to be thrown on the Council in which the Catholics have a large interest. I would appeal to the sense of fairness of hon. Gentlemen opposite.

and ask them to contrast the position of Belfast in the North of Ireland and Liverpool in Lancashire, and so let the two towns be on something of an equality. I earnestly hope that the Instruction will be carried.

(4.18.) MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): Hon. Members do not oppose this Instruction on the question of principle, or the merits of the case, and it is evident that if the Instruction were carried, one or two sittings of the Committee would deal with it. Hon. Gentlemen opposite blamed the hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton) for referring to religious differences, but he is here to represent Belfast, and to look after the interests of the population of that city. We have a Catholic population of 70,000 not represented on the Council, and the Corporation is seeking an extension of powers on two questions in which the Catholics are deeply interested. There is the question of the industrial schools, in connection with which the question of religion may arise from time to time, and if the Council be an exclusively Protestant body the Catholics cannot expect fair-play and justice in the matter. It also applies in a more limited sense to the asylums. We contend that there is a public principle in this Bill, and that the promoters must be content to accept this Instruction, or to have the question treated on its merits publicly. On the Belfast Main Drainage Bill the hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton) raised the question of the municipal franchise, which was subsequently dealt with in a public manner, and the Public Bodies which were then opposed to his action have since thanked him for the course he took. In the City of Cork, with a municipal population of 80,000, there are seven wards; on the same basis Belfast ought to have 21 wards. If the Instruction be agreed to the Committee would be able to carry it into effect in one or two sittings, as there are already two or three schemes on the subject. The Royal Commission itself recommended the increase of the wards to 15. It is useless for hon. Members to say they are prepared to concede fair-play to the 70,000 Catholics of Belfast if they oppose a reasonable proposition of this kind. I hope Members will allow the Instruction to pass, and no longer give an exhibit of illiberality and bigotry.

(4.23.) THE CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES (Mr. COURTNEY, C. wall, Bodmin): The hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton) calls attention to the fact that a quarter of the population of that city is Roman Catholic, and that there is not a single Catholic member among the 40 sitting on the Council. I think, Sir, if this is so, it is a very grave circumstance, a fact to be condemned; a fact remedied, as it shows that in the ministration of affairs in Belfast a considerable minority has no share. I do not think it follows that this evil will be best remedied by passing the Instruction proposed by the hon. Member. It appears to me that there are objections on two grounds. In the first place it would throw on the Committee a difficult task, which I do not know whether the Committee would be able to charge, and I doubt very much whether, if they could carry out the Instruction, it would quite answer the aim which the hon. Member has in view. To give this Instruction to the Committee is to impose upon it a difficult task of redistributing the area into wards, and certainly such a proposition would never be considered in spite of what has been said by the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. Picton) in reference to any English city. We are at the present time the Birmingham Water Bill before the House, and I wonder what would be thought of a proposition to re-consider, say, Parliamentary representation of the city in connection with that Bill. The hon. Member says there are two important powers entrusted to Belfast by the Bill; so there is a new power given by the Birmingham Bill. The hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Flynn) thinks that it would be easy for the Committee to carry out the Instruction, because there are three plans to select from. I think if there were only one plan it might be easy, but with three opposing plans the difficulty of the matter is increased.

MR. SEXTON: Does the right hon. Gentleman remember that the Royal Commission suggested a plan?

MR. COURTNEY: Yes. The Commission suggested a plan, but it seems to have been so unfavourably received that the two Local Bodies proposed two other separate plans. All these plans are eleven years old, and the population of Belfast has grown considerably since then. I do not think it can be seriously suggested that this would be a convenient way to settle the question; if it is to be done at all it should be done by a special Bill. The hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton) has raised the question of the municipal franchise again and again on other Belfast Private Bills, and I also felt it to be my duty to oppose the principle then. There may be some ground for doing something, but I do not know whether if the city were divided into an additional number of wards the Catholics would get more representation on the Council. We have already had some experience, and it tends to negative the hope that there would be Catholic representation on the Corporation. I will point out to the hon. Member a simple way of securing his object. He can propose a simple clause, when the Bill comes down for report on Third Reading, requiring that in future municipal elections in Belfast the principle of cumulative voting shall be applied. He might then get full representation for the Catholics in a much simpler manner than would be the case under his present proposal.

(4.27.) MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.): I venture to think that in one argument he used the right hon. Gentleman was under a misapprehension as to the facts. He says if an English Bill were introduced, with the same object, the House would not listen to a proposal for a re-arrangement of the wards of an English city as part of the Bill. I agree with him, but why? Because there is a special general provision in the Municipal Corporations Act for the re-distribution of the wards of English cities, under which a Commissioner is sent down by the Home Secretary; he inquires into the circumstances, and divides the city into new wards. In Ireland there is no such provision, and the only way we can get a re-distribution is to come to this House and insert a provision in a Private Bill. This, therefore, is not an unusual way; as a matter of fact, it is the only way in which we can attempt to do it. The right hon. Gentleman the Chairman of Ways and Means seems to think that if minorities are not to be represented on Hare's system, they ought not to be represented at all. What the Irish Members want is that it should be done in the same simple and efficacious way such as is adopted in English towns. It would be quite easy to divide Belfast into wards, and there would be no necessity for going into lengthy details in a Bill; it could be done by some impartial persons, such as the Ordnance Survey Commissioners named in the Bill. Let it be borne in mind that in this Bill it is proposed for the first time to give powers intimately connected with religion in Belfast to the Belfast Municipality. I think if you give these new powers you should at the same time provide for the representation of the religious minority.

(4.35.) MR. A. BLANE (Armagh, S.): I know that Armagh and other towns in the North of Ireland are most anxious that their boundaries should be extended. What all the Irish Members are asking for is that this House should deal with Belfast as it deals with Birmingham and Liverpool and other English towns. The Presbyterian Body of Belfast are as much interested in this matter as the Catholics are, for they are almost in the same need of representation, so that this is a question which interests them quite as much as it interests the Roman Catholics. There are many of the divisions in Belfast where a Presbyterian has no chance of being returned to the Municipal Corporation, and the Presbyterian Body are, therefore, most intimately concerned in the question. This question of the representation of minorities is one which requires the serious attention of the House, and particularly as it affects the North of Ireland. I can speak for the City of Armagh, and I say that it is much required. In Belfast not only the Roman Catholic, but the Presbyterian is deprived of representation—wholly and completely deprived of it, I might say ; and we ask the House to remedy this disgraceful condition of affairs. I think the House should listen to the appeal that is being made to it, and that, at least, it should direct that there be some result for all the trouble and all the expense that has been gone to in giving evidence before the Municipal Boundary Commissioners.

(4.40.) MR. J. PINKERTON (Galway) : I am compelled to say that this matter should not, in my opinion, be managed simply in accordance with the ideas that are so constantly promulgated in Orange Lodges ; nor should it be managed in accordance with the ideas of a Tory Municipality. It is only right that the Government should express their intentions with regard to this matter, which I regard as one of great importance. We in the North of Ireland regard the question as one of vast importance, and we ask the House to interfere in relation to it. Why should not such a division of Belfast into wards be effected as would give the Catholic population at least a fair representation on the Municipal Corporation ? Belfast occupies at present quite an exceptional position. The Tories there have, in fact, reduced intolerant practices to an exact science ; they have crushed out the Presbyterian Body ; they have crushed out the Catholic Body ; they have managed to keep the representation to themselves, and not in Great Britain can you find a place in which there is such distinct exclusiveness exercised ; no man who is not prepared to bow the knee to the Grand Lama of Toryism has, in fact, a chance of filling any office in Belfast. I hold that the opposition to the measure is fully justified, and that we are fully justified in fighting the matter, having regard to the importance of the question and the number of people who are interested in its solution.

(4.45.) SIR WILLIAM HAROURT (Derby) : I think the constituencies will have to consider whether it is for the advantage of the House that they should find themselves discussing Irish matters of purely local interest night after night. I think the proceedings to-night form an illustration of the method by which this House deals with Irish affairs, but under the existing circumstances, the discussion could not be avoided. Still, it will be for the country to consider whether the system ought not to be changed. But the most appropriate course for dealing with a matter of this kind is not by Private Bill or by Resolution. Everybody, I suppose, admits that the present distribution of the wards in Belfast has caused great political and religious injustice in that city. Under the English Municipal Corporations Act there is a machinery for the re-distribution of wards where altered circumstances demand such a change ; but in Ireland there is no such power under present conditions. You say that you are willing to extend equal justice to Ireland as to England. Why do you not do it ? I say that if this power which exists in England be not extended to Ireland, the Government will be guilty of injustice to Ireland in spite of their protestations. I ask the Government, will they undertake to bring in a Bill for the purpose of dealing with this question ; or will they undertake in some way to do what is necessary, so as to give Belfast the same rights and the same measure of justice as has been given to English cities under the Municipal Corporations Act ? I do hope that the Government will take this matter in hand, and not leave it in the condition in which it is at present.

(4.53.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.) : I am afraid the right hon. Gentleman has lost sight of two important matters. We are told that the grievance in Belfast is that the distribution of wards has been so designed that although one-fourth of the population is Catholic still the whole of the Municipal Corporation is Protestant, and that the Roman Catholics cannot get representation upon the Corporation. The House must not run away with the idea, as I am afraid the right hon. Gentleman would have it do, that such a grievance, be that grievance great or small, would be removed if we were to apply to Ireland the same legislation as exists in England. Let it be recollect that under the English Act, when there is a question affecting the distribution of

wards in towns, the Home Secretary has only power to move in the matter when two-thirds of the Town Council petition him to exercise his power. In a case like Belfast, where it is said the Council all take the one view, I ask, what probability is there that a two-thirds majority of the Council would petition the Home Secretary to take action in the matter? The right hon. Gentleman seems to think that the state of things which he describes as connected with Belfast is peculiar to Belfast, and to Belfast only. It is nothing of the kind. I understand that a Bill is shortly to be brought into the House to enable the wards in Liverpool to be redistributed, the difference in the size of the wards being at present immense. But I am informed that the Home Rule Party in Liverpool made such strong resistance to the proposal that two-thirds of the Council should petition the Home Secretary to take action that it was absolutely impossible to set matters right in the manner proposed. The second point which the right hon. Gentleman has overlooked is not less interesting. The right hon. Gentleman appealed to the Government to bring in a Bill dealing with this question. Well, my reply is, that the Government have brought in a Bill to deal with it. If the right hon. Gentleman had only taken pains to read the Bill, which I confess he has spent a good deal of time in denouncing, if he had read through the clause of the Irish Local Government Bill—a Bill which could hardly be mentioned in his presence without moving him to indignation—he would have seen that the Government propose measures by means of which the re-distribution of Irish boundaries can be effected more easily than can those of wards in English towns at present. I think the Government is doing more than justice to Ireland by giving her a more complete method of dealing with this difficulty than any method possessed by the Municipal Corporations of England.

(4.57.) MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I think when the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury talks of a remedy which will be applied to the grievances of Belfast under the Local Government Bill, he refers to a very dim and distant future. The right hon. Gentleman has referred to the case of Liverpool. I ask the House to say, if the grievance was felt as strongly in Liverpool as it is in Belfast, and if the Corporation of Liverpool were to come to this House for aid, would not the House take good care to give it? We have now an opportunity of remedying this grievance, a grievance which the right hon. Gentleman does not deny, and I ask the right hon. Gentleman why not therefore act at once? I admit that the way in which it is proposed to apply the remedy is not the best way; but let the Government propose a better plan, and we will accept it.

MR. O'KELLY (Roscommon, N.): I think the speech of the First Lord of the Treasury affords the best justification for the Motion of the hon. Member for West Belfast. If the Government will not introduce a Bill to remove the grievance which is complained of, and will not allow this Instruction to go on the Minutes, because they have already provided a remedy for the grievance in the Irish Local Government Bill—if that Bill ever becomes law, and the probabilities are that it will not become law—in the meantime they get through this Bill increasing the powers of the Belfast Corporation. Therefore, they will increase their powers without removing the grievance which they admit. What I propose is that, if the Government are in earnest, they should postpone this Bill until after the passing of the Local Government Bill, if they are honest. If they are not honest, then I think it is the duty of this House to take such measures as are possible to prevent this Bill going any further.

*(5.3.) MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.): The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury has given Liverpool as an instance of the re-distribution of wards, and has stated that it was only the Home Rulers in Liverpool who were a stumbling-block in the way of the re-distribution of wards in Liverpool. ("Hear, hear.") I beg to tell the hon. Member who says "hear, hear!" and the right hon. Gentleman that that is not the case. Many years before the Home Rule question became a burning question in Liverpool, or had a representation in the Town Council of that city, there were several motions for the re-distribution of the wards of that city, and they were always opposed by the Tory party, who held a monopoly of that city for over 50 years before, and tried so to jerry-mander the re-distribution as to continue for 50 years more to be masters. The Liberal party of the city had increased up to the year 1882, and were nearly able to control the city by the election of Mayor; and it was only when the Tory party got alarmed in that way that they then put forward at that particular period a movement for the re-distribution of the city; because they wanted to incorporate with the city the suburbs, the snobocracy of the city, so that they might be able to make up for what they had lost in the central wards of the city, by re-distribution. I feel bound to say, in justice to the citizens of Liverpool that the religious question never entered into this dispute. The people have been generally willing to let the Catholics have a fair representation, although they are one-third of the city. I wish to refer to that part of the speech of the hon. Member for South Belfast where he said that Belfast disapproved of revolutionary projects. Well, it is something new to me to hear that Belfast and the North of Ireland disapproves of revolutionary projects. I thought that Belfast and the North of Ireland were supporters of the pretensions of the Duke of Cumberland to get on the Throne of England when all the rest of Ireland—

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): I beg to deny this accusation of treason.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: Undoubtedly, if history is not altogether a lie, the Orangemen of Ireland did support the pretensions of the Duke of Cumberland to get on the Throne of England. There never was a revolution in Ireland that had not its headquarters and its best supporters in the North of Ireland. I wish also to refer to the speech of the hon. Baronet the Member for North Belfast, which to my mind throws a flood of light on the proceedings of five or six years ago, namely, the riots of Belfast on that occasion. We heard that out of the works on the Queen's Island, presided over by the hon. Baronet, men were allowed to carry out tons of nuts and bolt-heads in their pockets to fire at the heads of Catholics—(Cries of "Order, order !")

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The question of the Belfast riots has nothing to do with the Bill before the House.

*MR. P. O'BRIEN: I beg to withdraw the expression. I do hope the House will support the Motion of the hon. Member for West Belfast, and give the people a fair representation. I think it could be very easily done; and I think the Government should give us some assurance that if it cannot be done in this Bill they will use the powers they have to see that people get fair representation.

(5.6.) MR. NEVILLE (Liverpool, Exchange): As I understand, the Irish Representatives put before the House a grievance, which is fully admitted, with regard to the re-distribution of the wards of Belfast, and the Government have been already appealed to from the Front Opposition Bench as well as by Members below the Gangway, and they have refused to undertake to propose or support any measure of relief for the remedy of this grievance—("No, no!")

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have distinctly told the House that we have amply dealt with the subject in the Bill now before the House.

SIR WILLIAM HAROURT: I should like to ask—("Order, order!")

MR. NEVILLE: Any special peculiar remedy with regard to Belfast. Now it has been pointed out that there is a Bill which is directed to the special remedy of a legitimate grievance in Liverpool—("No")—and I ask the House to pay attention to the attitude of the Government to-day, and to recollect it, and bear it in mind when that other Bill comes before the House; and I ask them to contrast the attitude of the Government to-day with what we on this side of the House know will be the attitude of the Government when this Bill relating to Liverpool, which is supported by the Liverpool Tories, comes to be dealt with.

(5.10.) SIR CHARLES BUSSELL (Hackney, S.): I am afraid the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord has a very imperfect acquaintance with the provisions of that great measure, the Local Government Bill for Ireland. He has assured the House that the Government, by that Bill, are going to provide a remedy for the state of things existing in Belfast; and I presume he refers to the 30th clause of that Bill. He cannot have read it, or he would not have misled the House; he would not have made that statement. The clause provides, that, "Whenever it is represented by the Council of any County, Borough, or Municipal Borough"—I omit the other words—then the proceedings may be taken. What remedy is that to begin with?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Will the hon. and learned Gentleman allow me to interrupt him? I desired to reply to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby; and I said that while the English Act required two-thirds of the Council to take action, the Local Government Bill for Ireland only required a majority. And, therefore, my contention was that we had not only proposed to do all that had been done for England, but to do more than had been done for England.

SIR CHARLES RUSSELL: I hope the supporters of the First Lord are content with that explanation. It seems to me to fall very far short of being a satisfactory one. The right hon. Gentleman made that statement in reply to my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby, no doubt, but he went on to say—and I believe he was understood by the House to say—that in the measure which the Government were bringing forward they would provide a remedy for the case of Belfast. Now, we all know that it is not a question of the division of parties in the Council at Belfast, for they are all of the one political complexion; and, therefore, under this Local Government Bill, if it ever become law, the grievance would be as great as it is at the present moment, and this Bill would afford no adequate remedy whatever. I agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, that nobody can say this is the most convenient way of dealing with the question; but it is the only way we have, and certainly, having an opportunity of dealing with it, and of taking the expression of the opinion of the House upon it, we do not intend to lose that opportunity.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 172; Noes 195.—(Div. List, No. 13.)

MOTIONS.

THE ELECTRIC AND CABLE RAILWAY SCHEMES.

MR. WHITMORE (Chelsea): I rise to move the Resolution which stands in my name. There is no doubt at all that the result of the labours of the Joint Committee that sat in 1864 was to give London a perfect system of external communication. Numerous important schemes for electric and cable lines are now before Parliament, and if they are considered independently the result may be that London will be intersected by unnecessary and even conflicting lines, when what is wanted is a scheme as comprehensive and perfect as that of 1864. It is in the hope that that will be the outcome of the labours of a Joint Committee that I venture to move this Resolution.

*MR. T. H. BOLTON (St. Pancras, N.): Sir, I rise to second the Motion. I brought forward a portion of this subject last Session in connection with a Bill for the construction of a tunnel railway from the City to the West End, and the question then raised was how far the people of London had some right to compensation for the interference with the subsoil of the streets. That is an important question, and will, I suppose, come before the Committee. There is the larger question as to the general arrangements with reference to these railways—the level, the sort of cuttings, the size, the direction they shall take, and the dealing with the subsoil of private property that they may disturb. The Reference to the Committee will probably cover all these questions, so that all the important subjects raised can be considered.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a Joint Committee of Lords and Commons be appointed to consider the best method of dealing with the Electric and Cable Railway Schemes proposed to be sanctioned within the limits of the Metropolis by Bills introduced, or to be introduced, in the present Session, and to report their opinion as to whether underground Railways worked by electricity or cable traction are calculated to afford sufficient accommodation for the present and probable future traffic; as to whether any, and which, of the Schemes propose satisfactory lines of route; as to the terms and conditions under which the subsoil should be appropriated; whether any, and, if any, what Schemes should not be proceeded with during the present Session."—(Mr. Whitmore.)

MR. KIMBER (Wandsworth): I rise to move, as an addition to the Resolution, to add after the word "Session" these words—

"And that such Committee have power to hear the parties promoting such Bill, and, if desired by them, receive evidence thereon."

Sir, in moving this addition I desire to say that I quite concur in the object of the Resolution moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Chelsea, and all I wish is to give power to the Committee to hear parties and witnesses before pronouncing any judgment which might arrest the progress of many valuable schemes. There are already lodged no fewer than seven Bills of which this Committee would, doubtless, take cognizance and examine into, in order to test the principles which they may lay down for the guidance of Parliament. But it would be most unfair to those who have come to this House with their Bills, having incurred great expense and expecting that their Bills would be considered in the usual way by a Select Committee—I say it would be most unfair to these parties if, without calling upon them to show cause, the Joint Committee were to report that these schemes should not be proceeded with. I therefore move my Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Question, to add the words, "and that such Committee have power to hear the parties promoting such Bills, and, if desired by them, receive evidence thereon."—(Mr. Kimber.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. COURTNEY: Sir, I hope the hon. Member will consent to the withdrawal of these words for the present. There is a great deal in what he said that is, in my opinion, of a decisive character. It would be very unfair that the Joint Committee should express an opinion upon a particular scheme without hearing from the promoters whether it is part of a general scheme or what were its merits. However, I will not enter into those points. I only rose to ask the hon. Member not in the meantime to press the words, which have not been under the consideration of the noble Lord the Chairman of Committees in the other House, but to allow the Resolution to pass in its original form; and if he does that, will take care that the words are brought under the notice of the noble Lord and of the Joint Committee.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

*MR. ISAACS (Walworth): I entirely agree with the hon. Member for Chelsea; but with reference to the Report of this Joint Committee, I think it should be understood that there should in the matter of these electric railways be no such result from the Committee as that resulting from the Committee which sat in 1864. It is very much the habit of Parliament to lay down rules as regards Metropolitan and other Railways, and to lead people to believe, when assenting to these schemes, that they will not sanction any competitive lines. In 1864 the Committee laid it down that the great trunk thoroughfares, such as Oxford Street and Uxbridge Road, should not be interfered with in any way for the formation of railway lines. Nineteen millions of money have been spent in underground railways in London under the impression that Parliament, having imposed that condition, would not, in any subsequent period have allowed these thoroughfares, which the promoters I allude to were precluded from touching, to be interfered with. Notwithstanding, however, the Report of the Joint Committee in 1864, Parliament last year sanctioned the Central London Railway Bill for a line running from Shepherd's Bush to the City. Looking to the fact that for railway enterprises money must necessarily be largely subscribed, it would be well to bear in mind, when laying down any special rules for lines of railway that people who promote schemes expect when the routes are once fixed.

they will not be interfered with by competing line.

in Question put, and agreed to.

solved, That a Joint Committee of Lords Commons be appointed to consider the method of dealing with the Electric and Railway Schemes proposed to be sanctified within the limits of the Metropolis by introduced, or to be introduced, in the next Session, and to report their opinion whether underground Railways worked electricity or cable traction are calculated for sufficient accommodation for the present and probable future traffic; as to whether any, and which, of the Schemes proposed satisfactory lines of route; as to the and conditions under which the subsoil should be appropriated; whether any, and, if what Schemes should not be proceeded during the present Session.

dered, That a Message be sent to Lords to communicate this Resolution and desire their concurrence.

v. Borough of Belfast (East Division), v. Edward Samuel Wesley Cobain, Esq., expelled this House. (v. Akers-Douglas.)

OOR LAW (IRELAND) RELIEF.

oved for—

turn showing, as regards each Poor Law in Ireland, the number of Persons of each 65 years of age and upwards, and the under 65 years of age who have attained years of age, and the number of Children 16 years of age, in receipt from Boards Guardians of Indoor Relief or Outdoor respectively, during the twelve months 1st Lady Day, 1892.—(Mr. Mahony.)

RITCHIE: I think the hon. Gentleman has put down a Motion for turn in the same language as the turn I moved for England. We are considering an alteration with the view getting a little more information, perhaps the hon. Gentleman postpone his Motion for a day or so, that we may have the English & Irish Returns uniform.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

QUESTIONS.

SUPPLEMENTARY SCHOOL GRANTS.

MR. MACLURE (Lancashire, S.E., Stretford): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether, in view of the fact that in many districts the fee grant of 10s. per head on average attendance, conceded by the Assisted Education Act of 1891, does not equal the fees paid before the passing of the Act, and as it is impossible to free all the schools in such districts without inflicting great hardship upon their managers and supporters, the Government will bring in a Bill to enable County Councils to supplement the new fee grant by a sum equal to the difference between the grant and the average fee paid in the district under its jurisdiction during the last school year ended the 1st of January, 1891, provided that in all schools receiving such supplementary grant the fees shall be either abolished or reduced by the amount of the said grant?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): It was not the intention of the Elementary Education Act, 1891, to abolish the payment of fees in all classes of schools, and, as at present advised, I fear I cannot undertake the introduction of a Bill for the objects suggested in the question of my hon. Friend.

TORPEDO VESSELS.

MR. GOURLEY (Sunderland): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he has, or whether he intends organising in detail, a plan of campaign for the various types of ships comprising the squadrons of the Navy; if so, has he considered the part likely to be demanded of vessels of the torpedo class; and whether he is aware that Foreign Maritime Powers attach more importance to this description of naval warfare than the British Admiralty; the French Minister of Marine having provided France with 184, and the Italian Minister of Marine Italy with 123 torpedo vessels, as against 85 now in the British Navy?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing) : The subject mentioned in the first sentence of the question has received all the attention which its importance deserves, and the employment of all classes of ships likely to be used in war has, of course, not been omitted from the consideration of the Admiralty. We have no reason to suppose that any Foreign Naval Power attaches more importance than we do to any description of naval warfare ; but it is quite likely that Continental Powers are alive to the policy of employing the methods best adapted to their own peculiar circumstances, instead of copying those suited to other countries, of which the maritime conditions are different.

THE AUTUMN MILITARY MANOEUVRES.

MR. GOURLEY : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if, during the Autumn Manœuvres of the troops quartered at Aldershot and elsewhere, His Royal Highness the Commander in Chief attended and superintended the operations ; and whether he intends issuing an official Report of the Manœuvres similar to that of the Admiralty regarding the Naval Manœuvres ?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle) : There have not been Autumn Manœuvres for several years ; but there have been at Aldershot and in other commands exercises in the field of troops stationed there. These were under the respective Generals commanding, who reported for His Royal Highness's information. Such drills were not analogous to the Naval Manœuvres, and it is not intended to publish a Report upon them.

THE ALLOWANCES OF OFFICERS OF MILITIA AND VOLUNTEER ARTILLERY.

COLONEL HILL (Bristol, South) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that officers of Militia Artillery attending a class of instruction in coast defence and range finding at Devonport receive pay and allowances amounting for the week to about £9 for majors, £8 for captains, and £7 for lieutenants, while officers of Volunteer Artillery of all ranks receive only about £3 for attending the same course ; and, whether, viewing the importance of inducing officers of Volunteers to make the sacrifice of £1 necessary to obtain this instruction will encourage them by placing them upon the same terms as officers of Militia ?

MR. E. STANHOPE : The reason for the difference pointed out by gallant Friend is that Militia officers when at training are entitled to the same pay and allowances, rank and rank, as officers of the Regular Army whereas officers of the Volunteers, longing to a force whose proud distinction is to serve without pay during peace, are only granted an allowance for subsistence and lodgings.

THE LIMERICK BOARD OF FISH CONSERVATORS.

MR. MAHONY (Meath, N.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether election of conservators to Limerick Board of Fishery Conservators in the districts of Limerick and Athlone has been declared by Court of Queen's Bench null and void ; and, if so, whether he can state when it is intended to hold a new election ?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.) : I understand that the arguments before the Court of Queen's Bench in this case are not yet closed, and therefore I cannot express any opinion in matter.

MR. MAHONY : Can you tell when the arguments are likely to be closed ?

MR. JACKSON : No, Sir.

POSTMEN — STAMPERS AND BOX-CLEARERS.

MR. SEALE-HAYNE (Devon, A. Burton) : I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether it is true that postmen engaged as stampers have an allowance of 2s. per week in lieu of Christmas boxes ; and, if so, why are postmen engaged in box-clearing not entitled to a similar allowance ?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Sir JAMES FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): Town postmen employed upon stamping duties receive an extra allowance in addition to their wages, because their work is regarded as superior in some respects to ordinary postmen's work, and the men employed on it have to be selected from the postmen's class for steadiness and good conduct. As such men would sometimes lose pecuniarily by not performing the outdoor delivery duty, it is thought right for this reason, as well as on account of the better nature of the work, to give them some extra weekly payment. This varies from 2s. in the smaller offices to 3s. and 4s. in the larger. Box-clearing is an elementary duty which is usually performed by the junior postmen before they obtain a regular walk. No selection is required for this duty, and it is certainly not necessary to pay the men anything extra for doing it.

THE ROYAL NAVAL ARTILLERY VOLUNTEERS.

MR. LLEWELLYN (Somerset, N.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether, in consequence of the disbanding of the Royal Naval Artillery Volunteers, the officers will be permitted to retire with their present rank, and to wear the uniform of the corps to which they belonged?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: I am unable to give at present a definite reply to the question of the hon. Gentleman, as the final arrangements for the disbanding of the corps and the future disposition of the Royal Naval Artillery Volunteers have not yet been made, but the matter will receive the careful consideration of the Admiralty.

TRAWLING IN IRELAND.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that the practice relating to trawling in Ireland is totally the opposite to that of Scotland, England, and France; if he would state by whose authority in Ireland a fishing policy opposed to the practice of Scotland, England, and France is maintained; by whom is the Fishery Board in Ireland appointed, and by whom is the Privy Council appointed, and, if there is any elected body which has any voice on sea-fishery matters in Ireland?

MR. JACKSON: I have no official information in regard to the practice relating to trawling pursued in Scotland, England, and France. The fishing policy in Ireland is determined by the common law, and by special Acts of Parliament. The Inspectors of Irish Fisheries are appointed by the Lord Lieutenant. Privy Councillors in Ireland are appointed under the Sign Manual of the Queen. No elected body in Ireland has a voice in sea-fishery matters save as regards salmon and sea trout; but all bye-laws made by the Inspectors of Irish Fisheries are subject to an appeal to the Lord Lieutenant and Privy Council, by any person interested, before such bye-laws can come into operation.

COLONEL NOLAN: Is it no part of the duty of the Fishery Board in Ireland to make itself acquainted with the fishing law of other countries?

MR. JACKSON: The first duty of the Fishery Board is, I apprehend, to carry out the law.

COLONEL NOLAN: Is it no part of any person's duty—the Lord Lieutenant, the Chief Secretary, or the Fishery Commissioners—to ascertain the practice of any other countries; and can no official of the Irish Government give us any information?

MR. JACKSON: I have no doubt the Fishery Board have a profound knowledge of what the law is with regard to Scotland, and England, and France; but their first duty is to administer the law.

COLONEL NOLAN: The object of the Irish Fishery Board is to know, and to be able to say whether the Irish policy is in line with that of other countries or not.

MR. JACKSON: No, Sir; I think not.

THE RIVER BANN.

MR. PINKERTON (Galway) : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if it is the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill this Session for the purpose of enabling them to remove the artificial obstructions placed upon the River Bann?

MR. JACKSON: My right hon. Friend has asked me to answer this question. I have to say that the Government hope to introduce this Session a Bill dealing with the drainage of the river mentioned.

MR. PINKERTON: Is it the intention of the Government to extend to the proposed County Councils in Ireland power to deal with the question of drainage?

MR. JACKSON: If the hon. Member will read the Local Government Bill he will see what the Government propose to do.

GREEN STREET COURTHOUSE,
DUBLIN.

MR. KILBRIDE (on behalf of Mr. M. J. KENNY, Tyrone, Mid.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if it has been arranged that the Commission of Oyer and Terminer and General Gaol Delivery hitherto held in the Green Street Courthouse, Dublin, will in future be held in the Four Courts; if the criminal and civil business of the Recorder of the City of Dublin is to be discharged as heretofore at Green Street; whether Mr. W. Kaye Perry, C.E., has reported to the Lord Chief Justice that Green Street Courthouse is unfit for human occupation; and whether the Irish Government refuse to do anything to replace the present Courthouse unless there is a local contribution of two-thirds of the total amount of the estimated cost?

MR. JACKSON: No general arrangement of the nature indicated in the first paragraph has been come to; but it has been decided to hold the next Commission sitting at the Four Courts. This decision does not include the business of the Recorder. Mr. Kaye Perry has, I understand, reported to the effect indicated. It is not the fact that the Irish Government refused to do anything to replace the present Courthouse. As I have already stated, they are willing to ask the Treasury to revive the charge sanctioned in 1883, which was accepted at that time as satisfactory by all parties concerned, but from which the Corporation of Dublin subsequently withdrew.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Would the Irish Government facilitate by restoring the Lord Mayor to the Commission of Oyer and Terminer? If not, what reason have they for refusing to do so?

MR. JACKSON: I can hardly suppose that, in a matter of such vital consequence as I understand the health of those who attend these Courts to be, the Corporation of Dublin would allow any mere matter of sentiment to stand in the way.

MR. SEXTON: Does the right hon. Gentleman consider it of vital consequence to maintain a wanton insult?

MR. JACKSON: No, Sir.

THE GARVE AND ULLAPOOL RAILWAY.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate why the negotiations which took place last year between the Government and the Garve and Ullapool and Great North of Scotland Railway Companies, with regard to a subsidy of £6,000 a year for 25 years in aid of constructing the Garve and Ullapool Railway, have not been completed; whether he is aware that if the offer of these companies had been accepted the railway might now have been in course of construction; and whether he is aware that no other railway line can be sanctioned by Parliament earlier than the end of the Session in 1893?

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH (Inverness-shire): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he is now prepared to lay upon the Table the Report of the Committee of Experts on the requirements of certain parts of the Western Highlands and Islands of Scotland, and to intimate the intentions of the Government thereon?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Sir C. J. PEARSON, Edinburgh and St. Andrews Universities): I propose to answer at the same time the question put by the hon. Member for Inverness-shire. It was found in the course of the negotiations referred to that the proposed arrangement with the Great North Company was attended with difficulties which a solution could not be found. Departmental Committee of Experts was appointed at that time to report finally on the schemes projected for construction of railways to the west Coast of Scotland. Their Report, which raises many important points, is being carefully considered, and it is proposed to lay it at once on the Table of the House, together with the instructions to that Committee. I am aware it is no sine qua non other than that referred to now be sanctioned this Session by means of private legislation.

THE MILITARY FORCES IN BURMA

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): Beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been drawn to the statements of Lord Roberts at Rangoon, in the Times of the 26th instant, in which he urges strongly that the Military Forces in Burma should be entirely removed from the Madras command, and placed directly under orders of the Commander-in-Chief of India; whether this opinion is shared by the chief Civil and Military Authorities in India; and whether, in pursuance of his statement in the Debate on 17th February, 1891, on the Indian Residential Commands, Her Majesty's Government will proceed, at an early date, to carry out this re-organisation of command suggested by the Commander-in-Chief?

MR. E. STANHOPE: This is a question which should be answered by the War Office. I am afraid I cannot answer it. I do not see my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary for India present, but perhaps the hon. Gentleman will repeat the question at another time.

WOOLWICH ARSENAL.

MR. MATHER (Lancashire, S.E., Ashton): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether, in view of the fact that 697 labourers employed at the Woolwich Arsenal are receiving only from 17s. to 19s. per week, and that according to recently-published statistics, notably by Charles Booth in his work on "Labour and Life," it is impossible in a manufacturing town for a thrifty man to maintain a moderate family, even under conditions of privation, on less than 20s. per week, he will give instructions that the minimum rate of labourers' wages shall be 20s. per week, whatever may be the nature of the employment; and whether he is aware that where such minimum rate is fixed it has proved to be conducive to the interests of employers?

The hon. Member had also on the Paper a question—To ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether, in view of the fact that 215 labourers employed in the Naval Ordnance Department at the Woolwich Arsenal are receiving only from 17s. to 19s. per week, and that, according to recently-published statistics, notably by Mr. Charles Booth in his work on "Labour and Life," it is impossible in a manufacturing town for a thrifty man to maintain a moderate family, even under conditions of privation, on less than 20s. per week, he will give instructions that the minimum rate of labourers' wages shall be 20s. per week, whatever may be the nature of the employment; and whether he is aware that where such minimum rate is fixed it has proved to be conducive to the interests of employers?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: The question addressed to me, and the next one addressed in the same terms to my noble Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty, can be conveniently dealt with together. The position of these labourers was carefully considered last year, and the proportion on the lower rate of wages was reduced; but to adopt the suggestion of the hon. Member would be to depart entirely from the decision deliberately arrived at, nor do we think it would be conducive to the interests of employers to do so.

MR. MATHER: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the evidence before him from a private communication I made to him is not a sufficient ground to warrant further investigation so as to ascertain whether the rate of wages paid to these men in the Arsenal cannot be made equal, at least, to that which prevails in like industries conducted by private firms?

MR. E. STANHOPE: I am much obliged to the hon. Member for the information he gave me; but I am afraid we could not undertake, on the part of the Government, to pay wages to the same extent as are paid by certain private employers.

BERE ISLAND.

MR. GILHOOLY (Cork Co., W.) : I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether, in view of the importance of Bere Island as a fishing station, and also of the frequent visits of Her Majesty's Fleet to that part of Bantry Bay, he will increase the collection and delivery of letters from three to six days a week ?

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON : The receipts for this service do not at present cover the cost, and cannot, therefore, afford that it should be doubled.

TRIPPAGE ALLOWANCES WITH MAILS.

MR. JORDAN (Clare, W.) : I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether any, and, if so, what, re-arrangement has been made or proposed with reference to the trippage allowances of officers travelling in charge of the mails from England to Ireland and vice versa ; will he explain why these officers, who have taken up this service in the confidence that what was always done would be continued (namely, that they would be left in receipt of their allowances during good behaviour, or until they received more remunerative promotion, and would be pensioned on them), have been now informed that they must rotate with others, and so, comparatively speaking, lose both these privileges without any compensation of any kind ; and whether these officers have also similarly suffered from a revision of the Sorting Office in Dublin, which is their head quarters ; and, if so, to what extent and how often this latter office has been revised ?

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON : No re-arrangement has been made of the allowances in question, nor I believe is any at present contemplated. If any new scheme were proposed long-established interests would be considered. There have been revisions of the Sorting Office in Dublin, and, as a result, the superintending force has been augmented and the pay of a large section increased ; but, on the other hand, certain appointments and scales of have been abolished, and will go with the present holders. To extent, the sorters on board the packet and others of like rank have suffered in prospect by the revision. I believe that the augmentations I have mentioned will more than compensate for the abolitions.

THE CASE OF MATTHEW KINSELLA.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lieutenant of Ireland, with reference to Matthew Kinsella, of Dublin, was, in the year 1882, sentenced to ten years' penal servitude for shooting killing one Peter Andrews, whether attention has been called to a decision, dated 25th February, 1892, made by deceased's father, Edward Andrews, of Meath Street, Dublin, before Mr. Fry, J.P., in which declares that Kinsella and his deceased son had been friends and companions from their boyhood ; that they had had a quarrel ; that the shooting was purely an accident ; that Kinsella tried and convicted in a time of past and that, if he had been allowed to give evidence, he could have explained satisfactorily how the unfortunate accident occurred ; and, whether, considering the circumstances of the case and that Kinsella has been in gaol for ten years, he will make inquiry to see if he can advise the remission of the remainder of his sentence ?

MR. JACKSON : I duly received declaration referred to, which was forwarded to me by the hon. Member for the case of the convict mentioned. The case of the convict has been already under consideration by successive Lords Lieutenant in connection with memorials submitted on behalf of the convict. They satisfied themselves that there was not the slightest doubt as to the man's guilt, that there was no mitigating circumstance, that the law must take its course. In regards to the concluding paragraph, it may point out that the Chief Secretary does not advise the Lord Lieutenant to exercise the Royal clemency.

THE MAILS TO THE CUSHENDUN DISTRICT.

MR. SEXTON (on behalf of Mr. T. M. HEALY, Longford, N.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether complaints have arisen that Glasgow letters do not reach the Cushendun district, County Antrim, for two days after they are posted through failure to catch the 6.15 a.m. train from Belfast to Larne with which alone the daily mail-car connects, although passengers from Glasgow are almost invariably able to catch this train; and as there is considerable intercommunication between Glasgow and this portion of Antrim, will he take steps to ensure a regular daily delivery of the Scotch post?

*SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: It is unfortunately the case that the correspondence referred to frequently misses the early train from Belfast to Larne, in connection with which the Postal Service to Cushendun is maintained. There is said to be some difficulty in providing a remedy for this irregularity, but the matter is now under inquiry, and I shall certainly endeavour to have it rectified.

THE SURVIVORS OF BALACLAVA.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, in reference to statements in the Sunday Chronicle (Manchester) newspaper, concerning the survivors of the Balaklava Six Hundred, whether all of the surviving commissioned officers, or a large majority of them, are in receipt of a Government pension; and, if so, will the War Office order any inquiry into the present position of the non-commissioned officers and men who are alleged to be in a state of destitution?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: The hon. Member seems to be under a misapprehension as to the conditions upon which the retired pay to officers and the pensions to non-commissioned officers and men are granted. Neither is given in respect of any particular act or campaign, except in the cases of wounds or broken health, but they are given as a reward for long and faithful service. If, therefore, officers have completed the period of service entitling them to retired pay, they, like soldiers in similar circumstances, will be in receipt of such pay. Otherwise, again, like the soldiers, they will not.

THE CIVIL SERVICE BANK.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if his attention has been called to the prospectus of the "Civil Service Bank (Limited)," from which it appears that several Clerks in Government Offices are Directors of the said Company; and if this is in accordance with the Rules of the Civil Service?

*SIR JOHN GORST: My attention has been called to the prospectus in question. The names of the Directors appear to be generally those of Civil servants, with the names of their Departments added. The Rule of the Civil Service is as follows:—

"No officer shall be allowed to accept any part in the management of any society or any trading, commercial or financial company of whatever description which would require the attendance of such officer at any time between the hours of 10 a.m. and 6 p.m."

but if, as in the present case, members of the Civil Service use the credit of their official position to carry on such a business as banking, which can hardly be efficiently conducted by attendance after 6 p.m., the necessity for making rules of a more stringent character will have to be seriously considered by Her Majesty's Government.

THE STAFF OF PORTLAND PRISON.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has received a memorial from the staff of the Portland Prison, which was presented to the Governor for transmission to the Home Office; whether the Report of the Committee appointed to consider the Prison Officers' grievances recommended the promotion of assistant warders to the pay and rank of warders after ten years' service, but in the case of all assistant warders of longer standing recommended a delay of one year before the commencement of such increase of pay; and whether it is intended to act on this latter recommendation; and whether a similar method has been recommended in reference to the increase of pay of the officers of the civil guard?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): The memorial referred to has been received. The Committee did not make the recommendation alleged in the second paragraph of the question. As I informed the hon. Baronet the Member for Barnard Castle Division (Sir Joseph Pease) last week, I have made an addition to the maximum rates of pay of assistant warders, and also to the maximum pay of officers of the civil guard.

BRITISH EAST AFRICA COMPANY AND MOMBASA RAILWAY SURVEY.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, in view of the fact that Limited Liability Companies enjoying a Royal charter are freed from the obligation of depositing at the end of each year a list of their shareholders at Somerset House, which is open to the inspection of all, and to the statement contained in the letter written by Sir Philip Currie, and by direction of Lord Salisbury, to the Lords of the Treasury, dated 20th December, 1890, that—

"It is notorious that the majority of, if not all, the subscribers (to the company) are actuated rather by philanthropic motives than by receiving any adequate return on their capital,"

he will lay upon the Table of the House a list of the first subscribers to the capital of the Company; the amount of shares subscribed by each; all subsequent transfers; and a list of the present shareholders, with the amount of shares held by each shareholder; and whether, in view of the fact that it is proposed that the State should enter into a partnership with the Company in respect to a railroad, he will lay upon the Table of the House the annual balance sheets of the Company since its formation, showing the amount expended each year, the gross receipts, and the net profit or loss on the transactions of the year; together with the names of the Directors of the Company, and the amounts received each year by them in fees, salaries, or otherwise?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. J. W. LOWTHER, Cumberland, Penrith): Chartered Companies are exempted from the requirements of the Limited Liability Companies' Act in the respect indicated by the hon. Member; but he invites Her Majesty's Government to place this Chartered Company in the same position as a company under the Limited Liability Companies' Act. Her Majesty's Government cannot take the course indicated, nor have they the information necessary to enable them to lay the Papers desired. The Imperial British East Africa Company are, however, prepared, I am informed, to give all the information asked for, if the hon. Member will call at the office of the Company, No. 2, Pall Mall East. As to the second paragraph of the hon. Member's question, Her Majesty's Government will, when the question arises, undoubtedly undertake to satisfy the House of the financial stability of this Company, or of any other with whom Her Majesty's Government may enter into any future arrangement for the execution and completion of the railway if it is undertaken.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I should like to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs precisely the information I am to receive at No. 2, Pall Mall East, if I call. I should like to know if I shall receive a list of the shareholders, in addition to a list of the original shareholders, together with all transfers that may have taken place since the formation of the Company. I would further ask what information Lord Salisbury was in possession of when he said that it was notorious that the majority, if not all, of the subscribers to the Company were actuated rather by philanthropic motives than the receiving of any adequate return for capital. I would further ask if I am to understand that when we are asked to endorse the action of Lord Salisbury we are not to have it made known to us who these philanthropists are to whom Lord Salisbury referred?

*MR. J. W. LOWTHER: As to the first question, I think the answer will be best obtained if the hon. Member will call at the office. I am informed that the British East Africa Company are prepared to give all the information for which he has asked in the question put down on the Paper. With regard to the second question, the same sources of information were open to Lord Salisbury when he made the statement referred to as are, and were, open to the hon. Member. With regard to the third question, the matter seems one rather of argument, and therefore I do not think I should be in order in referring to it.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Will not the hon. Gentleman give to this House the list of shareholders, which I gather from his answer was in the hands of Lord Salisbury when he made this extraordinary statement?

*MR. J. W. LOWTHER: No, Sir; I have told the hon. Member that the information is not in the possession of the Foreign Office. As the hon. Member is aware, the names of the promoters of the Chartered Company have already been made public, and are to be found in the Blue Book, Africa, 1888, No. 10, I think.

THE ROYAL NAVAL ARTILLERY VOLUNTEERS OF HASTINGS.

SIR H. FLETCHER (on behalf of Mr. NOBLE, Hastings): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he will take into consideration the unfavourable position of Hastings as a station for a corps of Submarine Miners, and allow the Hastings corps of the Royal Naval Artillery Volunteers to be absorbed into a fortress company of the Royal Engineer Volunteers, as a special case, instead of into a submarine mining company?

MR. E. STANHOPE: There are difficulties in the case of Hastings, as we do not want submarine miners there, and there are already three companies of Artillery connected with the town. I will make further inquiries as to the possibility of utilising this corps of Royal Naval Artillery Volunteers there.

THE PUBLIC HEALTH ACTS AMENDMENT ACT, 1890.

MR. JORDAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if the Irish Local Government Board have yet made and issued such regulations, as they are empowered to do by Part 5 of "The Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890," by which Municipal Corporations, Urban and other Authorities, may borrow money by the creation of stock; is he aware that the Enniskillen Town Commissioners and Urban Sanitary Authority more than twelve months ago, namely, in January 1891, complied with the requirements of the Act in relation to its adoption, and requested the Local Government Board immediately to formulate rules to that effect, being the first authorities in Ireland to make application under the Act; in view of the fact that the Act has been put into operation long since in England, will he explain wherefore the delay by the Irish Local Government Board; and will he say whether or not the Irish Local Government Board will at all, and when, issue those necessary regulations, to enable Irish Authorities to avail themselves of the provisions of the Act?

MR. JACKSON: Some necessary delay has occurred in the preparation of the regulations referred to; but they are now completed, and will be forthwith promulgated.

WEST CLARE AND THE SCHEDULED DISTRICTS.

MR. JORDAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland has received a Memorial from the fishermen, labourers, small farmers, and others in different districts of West Clare, praying him to include the maritime Baronies of Ibrickene, Corcomroe, and Moyasta in the list of scheduled districts, with a view to the improvement of harbours, the planting of trees, the improvement of the breed of cattle, and the development of fisheries and agriculture; and if His Excellency has favourably considered their application?

MR. JACKSON: The Memorial in question has been received and referred to the Congested Districts Board for their consideration.

YELLOW FEVER AT SANTOS.

MR. LAWRENCE (Liverpool, Abercromby): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that it is reported the yellow fever at Santos has reached such a height that there is no one left to carry on business, the well-being obliged to devote attention to the sick; that in consequence merchandise has accumulated so as to block the streets; that the epidemic has been aggravated by the authorities continuing to dredge the port; and whether he has any means of informing the shipping community of the condition of the port other than the brief notice in the Board of Trade Journal, or of otherwise guarding against the risks of British subjects trading in that port?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir MICHAEL HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): Yes, Sir; I believe the facts as stated by the hon. Member are substantially accurate. On the 8th February I caused a notice to be sent to the daily papers, to the Press Agencies, and to Lloyd's, suggesting that, owing to the insanitary condition of Santos, no ships should be chartered for that port. I do not see what further steps I could usefully take, but probably some good may be done by the public attention which my hon. Friend has called to the matter.

ENNISKILLEN GAOL.

MR. JORDAN (Clare, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if the Prisons Board claim the area in front of the gaol in Enniskillen, extending from the gaol wall to the channel adjoining the country road leading south to Castlecoole; and, if so, is it the duty of the Board to keep it in proper repair and clean it; will they either do so, or hand it over to the Local Authority, the Town Commissioners, to put it into and keep it in proper condition; and is this gaol being now used as a prison, or is it intended that the authorities will discontinue its use as such, and permit it to fall into further dilapidation; if not, will they instruct an engineer to inspect and report on the condition and appearance of the outside front wall, doors, &c., with a view to due repairs?

MR. JACKSON: The subject-matter of this question is one which necessitates some inquiry, and I shall be glad if the hon. Member would be good enough to put a further question on the Paper.

FLEET STREET POST OFFICE.

MR. BAUMANN (Camberwell, Peckham): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that it is a matter of constant occurrence for letters addressed to the newspaper offices in the neighbourhood of Fleet Street and posted before 3 a.m. not to be delivered till noon on that day; and whether he will direct inquiry to be made at the Fleet Street office into the cause of this delay?

MR. BIGWOOD (Middlesex, Brentford): I would like to know whether the right hon. Gentleman is aware that inconvenience of a similar character exists in the suburbs?

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: I am informed that no such complaints have been received. My hon. Friend does not say where the letters in question were posted. The 3 a.m. collection is only made in the town districts of London and certain suburbs.

THE CASE OF FLORENCE CAWOOD.

MR. CHARLES WILSON (Hull, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the case of a girl Florence Cawood; and whether in order to prevent a repetition of such cases, he will consider the advisability of proposing alterations in the law to prevent girls being sent to gaol and sentenced to long terms of confinement in reformatories for offences not of a criminal character?

*MR. MATTHEWS: My attention has been called to this case, and I have directed the release of the girl alluded to. The recent Government Bill relating to reformatories had the effect of limiting the application of the reformatory system to cases of a really criminal character, and even in those cases made preliminary imprisonment a matter for the discretion of the committing Magistrate. I should be very glad to see this provision become law. I wish, however, to guard myself from saying that a young person escaping from an industrial school should in no case be sent to a reformatory.

GERMAN EMIGRANTS.

MR. CHARLES WILSON : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the attention of the Government has been called to the proposed alteration in the German Laws, by which the transit of emigrants through English ports will be prohibited; and whether he can give any information on the subject?

*MR. J. W. LOWTHER : No information upon the proposals mentioned has yet been received at the Foreign Office, but Sir E. Malet will be asked for a Report upon the subject.

THE CLAREMORRIS AND COLLOONEY RAILWAY.

MR. JORDAN : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he has seen the statement of the Chairman, Sir Francis Brady, Bart., at the half-yearly meeting of the Waterford and Limerick Railway Company, on Friday last, in relation to the proposed agreement between the Government and that Company for the completion and working of the Claremorris and Collooney line—namely,

"There remains to be executed a formal document by the Board of Works. It would appear that some one has discovered that part of the agreement proposed by the Treasury was at variance with the provisions of some Act of Parliament. I am not able to say how far this may be well-grounded, but if it be, no doubt the Government will be able to take steps to remove all technical difficulties, and enable the work to be continued without delay;"

is he aware that the Directors of the Waterford and Limerick Company refuse to carry out their arrangement with the Treasury, except in violation of "The Tramways Act, 1883," and to the detriment of the guaranteeing cess-payers of the Counties of Sligo and Mayo; and if the Waterford and Limerick Company continue such action, will the Government take such other steps as will, at the earliest possible date, make the line from Claremorris and Collooney available for the traffic of the district?

MR. JACKSON : Sir, in answer to this question, I have not seen the statement referred to in the first part of the question. The facts are, I believe, that the Waterford and Limerick Company have refused to sign the agreement or to accept the proposal which has been made to them with reference to this railway without some alteration of the law, the arrangement made being apparently in violation of the Act of 1883. With reference to the last portion of the question, no doubt, if the Waterford and Limerick Company refuse to carry out the agreement, it will then be for the Government to consider in what form they can accomplish the carrying out of the line in some other way. But I would be unwilling at present to believe that the Waterford and Limerick Company had said the last word on that subject; because, if they declined absolutely to carry out the agreement, they will, no doubt, release the Government from the offer the Government have already made. They have had sufficient time to consider the matter, and I am quite sure they will come to a decision before long.

THE NEW MAGAZINE RIFLE.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether a decision has yet been arrived at as to the patents in connection with the new Magazine rifle; what persons have established a claim to payment for such patents, and whether any person in Government employment is among the number; and what amounts have been paid to, or are intended to be paid to, them respectively on account of their inventions or patents?

*MR. E. STANHOPE : It has been admitted that the British Magazine Rifle Company and Messrs. Greenwood and Batley are entitled to payments on account of patents connected with the rifle and ammunition respectively. The amounts to be paid are, I am sorry to say, not yet finally settled. The above statement does not include patents taken out by persons in the Government employment. I have declined to recognise the claim of Mr. Rigby, the Superintendent of the Small Arms Factory; but as regards Mr. Speed, I am considering whether, looking at his position as a Government employé, and to the circumstances under which his inventions were originated, worked out and patented, he is entitled to any reward at all.

SUNDAY POST AT UPPERCHURCH,
TIPPERARY.

MR. P. J. O'BRIEN (Tipperary, N.) : I beg to ask the Postmaster General, with reference to the memorial received from the inhabitants of Drumbane and Upperchurch, County Tipperary, praying for the accommodation of a Sunday post at Upperchurch, whether the only cost to be incurred would be the payment of a rural messenger for the one day in the week extra, for a distance of five miles, from Ballycahill to Upperchurch ; and whether, in the interests of the Public Service, having regard to the large district to be accommodated with a population of nearly 3,000 inhabitants, he will see his way to have the want provided for ?

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON : The cost to be incurred (between £7 and £8 a year) would be the payment of a rural postman for the one day in the week extra, but the distance which would have to be walked would not be five miles but fully twelve miles. As the existing post is carried on at a serious loss it is not considered that any extra expenditure should be incurred in connection with it.

CLERKS IN THE CENTRAL TELEGRAPH OFFICE.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.) : I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether second class clerks in the Central Telegraph Office, who are performing duties exactly similar to those performed by first class clerks, are entitled to promotion or extra pay in respect of the performance of such duties ; whether any second class clerks now performing first class duties shall receive compensation for such periods as they have performed duties of a higher class ; whether the clerks have any means of distinguishing between first and second class duties during their performance ; and whether he will consider the desirability of directing that in future all promotions from the second to the first class are made so far retrospective as to ensure that the clerk promoted "enjoys a similar advantage" to that of his immediate predecessors ?

*SIR JAMES FERGUSSON : Second class telegraphists, who, owing to the exigencies of the Service, may be temporarily employed upon first class duties are undoubtedly qualifying themselves for promotion to the superior class when vacancies occur. Without such opportunity for acquiring the necessary qualification they, of course, could not be promoted, and when promotion is obtained this in itself affords sufficient compensation for any temporary discharge of higher duties. This is the universal rule of the Service, and I should think of all other Services, and there is no ground whatever for altering it. The distinction between first and second class duties is generally well understood, but there may be cases, of course, in which the one very nearly approaches the other. It is not the practice of the Service in any case to make promotion retrospective beyond the date of the vacancy.

POLLING CARDS.

*SIR JAMES FERGUSSON : If the House will allow me I will take this opportunity of mentioning, with reference to questions as to what may be inserted in polling cards so as to pass by post at the halfpenny rate, that the distinctions maintained appear to be troublesome, that I have given instructions that the name and number of the voter may be inserted in writing, and a circular to this effect will be issued immediately.

ARBORICULTURE IN IRELAND.

MR. HARRISON (Tipperary, Mid.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the authorities in Ireland, following the precedent set by the Board of Agriculture in England, have taken any steps to provide for suitable instruction in the higher and lower branches of arboriculture and silviculture, as advised by the Select Committee on Forestry in 1887 ?

MR. JACKSON : The authorities in Ireland have taken some practical steps with reference to the questions of forestry and of planting, and I have already answered questions on the subject two or three times. I am not aware that they have taken any steps for instruction in the branches referred to in the question, nor do I think that they would. That would very well come within the powers or duties of the Congested Districts Board, to whom the question has been referred.

THE STAMP DISTRIBUTOR AT GOOLE.

MR. AUSTIN (York, W.R., Osgoldcross) : I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if his attention has been called to a memorial sent to the Treasury, numerously signed by ship-owners, bankers, merchants, chairmen of the Local Bodies, and others, gentlemen of both political parties, protesting against the position of stamp distributor being taken from the office of Messrs. Gardiner & Co., printers and publishers, Goole, they having held the office for many years to the satisfaction of the public and faithfully to the Crown ; if it is true that Mr. Elvin, the printer and publisher of a new Conservative newspaper recently established at Goole, has been appointed stamp distributor ; and if he will consider the additional appointment of Mr. Robert Hudson, a member of the firm of Messrs. Gardiner & Co., who has practically discharged the duties of the office for some time ?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.) : Sir, no such Memorial as that described by the hon. Member has been brought to my notice. I understand that Mr. Gardiner resigned last autumn. Mr. Elvin, who was strongly recommended from other quarters and is well qualified, was selected. The salary attached is only £8. The Inland Revenue Department cannot, I understand, recommend that this £8 should be further sub-divided by being allocated to two individuals.

MR. AUSTIN : Do I understand the First Lord of the Treasury to say that no such Memorial has been received ?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : No such Memorial has been received.

MR. AUSTIN : I have a letter acknowledging receipt of the Memorial.

THE OFFICE OF WOODS AND FORESTS AND LAND REVENUES OF THE CROWN.

MR. SAMUELSON (Gloucester, Forest of Dean) : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury when he will introduce the Bill promised last Session by his predecessor, to carry out the recommendations of the Committee of this House which reported upon the administration of the Office of Woods and Forests and Land Revenues of the Crown ?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir JOHN GORST, Chatham) : I hope very shortly to be able to introduce the Crown Lands Bill—probably in the course of next week.

MR. SAMUELSON : Before Easter ?
SIR JOHN GORST : Oh, certainly.

THE LAGOS DISTRICT.

MR. W. F. LAWRENCE (Liverpool, Abercromby) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies a question of which I have given him private notice whether, having regard to the statement he made in reply to the hon. Baronet the Member for North-West Manchester (Sir Henry Houldsworth), it is correct, as reported, that the Jebus are still blocking trade ; and whether he will give the House any more recent information on the subject ?

SIR JOHN GORST : I am asked to reply on behalf of my right hon. Friend. In reply to the first question, I am informed that an arrangement has been made with the Jebus on the 21st of January, by which they undertook to keep the roads and river free to all persons, and to levy no tolls, in consideration of a yearly present of £500. The Secretary of State for the Colonies has now learnt by telegram that they have broken this agreement, and that an officer sent to remonstrate was not allowed to proceed to Jebu Ode, the capital of their territory. The Secretary of State has also just learnt by telegram that the letter sent to the Egba authorities has been returned unopened, and that they decline to have any communication with the Governor of Lagos. Mr. Carter, the Governor of Lagos, is up the country, but is expected back on 9th March. He has been instructed by telegraph to report at once fully upon the position, and as to the measures which he would recommend to be taken.

THE ARMY AND NAVY ESTIMATES.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury when he proposes to lay the Navy Estimates and the Army Estimates on the Table of the House; and I would ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether his attention has been called to the Rule of the House that Estimates relating to the Army and Navy must be laid on the Table within ten days after the House goes into Committee of Supply, which ten days have now expired?

LORD G. HAMILTON: I am afraid it is not always possible to adhere to that resolution. The Army Estimates, I understand, will be circulated to-morrow, and the Navy Estimates, I hope, in the early part of next week.

NOTICES OF MOTION.

MORNING Sittings.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: With relation, more or less, to the question which has been put, I wish to give notice that I will on Thursday, in view of the condition of Supply, move that, on Tuesdays and Fridays, Morning Sittings should be taken for the purpose of dealing with Supply, and for the purpose of reading Bills for the first time, but for those purposes alone.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): The first business of the House to-morrow is to promote peace and goodwill in Ireland by providing some means of restoring evicted tenants in that country. If the Sitting begins at 2 o'clock, that will not afford to hon. Members who promote the Bill any fair or adequate opportunity of having their proposals properly considered. And on the principle that the better the day the better the deed, I would suggest that the House meet at 12 o'clock, the usual hour.

MR. J. REDMOND (Waterford): For my own part, I have always in past years voted in favour of the adjournment of the House on Ash Wednesday, and I would not on this occasion interfere to express objection to that.

* Sir John Gorst

But the fortune of the ballot has cast for to-morrow a Bill that Members in every part of the House must acknowledge is one of far-reaching importance. Indeed, the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House will be the last to deny that it is an important question. There are at this moment in Ireland many hundreds of families of evicted tenants, whose position is such that so long as these tenants remain as they are, the public peace must be imperilled. The right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House himself recognised the importance of the matter, for in the Act of last year he inserted a clause for the purpose of enabling them to be restored to their holdings. That clause was limited as to time, and that time has expired, and the tenants are still out of their homes. Under these circumstances, Mr. Speaker, no one will deny, least of all the right hon. Gentleman, the importance of considering this question from the point of view of the tenants, of the landlords, and of those who are responsible for the government and tranquillity of Ireland. That is the subject to be dealt with by the Bill first in the Orders for to-morrow, and no one will deny that it cannot be adequately discussed in the three hours which will be at our disposal if the House meets at 2 o'clock. Under these circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I think we have a strong case for saying that it would be in the interests of the people of Ireland if the House were to meet at the ordinary hour to-morrow. It may be that the old custom of the Adjournment is venerable by its age; but I am bound to say that I think, in the case of the vast majority of the Members of the House, the Adjournment is very little short of an act of hypocrisy; and if an inquiry were made as to the number of Members who take advantage of the Adjournment to attend Divine Service, the result would be very extraordinary. I appeal to the House not to stand in the way of a complete discussion of this Bill. The meeting at 12 would not prevent any hon. Member from attending Divine Service and then coming to the House to express his views and record his vote, for the discussion is certain to go on all the after-soon. For these reasons I agree with the hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton) in voting against the Adjournment of the House, and I appeal to hon. Members to assist us the Representatives of Ireland, in our effort to obtain for this Bill, which affects so greatly the well-being of our people, a full discussion.

SITTINGS OF THE HOUSE.

(ASH WEDNESDAY.)

Motion made, and Question put, "That this House do meet Tomorrow, at Two of the clock."—(Mr. A. J. Balfour.)

RECREATION GROUNDS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Llewellyn, Bill to facilitate the provision of Recreation Grounds in Rural Parishes, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Llewellyn and Sir Edward Birkbeck. Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 201.]

GREENWICH HOSPITAL.

(6.45.) COLONEL HUGHES (Woolwich) : I beg, Sir, to move the Motion which is printed on the Paper in my name. I have considered this question during the Recess, in order to make myself thoroughly acquainted with the minutiae of the case, and I also wrote to the First Lord of the Admiralty and received a reply, which, while not admitting that there was any great injustice, admitted that the funds were short, and that for a considerable number of years the claims had been greater than the fund was able to satisfy. I came to the conclusion that the plea of the money not being sufficient was not an answer to the claim of the seamen, if there had been a contract or anything in the nature of an implied contract. It seemed to me the only way to dispose of the matter was to ask for a Select Committee, which would settle the question once for all, so that the agitation might cease. I am happy to inform the House that the Government have agreed with me that it would be better to deal with the subject by referring it to a Select Committee, and though I acknowledge with thankfulness the support which I know I should have received from all parts of the House if I went to a Division, I am glad to be relieved of the unpleasantness and uncertainty of such a course by the Government having acceded to my solicitation and granted the Committee. The Committee having been granted, I do not think I have a right to detain the House. Suffice it is to say that my letter to the First Lord of the Admiralty and his reply have been issued to-day, and I hope every Member of the House will take the trouble to read that correspondence, as it contains all that I could have said. I ask, therefore, to be excused from doing more than move the Motion which stands in my name, which I do with a great deal of pleasure, and the hope that at last justice will be done to seamen who have served their country well and should have a just reward.

(6.50.) MR. T. W. BOORD (Greenwich) : I am delighted to hear that the Government have granted the Committee. The main fact it will have to deal with is that there are about 2,000 men who are very dissatisfied with their position, and that itself seems to me almost sufficient justification for the action of the Government. Under the circumstances just stated, I shall not venture to take up the time of the House, but shall content myself with seconding the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the causes which have led to the limitation in the number of seamen receiving age pensions out of Greenwich Hospital Funds, and to consider whether any steps can properly be taken to make provision for a larger number of age pensioners, and to inquire into their alleged grievances :

That the Committee do consist of Nine Members :

That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records :

That Five be the quorum."—(Colonel Hughes.)

(6.52.) CAPTAIN PRICE (Devonport) : I desire, in a few words, to express my satisfaction at the course the Government have adopted. The subject is one which has been brought before the House by myself and others for a number of years, and it is a growing grievance, the men affected being something like double the number that it was when I first called attention to the matter. There are several grievances to be considered. We have to consider whether the fund has been properly dealt with, whether there has been any misappropriation or not, and how the funds may be increased. It is a general idea among the pensioners that they have not been treated fairly in this matter, and that faith has been broken with them. When after their first term of service they agreed for a second term, they did so in the belief that this Greenwich age pension was an inalienable right, and that they would get it without doubt at 55 or 60 years of age. The Admiralty have introduced rules that were not thought of at the time of the Hospital Charter, and, as a matter of fact, some of the men do not now enjoy those benefits which were then held out to them. In the old days there were only two principles to guide the granting of these pensions : one the question of age, and the other that of the roster. All that is set on one side now, and a principle of selection is adopted. That will be a point for the Committee to inquire into.

*MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (North East Kent): As representing the dockyard town of Sheerness, where many persons claiming this pension reside, I must ask permission to say a word or two in support of the Motion of my hon. and gallant Friend. There is no doubt that many of these men entered the Service in the full belief that at 55 they would, as a matter of course, become entitled to this pension, and they think themselves hardly treated that, by the retrospective operation of a rule passed after they had entered the Service, they should be deprived of their pensions. It is alleged that this fund has been diverted, and that point could be looked into by the Committee. I am very glad this justice is to be done, and in the name of my constituents I thank the Government.

MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.) : I know there are many on this side of the House who would have supported the hon. and gallant Member for Woolwich (Colonel Hughes) in his Motion had it gone to a Division. Many of us have had the case brought before us by our constituents, and we are aware that at least they think they are suffering under a great grievance. It is unnecessary to go into the case; but I am sure only justice is being done to them by appointing this Committee to into their case; and if there be no grievance, it will tend to set their minds at rest.

(6.55.) THE CIVIL LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT, Sheffield, Eccleshall): The modified form of the Motion enables the Government to assent to an inquiry into the claims of the naval pensioners. Since the Motion has been on the Paper the Government have become aware that there is a widespread feeling amongst the naval pensioners that their claims to Greenwich age pensions have not been fully satisfied, and the Government feel that there is no class of men whose interests, sentiments, and even prejudices are more deserving of generous consideration than those gallant sailors and marines who have so long served their Queen with loyalty and credit. The Government, therefore, while not receding from the view which has been expressed on this question by successive Boards of Admiralty, and both Parties, are glad to concede the inquiry. By the first of next month there will be no less than 7,500 naval pensioners in receipt of Greenwich age pensions, being an increase of 400 on last year. The Admiralty have also decided that the amount of naval pension is no longer to be taken into account in awarding Greenwich age pensions. That is a boon very much pressed by the Committee which sat last year. I may also say that at the present time, out of a total expenditure of £168,000, no less than £148,000 is directly devoted to the benefit of the sailors and marines. The Government grant this Committee with satisfaction at the request of the hon. and gallant Member who has taken such great interest in the claims of these pensioners, and are confident that the result of the investigation will be to the credit of the direction and administration of the funds of this most useful institution, Greenwich Hospital.

Motion agreed to.

SCHOOL BOARD FOR LONDON.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

(7.0.) MR. DIXON-HARTLAND (Middlesex, Uxbridge): I beg to move—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, asking Her to appoint a Royal Commission to investigate the action and the extravagance of the London School Board, and the cause of the high rates raised for its use in the Metropolis."

I wish, in the first place, to say that I do not propose to take up unnecessarily the time of the House, but the documents I have to deal with are of a character which may require some time in the treatment of them, and to justify my action in asking for a Royal Commission. In the first place, I wish to say that the Motion is not intended in any way as an attack upon education. It is, in fact, in its favour; as anything which tends to make education unpopular is injurious to education itself. Under the name of promoting education the money of the ratepayers has been shamefully squandered; the pockets of the Metropolitan ratepayers have been scandalously picked; and this has been fully recognised by Mr. Diggle, Mr. Helby, Mr. Lobb, and many other members of the Board. They have shown that they considered that this is a case which should be thoroughly investigated. In July, 1888, the following resolution was placed upon the agenda paper of the Board:—

"That Sir Richard Temple and Colonel Hughes be requested to take the necessary steps in the House of Commons to obtain a Royal Commission, with powers to call for necessary papers and persons, to investigate upon oath the whole mode by which sites have been acquired and school buildings erected thereon by the School Board for London," which, of course, was not carried, and in July, 1890, a similar motion was also defeated. Now, first, with regard to the cost of the School Board, I find that up to the 23rd March, 1891, it has been no less than £26,899,066, less about £1,000,000 for the payment of loans. The debt was £7,309,000, and the interest and repayment on that amount was about £400,000, or about 3d. in the £1, the amount which we were told in 1870 would never be exceeded, and yet that is now necessary for the loan only. As late as the year 1875 the rate was only 3d. in the £1, and now it is 1s., with every probability of its being increased 1d. per year for some years to come. I ask you, what would be said to the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he proposed to add a penny a year to the Income Tax? If the rateable value of the Metropolis had continued as it was in 1871, the rate would have been 1s. 6d. in the £1; but the increase in the value from £19,970,000 to £33,000,000, or an increase of 65 per cent., has alone kept the rate to 1s. This is more strongly shown by the rate in 1871, which produced £83,200, whilst in 1891 it produced £137,800. During the last three years the rate has been increasing by leaps and bounds, till in 1891 it has reached £1,483,174, or £454,291 increase. It may be said that this is due to the increase of scholars. But what are the facts? I find that in the year 1891 the average attendance was only 14,130 more than in 1889; while the increase of rates has been 44·15 per cent., the increase of attendance has been only 4·12 per cent. In the year 1875 the precept of the Board was for £551,247, while in 1890 it amounted to nearly £1,500,000, or what is practically about treble the amount. In order to show, further, that the vast increase of expenditure has not been accounted for by the additional numbers educated, I may say that while in 1883 240,000 were educated for £679,595, in 1891 it cost £1,403,280 to educate 349,291 children, or, in fact, more than double the amount to educate only 100,000 more. Now, having given these facts, I wish to refer to the reasons which I believe have led to this extraordinary increase of expenditure. It is equally intelligible how the extravagance arises. Given a body of men, many of whom have no practical acquaintance with business, and some of whom are possessed by impracticable notions, and given still further that they are not bound by the limitations which affect a man who is carrying on business on his own account, but has a practically unlimited fund upon which to draw, and it stands to reason that an extravagant expenditure will follow, almost as a matter of course. But when, in addition to facts, you have to consider the dishonesty of contractors and the carelessness of Boards, and the gross negligence, if not worse, of architects and clerks of works, and fraud in the purchase of sites, to which must be added the exorbitant salaries of the staff and teachers, it is not difficult to see how the expenditure of the School Board has so enormously increased, all which subjects can only be thoroughly brought to light by a Royal Commission. The School Management Committee is one of the great spending departments of the Board. It at present pays to teachers £910,790 a year, the salaries rising automatically. The teachers now receive 52s. 4d. per child, or 1s. 10d. more than in 1890, and I find that a large number of them are husbands and wives. Seven of those couples receive over £600 a year, 28 over £500, 27 over £400, 40 over £300, 108 over £200, whilst there are only 21 receiving under £200 a year. The highest single salary paid to a teacher is £460. I can only say that if the teachers are worth all this money, they are too good, as they certainly are too expensive, for Board schools, and their salaries are such as would be welcomed by clergymen and ministers. The present salaries of men teachers is £326 1s. 0d. to £136 10s. 2d., and women teachers, £234 6s. 10d. to £111 5s. 1d. The salaries of the teachers have increased during the past ten years 107 per cent., to nearly £1,000,000, or 7d. in the £1 on the rates, with no increase of educational progress or practical training; and whilst the average from 1886 to 1888 was £1 17s. 2d. per child per annum only for school management, it is now no less than £2 9s. 1d. I think that the following, taken from the Report of the Committee of Council on Education for 1890-91, page 26, will show how much higher this cost is than that of the voluntary schools—

"We may mention, with regard to the principal teachers in the Metropolitan district, that in the past year the average salary of 368 masters in voluntary schools was £152 17s. 2d., and that of 379 masters in Board schools £283 10s. 10d., while 762 schoolmistresses in Board schools enjoyed an average income of £189 11s. 5d., as compared with £90 18s. 6d.—that of 797 teachers in voluntary schools. The salaries of 11 masters in voluntary schools and 167 in Board schools amounted to £300 a year and upwards, whilst three mistresses in voluntary and 366 in Board schools had salaries of £200 and upwards."

And to show that the cost is beyond that of other districts, it will be found that teachers of equal capacity outside the London School Board receive salaries from 25 to 33 per cent. less, and at the same time do their duty with equal satisfaction to the Government Inspectors. Those are matters into which I think the strictest investigation is required, and matters into which only a Royal Commission can adequately inquire into; because it is known that teachers have actively canvassed for members of committees, many of whom owe their election to them, and that some of these members have had the whole of their election expenses paid by the teachers, the result being that paid officers of the Board combine to elect the members whose duty it is to decide how much these officers shall be paid. This surely is a scandal, and one which should be investigated. While dealing with this part of the question, it may not be amiss to state that the cost of each scholar in the London Board schools is £3 2s. 7½d. while in voluntary schools it is £2 4s. 1d. The cost borne by the ratepayers of London, £1 15s. 8½d.; Birmingham, 18s. 8½d.; Bradford, 8s. 9d.; Bristol, £1 3s. 10½d.; Leeds, 14s. 2½d.; Liverpool, 13s. 7½d.; Manchester, 7s. 11½d.; Sheffield, 8s. 10d.; to which 10s. for new Education Act must now be added. I should like to refer to the stores department. No proper records are kept, and teachers have only to ask and to have. The stores superintendents are allowed to order what they please, and from what firms they please. In answer to a return to teachers, it has been shown that 329,129 books, or 50 tons, were returned as unnecessary. The cost of books had risen from £31,619 to £52,800 per annum, or from 1s. 10d. to 3s. per child. Amongst the requisitions that were made the other day there was one for skeletons to cost £82 10s., and that was for a single school, which asked for the skeletons of twelve codfish, amounting to £3 each, and, would it be believed, the University of Cambridge has only one of these skeletons for all its pupils. Such Votes as these are really so much money extorted from the ratepayers and thrown away. And only two days ago the mistress of the Belleville Road school prayed to have a full sized human skeleton taken away, as it frightened the children. In regard to the question of sites, I have to say that up to September, 1891, the cost was £3,044,682, including legal charges and surveyors' expenses. The sites previous to 1885 were selected (many during the recess) by the Board's surveyor, Mr. Andrew Young, a man who has had no practical knowledge, having simply been a clerk in the finance department. These sites were in many cases costly and unsuitable, and the surveyor had his own brother, Mr. Douglas Young, as auctioneer to sell the materials on such sites. Naturally he did not select sites where materials had not to be sold. The architect's brother-in-law, Mr. Longden, supplied all the iron for twelve years, and although iron went down between 60 and 70 per cent., the schedule price was never revised, and the clause in the contract was that the iron was to be supplied by the Board who did it through this official. An official of the Board—the architect's clerk, Mr. McFarlane—(who is still in their employment), when a stir was made about the matter, on a bank-holiday devoted his time, unknown to the Board, in examining and destroying documents; and yet, though the Chairman, both in committee and at the Board, moved for his dismissal he is still kept on. The sites are not only the most extravagant that can be found, but it will be found, on looking at the deeds, that directly it is mooted that a site is likely to be wanted it changes hands a number of times, and reaches the Board at a great increase in price. Take, for instance, the Raywood Street site, opposite the Dog's Home at Battersea. It eventually was purchased for £7,000, when it could first have been purchased for £2,000. Take the Ponton Street site, at Nine Elms, for which £14,000 was given, and a school erected where it was not wanted, and is never half filled. These are striking instances, but sites were also purchased where all the gravel had been dug out, and they were simply dust heaps. What is worse still, there are sites which, having been bought at ridiculous prices, have been proved to be not fit for use, and had to be sold again, or attempts made to sell them. For instance, the St. George's Road, Pimlico, site, which cost £11,000; the best offer that could be obtained for it was £5,000, a price which could not now be obtained. This inquiry is, I say, wanted in order to find out who had the money, in numberless cases, and the information can only be obtained by means of such an inquiry as I ask for, and which, I believe, the public demand. In regard to the question of buildings, up to March, 1891, the amount spent was £4,778,746, exclusive of land and fittings. Thirteen builders received contracts for £2,153,345 6s. 6d. The Board has 410 schools, of which 356 were erected by the Board, and 163 have been found faulty or insanitary, and not single school was in accordance with the specification. In a Report dealing with the question as to how the schools have been built, it is stated:—

"With some exceptions they have been badly planned and badly built; many of them are only huge barns, with an ornamental exterior, defectively ventilated and defectively lighted. The materials used in the schools complained of are the veriest rubbish, whilst the best have been specified in the contracts and paid for; the work scamped and executed in a disgraceful manner. Instead of the schools resting upon solid foundations, investigations have shown that they rest upon loose and soapy foundations, foundry-sashes foundations, mud foundations, and in some cases no foundations at all. The brickwork, both inside and outside, has been altogether inferior to that specified and paid for. . . . The mortar used was absolutely rotten—containing no binding or adhesive properties and no grit, and on being touched crushes to powder; also an entire absence of hair in the mortar, although it was specified in the contract and has been paid for. Half-burnt clay has been used in the place of sand; instead of the best quality of Portland stone, free from all defects, the commonest has been used, full of sand-hole fractures and the edges broken; evidently taken from the outside beds of the quarry instead of from the inside. In the matter of the lath and plastering, single laths instead of a lath and a-half have been used. The plastering being rotten, the result is that large patches are constantly falling. The painters' work has been scamped shamefully; the doors and framings improperly fixed; the glass 21 oz. only, instead of 26 oz., as specified and paid for; lead of one weight was paid for, whilst that used was 1 or 2 lbs. per square foot less weight; the woodwork and the floors executed in a most dishonest manner, laid with absolutely no concrete on them, covered only with wet clay and muck, with the result that dry rot has set in."

Take, out of many examples, the case of the Goodrich Road schools, opened in 1886 by Mr. G. C. Whitely, and who then described it as a model school. On 2nd June, 1890, the assistant architect for repairs drew attention to the repairs that would be necessary in consequence of the defective manner in which the school had been built. Exclusive of the work to drains, the cost of undermining, repairs, &c., to the school has been £2,700. From this school five cartloads of sewerage were removed from under the floor, and the architect, Mr. Bailey, wrote to the contractors to say he must call the Board's attention to its state, but never did, because he had actually given a final certificate five weeks before, without even inspecting the work. In regard to the Latimer Road school, it has been shown that on 1st December, 1890, a portion of the ceiling in one of the class rooms came down with a great crash on the children's heads, and as this was the fourth time that such a thing had taken place, the assistant architect was called upon to examine and report, and in his Report stated that—

"The ceilings in the girls' and infants' departments are in a more or less unsafe condition, and liable to fall at any time."

This school was opened in 1880, at a cost of £20,767 17s. 10d. In the case of the Princess Road School, opened February, 1885, in November, 1889, the assistant architect found the walls, chimney-stacks, and piers carrying the superstructure of the school very defective : subsequently he reported settlements, which, upon being watched, were found to increase and became dangerous, the whole superstructure being liable to collapse. This had to be repaired at a cost of over £2,000. In the case of Salters Hill School, 8th November, 1889, the Clerk of the Works in charge of the school building reported serious cracks and settlements in the lofty gable walls. The architect and assistant architect for repairs made an examination, and found a 6-in. drain-pipe running along the wall under the concrete foundation, the concrete having been placed upon it ; the drain-pipe consequently broke and became choked, the drainage going into the foundation. Immediate steps were taken to shore up the school to prevent its falling. The walls subsequently were underpinned with cement concrete down to a good foundation. It has been repaired at a cost of £800. I do not think it is necessary to go through the whole list, but I could show that every one of the 163 schools has been repaired at the cost of the ratepayers. But what is far worse is the insanitary condition of the buildings, scattering illness and death amongst the teachers and children of the poor. In some cases the flooring covered leaky drains and soil-pipes. In others the pipes were not even jointed; in others the pipes were laid the wrong way, or with no fall, and not even connected with the main drains. In fact, the children were living in a vast sewer, and no wonder the bereaved parents complained whose children died from diphtheria, scarlet, or typhoid fever. Take, as examples, the Hanmond Square Schoolhouse, Hoxton. After the caretaker's five children had been removed by death, the parish Sanitary Inspector found that the contractors had erected the building over a series of running cesspools, which were immediately under the floors of his rooms. The doctors' and funeral bills amounted to over £100, and that poor caretaker had never had a penny compensation. This was brought before the Board of Hoxton, and here is an extract from the medical officer's Report for the parish of St. Leonard's, Shoreditch, for 1886, p. 81 :—

"The Board School in Hamond Square it was necessary for the medical officer to bring more especially under the notice of your Sanitary Committee to receive instructions thereon. It might have been inferred that, at the time of the construction, ordinary precautionary measures would have been adopted to keep the premises of the school from proximate contact with noxious decaying accumulations ; but, instead of that, accumulations of sewage matter had been allowed to remain buried within the walls of the house, and, as the Inspector says, when the ground under one room was opened to the depth of about three or four feet, it was seen to be made up of old bricks and other rubbish, and under that was an old brick drain. Further examination showed that the wall of the house had been built over this drain, the wall being carried on a 'relieving stone template' to avoid disturbing or removing the old drain. In the removal of the made-up ground from within the walls of the house, by orders of your Sanitary Committee, a large cesspool was found, and five loads of sewage accumulation had to be removed. These conditions had made the walls of the house foully damp."

With respect to the Globe Terrace School, Bethnal Green, in consequence of 70 children being absent on account of illness, and the repeated complaints of teachers, an investigation was made, with the result that from under the floor of the infants' room two cart-loads of decomposed vegetable and other refuse matter were removed, and nine inches of concrete have since been laid there. In the case of Stockwell Road School divisional offices, built in 1882, complaints were made of repeated illness amongst the staff, and that bad smells were prevalent. It was found that the drains and the sewer were being freely ventilated into the space under the boarded floor, and through the joints of the boards into the apartment. The earth below the floor was saturated with the discharge from a defective pipe, and was very offensive. The iron soil-pipe had open joints, which admitted sewer gas into the staircase and passages. This school was built on a dust heap. With reference to Curtain Road School, Hoxton (in the parish of Shoreditch), here is an extract from the Report of the Medical Officer of Health, Mr. Alexander, for the year ending 1889 :—

" Immediately under a window in the girls' department were the closets of the infants' department, fitted with an ordinary iron trough, the emanations from which passed into the girls' class-rooms."

With respect to Plassy Road School, complaints of bad smells and sickness of children led to examination of drains, with the result that the whole drainage and sanitary arrangements had to be remodelled at a cost of £600, meanwhile blood-poisoning had been going on at a wholesale rate. At Everington Street School there were reported bad smells in the offices, and that upwards of 300 children were absent through illness. An examination showed that the troughs or latrines were not trapped, but that drain air had free access into the closets, and was inhaled by the children. I think that is sufficient to trouble the House with on that point. It is an appalling fact that every school discloses a shocking insanitary condition, and it seems incredible that the Board have disregarded the numerous complaints of teachers and local managers, and have not taken action until they have been compelled by the parish sanitary officer, whose numerous legal documents under the Nuisances Removal Acts may be seen at the offices of the Board. No less than ten such official documents or threats of legal process were received by the Board with regard to the dilapidated and unsanitary condition of Gainsborough Road School, Hackney Wick. For 15 months the caretaker of Catherine Street School, Hoxton, implored the Board to remove a nuisance by which two of his children had been twice stricken down with gastric fever, and it was only when the parish sanitary officer gave the usual legal threat that action was taken. The same with Tottenham Road School, Kingland; after there had been five deaths from diphtheria in the infants' department the parish sanitary officers threatened the Board. Mr. Diggle, Chairman of the Board, made a Report from the Board on the re-establishment of the Board on 1st October, 1891, and summing up he says—

" So far as I have been able to ascertain the facts, not a single school which has been thoroughly examined has been found to be in the state in which it ought to have been; and the cost of remedying these defects and deficiencies not only swells our expenditure now, but must be a considerable burden upon the finances of the Board for many years to come."

It will, doubtless, be thought that all this carelessness was caused by the Board School officers not being properly paid, but I find in the Report of the hon. Member for Evesham (Sir Richard Temple), Chairman of the Finance Committee, that not less than £117,855 12s. 5d. was paid to these gentlemen for ten years during which these scandalous buildings were being erected. The various members of the Board did everything they could to prevent the responsibility being brought home to offenders, and, as I before stated, positively refused to move till ten official documents were before them. In April, 1891, a motion was made that the Works Committee recommend the Board to take action against Mr. Robson, the architect, for neglect of duty. It is hardly necessary to say that was not carried. Mr. Robson was the architect for nearly all the defective schools yet examined, and yet he has been rewarded for the work which he utterly neglected by being made Consulting Architect of the Department of Education for Schools all over the country at a salary of £750 a year and fees; and I am told these fees are considerable. He also kept receiving £500 a year for two years from the London School Board, to see that the buildings which he had planned

were completed, and which he never attended to. Then with respect to the contractors, many of these escaped because of the four years' limit in the contract, and many others escaped because they got the architects' certificates before even the work was finished. Such enquiry as the School Board has, however, been able to make, has obtained back about £10,000; that is a very small proportion of about a quarter of a million which has been lost by the defects that have taken place. In one case their own architect actually gave evidence against them as to the character of the work. When Mr. Euan Christian, their quantity surveyor, stated at the trial that the work was such as ought not to have been passed, he actually came forward and stated that it was all right. And the Board not only lost the case, but actually had to pay the costs; although before the trial the builders had offered to give up a certain sum, admitting they were wrong. In another case the Board obtained a verdict for £2,141 in the case of the Kilburn Lane Schools, out of a sum of £325,995 9s. 10d. paid the firm on various contracts. But before the money was recovered the firm (Wall Brothers) went into bankruptcy; and when they were examined in reference to this large sum they stated that they never kept any books, and they could not give the Court a single item as to how the money had gone. I think there must have been gross peculation there. A large sum of money must have been given away; and I think this one of the most scandalous cases that ever was brought under my notice. In that case Mr. Justice Day said—

"It is really scarcely conceivable that a public body should have conducted its business in the exceedingly lax manner in which their business seems to have been conducted by the School Board in 1884. You had an architect who actually told you that from the time when he prepared these plans he never went to the school; and he does not limit it to that date at all, but he told you that he never went to this school at all until it was all completed—never went near the place."

Then the jury also, in giving their verdict, added the following rider—

"The jury desire, without absolving the defendants in this case, to express their strong condemnation of the state of things in the Architects Department, as disclosed by this inquiry."

I think that shows that the officers of the Board have not done their duty. The Chairman of the Finance Committee, the hon. Member for Evesham, in his last Report, put it down that it will cost £40,000 a year for some years on extraordinary expenditure on these schools, in addition to £60,000 required for ordinary repairs. I do not know what steps the hon. Gentleman is going to take, but all I can say is to refer to his own election address, which he published the other day, when he applied for re-election, in which he says—

"Much has undoubtedly been done by the present Board in these directions, but much remains to be done. When the evidence taken by the Special Committee appointed by the present Board proves that past Boards have paid for a depth of foundations for schools which do not exist to the stated depth; that they have been charged and have paid for material under the tar pavement in school playgrounds which does not exist at all; that in the matter of the bricks, the mortar, the woodwork, the lead, and other materials used in the construction of schools the requirements of the building specifications have not been observed; and that the manner in which accounts for buildings have been presented and passed by the Works Committee has been of the flimsiest and most perfunctory character, and has resulted in the existence of irregularities of the gravest kind, without the knowledge of that Committee or of the Board, it is evident that reforms were and still are imperatively required."

Now, there is one point which I think worthy of the attention of this Committee, and that is the rate, which began at 3d. in the £ and is now 1s. I think that some limit ought to be fixed which School Boards could not exceed. When Viscount Cranbrook brought in the Free Education Bill the other day, in moving the Second Reading he said—

"The time has come when it will be necessary to put some stop on the amount which School Boards are to expend. This is absolutely necessary, or there will be a serious reaction, and education must suffer."

Now, I think that that is one of the points which this Committee could properly inquire into, because there is no doubt that if schools were properly conducted our rates would not be so high. This is not a matter which concerns the rich people so much as the poor. It does not matter much to the rich man whether he pays a rate of 6d. or 1s.; but when we come to think of the poor shopkeepers who are only just able to make a living it is a very different thing, and I am quite sure that all over the Metropolis they must feel, when this robbery is going on, that it is very hard lines that they should be taxed to pay not only for education, but for waste and wrong. I am told that the present School Board are in favour of this inquiry, and that they hope by exposing the past to protect the future. I am told that they would like to have an inquiry into these matters themselves, but they are unable to do so because they have no power to get at information by calling witnesses or for documents from hostile persons, who naturally have all to conceal, and also have no power to take evidence on oath, and in addition to this they have the fear of libel actions before their eyes, which, even when successfully defended, are attended with great loss of time and money. This inquiry will bring out all the facts, and it is absolutely necessary to restore public confidence. I hope I have made out my case. I have tried to bring forward every fact fairly. I have documents here to prove everything I have mentioned, and, so far as I know, I have not exaggerated a single fact. I believe if this inquiry is held that it will bring out a mass of corruption that will astonish the people of London; and I think that if the effect of this is to bring down the rates the Government will have earned the gratitude of the people of London for having exposed what has been such a crying scandal, and having reduced the rates for them in the future. The reason for rooting up the past is that when a gross scandal like this has been exposed it prevents men in the future from doing such things. I do not want to ask for anything that the Government would not be justified in giving; but I think they will feel that the responsibility rests upon them of granting an inquiry of some sort or kind which the public expect and feel ought to be granted; and I think it ought to strengthen their hands to have a request on the part of the School Board themselves that such inquiry should be held. I beg to thank the House for the very kind way in which it has listened to me. I have tried to take up as little time as possible. I have brought this matter forward as a simple public duty, and I hope the effect of what I have done will be for the good of this Metropolis. I beg to move the Resolution which stands in my name.

(7.48.) MR. W. F. LAWRENCE (Abercromby, Liverpool): I have much pleasure indeed in seconding the Motion. I did not come here to make a speech, but to listen to the speech of my hon. Friend which has been a most extraordinary exposé of bribery and corruption. I rose to-day, not as a London ratepayer, but, as the hon. Member has said, in the interest of the public. It is most desirable that it should be known over the length and breadth of the land that when public men, occupying public posts, undertake duties and do not discharge them honestly and fairly, sooner or later they will have to give an account before their constituencies. I think the Government ought to give this matter, now that it has been fairly brought before the House, most careful consideration; for it is quite certain that they will be liable to very adverse criticism if, having these facts fairly brought before them, they do nothing to make adequate inquiry. What I would strongly advise is that there should be an independent authority to make inquiry as to the past transactions and these matters referred to to-day, so that the country may have some guarantee that the matters have been fairly and judiciously considered. I am not by any means one of those that desire to economise money, and so stint education. Far from it, but as a ratepayer in favour of the best education for the people of England, I am anxious to see that when we do spend money, our money should be judiciously spent, and not improperly squandered. As I have said, I did not come here to make a speech and, therefore, I shall content myself with merely seconding this Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty to appoint a Royal Commission to investigate the action and extravagance of the London School Board and the cause of the high rates raised for its use in the Metropolis."—(Mr. Dixon-Hartland.)

(7.50.) MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Poplar, Tower Hamlets): I trust the hon. Member will permit me to say that everyone will admit that the hon. Member, has brought forward his case with great moderation and great lucidity. I am not here to defend the School Board. It is some years ago since I had the honour of being a member of the Board, but I should like to make a few remarks on this subject. It would seem from the look of the Resolution that the hon. Member was going to speak, not so much about the malversation of the School Board as in reference to what is called the extravagance of the School Board. But he really said little in reference to that, and to a certain extent it is a subsidiary point, and a fact more for the ratepayers than for this House, and I will not allude further to this portion of the subject. But when he referred to the very high salaries of the teachers I think he forgot one or two points—namely, that in one respect, at all events, the London School Board compares favourably with other School Boards, that they are very much larger, that they have a poorer class of children in them, and that living in London is very much higher than anywhere else, and that the salaries are absolutely inclusive salaries, whereas in many other cases, in the provincial towns, the rent, and house, and light, are provided in addition to the salary. The hon. Member has made a very much more serious charge against the London School Board than extravagance. I think myself that in the case of the expenses incurred in respect of sites for buildings, &c., the School Board have a very good reply. But he has made other charges: that there has been great maladministration and considerable corruption with respect to the work of the Board. I, for one, should be very glad if there has been corruption of the description he speaks of, that it should be made public, and not in any way hid by the School Board or any other Body. If corruption has taken place, let it be exposed to the light of day. But, in listening to the observations of the hon. Member, if he will allow me to say so, I think he has somewhat exaggerated the case he has made out. It seems to me, in reference to certain schools, he did not take the whole work of the Board, as he ought to have taken it, in bulk. He forgets that this representative Board, representative of the ratepayers, has its work extended over 20 years; that it has had about 400 schools, nearly, under its care, and about 500,000 children under its charge. I do not think that any past member of the Board would say that everything that the Board has done has been entirely free from mistake in every respect. I do not suppose any member would say that that or any other Board was infallible. The hon. Member referred to certain cases of certain buildings and certain sites. With regard to the question of buildings, there is this, I think, to be said, that when the Board was first brought into existence some 20 years ago, it was a question for them, should they hurry and struggle as quickly as possible, in order to supply the admitted deficiency in school accommodation with as little delay as possible. I think that in some cases they made rather too much speed in respect of the schools, and that in a very large number of cases the buildings were erected too quickly, and were not, therefore, as permanent or as efficient as they ought to have been. To the system of accepting the lowest tender for the erection of buildings much of the faulty construction must be ascribed. I have always felt in reference to the question of Government contracts and others, that the system of accepting the lowest tender quite irrespective of what was contained in that tender—quite irrespective of the firm itself—is not a system on which any Public Body ought to act. I think we ought to remember that there has been a considerable amount of litigation in regard to these particular schools, and I believe that in no single case has the Board been able to justify its allegation that there had been fraud and corruption on the part of the builders. And further, I believe that in one or two cases, actions for libel have been brought by builders against members of the Board for making assertions the hon. Member has made this afternoon.

MR. DIXON HARTLAND: There have been actions for libel brought with respect to certain charges; but with respect to the charges which I have brought forward this afternoon, so far as I know, no actions for libel have been brought.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: Well, I do not know, but with regard to some assertions, I believe that is correct. Not that I say that there has been no fraud on the part of the builders. I am sorry to say in my opinion there has been considerable fraud on the part of some of the builders. But I think that these loose assertions made in this House and in the School Board by certain Members are not altogether warranted by the facts of the case. I believe myself that while there is a considerable amount of truth in them, there is a considerable amount of exaggeration in them. I think the House should remember this, when they see the great cost the School Board has been put to in purchasing these sites that these sites have been bought by this Public Body after arbitration; and every one knows the tendency of juries to give as high a price as possible to the seller if a Public Body is one of the parties to the case. The result was that a very great number of most expensive sites had to be purchased. I think it ought not to go to the discredit of the School Board, because they were obliged to go where the children were, quite irrespective of the price. I think it should also be remembered, as the hon. Member's own speech shows, that no matter what may have been the case in the past, at all events the present School Board is perfectly alive to its responsibilities. It is perfectly clear that the existing School Board ought to get at the bottom of all these frauds and this corruption if they existed. I think the mere fact that they have made an inquiry themselves show that they are in earnest in the matter. The hon. Member said just now that the present Board are in favour of a public inquiry. I may at once say that if the School Board by a considerable majority desire to have a public inquiry I should support that public inquiry. I cannot help feeling that nothing would be more fatal to the administration of our Public Bodies than inquiry by a Select Committee or a Royal Commission. It necessarily weakens their responsibility if they know that when they go wrong there will be such an inquiry. The hon. Gentleman said that millions had been spent on fraud and corruption. Does the hon. Member think that if he got this Commission those millions would reappear? The only thing this inquiry could do would be to give a warning to the School Board, which, it seems to me, the School Board does not require. The publicity given to this matter—and we are under an obligation to the hon. Gentleman for bringing his Motion forward—will be adequate for the purpose he has in view. I am with the hon. Member in saying that if there has been fraud and corruption it should be brought to light; but the School Board are making what I believe will be an effective inquiry, and I think we had better leave it there.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members not being present,

House adjourned at ten minutes after Eight o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, 2nd March, 1892.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

EVICTED TENANTS (IRELAND) BILL.

(No. 32.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(2.10.) MR. O'KELLY (Roscommon, N.): This is a measure brought in in the interest of the restoration of social peace in Ireland: distinctly, it is a measure of peace. It deals with the case of a number of men who may be regarded as victims in the social struggle which has been going on in Ireland since 1879, and so long as these people are excluded from the benefit of the legislation which was induced in large measure by their sufferings, there can be no hope that perfect peace will be permanently restored in Ireland. The justice of the claim made originally by these men has been amply proved by the course of legislation which has been forced upon the House, by the numerous Acts which have been passed to deal with the inequalities, the injustices, of the law as it existed in 1879. Therefore we appeal with confidence to the justice of this House, and ask that these men shall not be exposed to the loss of their means of living—that they shall not be punished for having been the advance-guard of reforms, the justice of which has been acknowledged as necessary by the worse Parliament has taken. This is a very modest Bill. It involves no new principle; but it extends the principle of Clause 13 of the Act of last year in a way that has been advocated in this House before, though it has not yet been adopted. The main object of the Bill is to give the tenants who are still out of their holdings the benefit of Clause 13, which was destined for them when the clause was proposed. The time for the application of that clause has expired, and we propose to extend it to the beginning of 1893. In addition to this prolongation of the period of application, we propose that the principle of compulsion shall be applied, in a limited number of cases; and that there is necessity for this compulsion in the interest of the general peace of the country I think we shall be able to establish. We have no official data by which we can measure the benefit derived from Clause 13, but I have seen it stated with some authority that of the Ponsonby tenants, out of 214 evicted, 111 have settled under the clause. I do not know what reasons may have prevented agreements in the other cases, but these instances show that voluntary settlements were possible under the Act. Yet I hold in my hand a letter referring to another case, where it is shown that while the tenants are willing to come to a settlement the landlord—or in this the landlady—absolutely refuses to come to terms. The letter is from one of the tenantry on the celebrated Maroney estate in County Clare. In this letter the writer says—

"I conveyed to Mrs. Maroney the purport of your conversation with me on the 10th (this was in reference to the re-instatement of the tenant), but she declined absolutely to entertain the question of purchase or re-instatement."

Now this landlady, Mrs. Maroney, has been under police protection some ten or more years, and she has been the cause of enormous trouble and has involved the county in enormous expense in order to support her in her frightfully unjust action towards her tenants, proved to be unjust, because when this lady has been brought before the Land Court the claims of the tenants have been justified by the decisions of the Court. It is in such cases as these that we want the law to step in and compel reasonable action. For reasonable landlords such an enactment is not required. The Bill further deals with cases where landlords have failed to effect voluntary sales by the end of 1893; then it gives power to the Land Commission to compel them to sell at a fixed price. In dealing with cases such as I have referred to, the Insurance Fund is done away with in order to somewhat lessen the cost of purchase. Another important part of the Bill is the clause directing the Land Commission to issue an order for the immediate entry of the evicted tenant to his holding. That deals with a thorny subject, and it is just as well that we should face it at once. There are a number of people who have entered into the homes of these men, and they will have to give up their farms, for I hold that they have no right to take possession of that which properly belongs to other men ; anyhow, it belongs to them in equity and justice, though by the letter of the law they may be excluded. Without question, the intruders by some means or other must be made to give up the farms to the men to whom they belong. The House must face this question ; it is a very important one, and until it is settled there can be no hope for any permanent peace in Ireland.

(2.20.) MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.): In seconding the Motion of my hon. Friend for the Second Reading of the Bill, I shall endeavour to imitate his example, and be as brief as possible. I shall also endeavour to avoid as much as possible repeating what he has ably stated. My hon. Friend has stated in broad outline the main provisions of this Bill ; but perhaps it may be well if, in somewhat greater detail, I touch on its provisions. The 1st clause in the Bill deals with the 13th section of the Act of last year, which enables voluntary sales and purchases to be effected between landlords and their evicted tenants. That section, we must all admit, has not led to any great results ; but, at the same time, it has not wholly failed. The time for making arrangements under it has, as my hon. Friend has stated, now expired ; it expired on the 6th of last month. We propose to continue it until the beginning of next year, and we propose to extend to the Land Judge the powers given by it to ordinary landlords, inasmuch as there are a few estates in the Land Judges' Court to which the clause may be applicable, and it has been held that the Land Judge does not possess the power which is given to the ordinary landlord under the 13th clause of the Bill of last year. We hope it may be more effectual if re-enacted than it has been up to the present, for

I confess that for myself I would prefer voluntary arrangements if they could possibly be effected, because I believe that in the long run they would be better for both parties. But there is no use in concealing from ourselves the fact that there are some landlords in Ireland who must be forced, in one way or other, to come to terms with their evicted tenants—Lord Clanricarde, for instance, will not yield except under direct compulsion, and we have heard from my hon. Friend that he has had a letter from Miltown Malbay showing that there is a female Clanricarde taking the same line. Other landlords, through a false pride, as I think, and under the influence of a class feeling, have declined to take a course which they consider as “knocking under to the Plan ;” but I suspect these gentlemen would very gladly avail themselves of the opportunity offered them by legal compulsion to make peace. We propose now to apply to these two classes of landlords the same sort of compulsion as the Government itself last year applied to the landlords of the long leaseholders. We have direct precedent for the measure which we submit to the House to-day in the “Redemption of Rent Act” passed last year. Under that Act a tenant who has a lease in perpetuity, or even who holds on a fee-farm grant, is placed in this position : that he may propose to buy his holding under the Land Purchase Act ; and if the landlord refuses to sell, or even if the landlord offers unreasonable delay to selling, then the contract is, ipso facto, broken, and the tenant is regarded as a present tenant, with the right to have his rent fixed in the usual way like any other tenant. Under the 3rd clause of this Bill an evicted tenant will be in precisely the same position as the long leaseholder under the Act of last year. These tenants may propose to buy their holdings under the Purchase Act at a price to be fixed, in the last resort, by the Land Commission ; and then if the landlords refuse to sell to them, or if they offer unreasonable delay to selling, then, like the long leaseholders, they may go into Court and get fair rents fixed. That is the sum and substance of the 3rd clause, which I think is the most important in the Bill. Now,

Mr. O'Kelly

If this clause was equitable in the case of the long leaseholders, I cannot see how it can be unjust in the case of the evicted tenants. I do not know who can object to it in this House. The Government cannot object to it, for they have passed a Bill themselves based on the same principle. The hon. Member for South Tyrone has given notice to move the rejection of this Bill to-day, but I think he will be very inconsistent if he moves that Motion, because two or three years ago he himself proposed on behalf of the Clanricarde tenants a far more drastic measure—compulsory expropriation. I do not see how landlords can object. They cannot say that the Bill will do any injustice, or deprive them of anything whatever, except that which they ought not to possess, the power of disturbing peace and order in Ireland, or of preventing their re-establishment. We provide even that the landlords shall get their arrears of rent, or so much as the Land Commission—a tribunal packed with landlords—such arrears as that tribunal declares to be justly due to them; and the only deduction that will be made from the amount payable in the shape of arrears will be a sum representing the value of the buildings which, I am sorry to say, in a great many cases, landlords have razed to the ground, or otherwise destroyed, and which any Court of Equity, under ordinary circumstances, would compel them to pay for or to restore. Well, I do not see how they can object to the Bill on these grounds, and I pass on to the 4th clause. As my hon. Friend has frankly stated, it refers to a certain class of people who have grabbed some of these evicted farms. In the great majority of cases this clause will be useless, because the evicted lands are mostly vacant. But there are a few estates, I think not more than three or four altogether, on which there are bogus tenants, or people who are known as "planters"—persons who are not so much tenants paying rent, as caretakers, paid to take care of the places; paid, I fancy, not altogether out of the funds of the landlords themselves, but to some extent, and perhaps to a large extent, out of the abounding wealth of English gentlemen, like the

hon. Member for the Skipton Division (Mr. Walter Morrison), to act the part of scare-crows to the surrounding tenants, and an illustration of the danger that may be involved in invoking the wrath of an Anglo-Irish landlord combination. As regards these persons, I believe they, as well as the landlords, must be pretty sick of their respective positions; and I believe that if this clause becomes law the "planters" will immediately disappear, and will be very thankful to get off with any compensation that perhaps the hon. Member for the Skipton Division and others may be willing to give them. We propose that these "planters" shall be dispossessed at once by a vesting order made at the same time the rent is fixed, and the advantage of this arrangement is that it will save the long ejection proceedings necessary if no such vesting order is made. The remaining provisions are intended to help the tenant when restored to his holding to pay his instalments of the purchase money in an easy fashion. These provisions are—we reduce the percentage to £3 15s., we also abolish, what we think ought to be abolished in the case of every purchase, the Insurance Fund payment, which would prevent him from getting for five years the full benefit of the Act. If there is a slight financial derangement in consequence, we balance that by the abolition of the county percentage, and we think the counties would be pleased to pay such a price for peace within their borders, and in my opinion it would be a good bargain for them to make. In brief, these are the provisions of the Bill. I do not think I have concealed a single provision of the Bill, and I believe the provisions are conceived in a spirit of equity, and certainly they are intended to bring to an end a state of things which neither the Government nor this House, nor the general community in Ireland, nor even the landlords, can possibly desire to see further prolonged. They may require amendment; possibly they do: we have not had the advantage of a Government draftsman; but if they are amended, and not emasculated, in Committee they will be effective for their purpose. For these reasons, and for those stated by my hon. Friend, and feeling like him that unless the evicted tenants are restored to their homes there will not be peace in Ireland, as in my opinion there ought not to be peace, I join heartily with my hon. Friend in commending this simple and equitable measure to the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. O'Kelly.)

*(2.36.) MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) : The hon. Member for Roscommon, in introducing it, described this as a modest Bill, and at all events it has one recommendation, that it is thoroughly candid and straightforward. Whether or not I am open to the charge of inconsistency, I have come to the conclusion that it is my duty to move the rejection of the Bill, and I will do my best to state the reasons that actuate me. When the Land Purchase Act was passing through the House last Session there was a long discussion on the question of the evicted tenants, and much was said about them on both sides of the House, with the result that provisions were inserted in that measure from which I did not hope much at the time, and, therefore, I am not much disappointed at the results. But, at all events, it was an effort to give landlords and tenants breathing time, during which period they might come to terms, if they felt disposed to do so. Under Section 13 six months were allowed, and during that period landlords and tenants might agree as to terms of purchase under the Act which afterwards came into operation. I have said I did not hope for much from this section. I did not think the time allowed was too limited. I remember the hon. Member for West Belfast fought a great battle for a longer time. I did not disapprove of the length of time. My fear was as to the condition of the property, and the position of the evicted tenant, and I feared that under these circumstances if the landlord and ex-tenant came to terms the Land Commission would not ratify those terms, because of the lack of security—because of the state of the land and the condition of the farmer. So far as I can learn—and my only authority is the statement of the Chief Secretary, in answer to a question—very few applications have actually been made. But, although applications have not been lodged, I also gathered from the reply of the right hon. Gentleman that two months are allowed by the rules of the Commission for the lodging of applications, and in addition to those referred to by the right hon. Gentleman, I am aware that 104 of the tenants evicted from the Ponsonby estate have signed agreements to purchase. I am also aware that the entire tenantry on another Campaign estate have signed agreements.

MR. J. REDMOND : No ; the arrangements have fallen through.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL : That was not so when I left Dublin recently.

MR. J. REDMOND : Yes ; they have been withdrawn.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL : Well, I have heard of other attempts to arrive at agreements. I hope the Land Commissioners may see their way to ratify these agreements, and so end the state of affairs that prevail in some of these localities. But, candidly, I confess that, owing to the condition of the land and the position of these ex-tenants, I am not very hopeful that the Commissioners will decide there is security for the State for the advances under these conditions. Now as to the Bill itself. The first clause proposes to extend this period of six months. I cannot say that I have much objection to that, and I do not gather that the Government have much objection, for the Chief Secretary, answering a question from the hon. Member for North-East Cork, stated that if there was any desire on the part of landlords and tenants for an extension of time he was ready to consider a proposal of the kind. So I take it that to this first clause there will not be much objection on either side of the House. But when I come to the other clauses of the Bill I find radical objection to the whole of them. Clause 2 is the most innocent of all the enacting clauses of the Bill. It proposes that in the case of estates in the Land Judge's Court—i.e., those practically in the hands of a Receiver—that the Land Judge shall have the power, if he think fit to exercise it, to reinstate any of these tenants who may have been evicted—a compulsory power being given to the land Judge. Well, if you are going to apply compulsion to these estates, what do you come to? I myself, in the course of discussions upon compulsory sale, have advocated that compulsion ought to be applied to all these estates, all these mismanaged estates, that have come into the Land Judge's Court. I have over and over again stated in Ireland that I thought compulsion might be applied to such estates. But in what position did I find myself placed? Tenants on well managed estates at once put the question to me, "Are you going to confer on the tenants on a badly managed estate this privilege of compulsory purchase, and yet withhold it from tenants on well managed or properly managed estates?" Well, I say, as an Ulster Member, I was not able to answer that, and I have reluctantly by my own constituents been driven out of the position I took up.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: But I have sat in the House for six years, and I have never heard a proposal made in the House during all the discussions on land purchase in favour of compulsory purchase.

MR. SEXTON: There have been at least four such proposals.

MR. J. REDMOND: Such a proposal was made by the late Mr. Parnell.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Yes; but the hon. Member for Roscommon was not speaking of evicted tenants; he said make compulsion general.

MR. PINKERTON: I put down an Amendment to that effect.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: What is the use of putting an Amendment on the Paper and not being here to move it? The hon. Member for Roscommon said, in answer to my objection, "Make it general, and so get rid of the difficulty;" but I say the proposal has never been made with any authority in this House that there should be general compulsion, and when it is made I am ready to discuss it. But I am thankful to say that in Ulster the tenants do not, in the main, live on badly managed estates, and so they would be deprived of this privilege, and they would not tolerate it being withheld from them while it was conferred on the tenants on badly managed estates. The third is the most important clause in the Bill. It is quite true, as the hon. Member for North Dublin (Mr. Clancy) says, that the clause proposes to apply the principle of the Rent Redemption Act to evicted tenants, and I ought to be the last man to throw a stone at the Rent Redemption Act. The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. Balfour) will admit that in and out of season I pressed the principle of that Act upon his attention, and I greatly rejoice that it has become law, and I rejoice to find from the Returns it is not likely to be inoperative. But it is one thing to apply that principle to long leaseholders, tenants who have been struggling since 1881 to pay their rents, having been excluded from the Land Act; it is one thing to apply that principle, which, I admit, was a strong principle, to those tenants who have spent their capital on their holdings, in spite of the greatest difficulties; it is one thing to give a privilege like this to these men, and a totally different thing to give it to men who, according to the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon), were able to pay their rent and would not. It is one thing to give it to long leaseholders who had claims on this House, and it is another thing to give it to evicted tenants who have no claim on this House, whatever claim they may have against hon. Members below the Gangway. Now, what is the proposal in this 3rd clause? It simply gives any evicted tenant since 1879 this right, if it becomes law, that he, being evicted, no matter under what circumstances—let the House mark that—no matter what the circumstances of the eviction were, if this were to become law, any evicted tenant, evicted since 1879, would simply have the right to come to his old landlord, and, whether the farm had been re-let or not, he could say—"I want this farm back, and I want you to sell it, and if you cannot agree to my terms the Land Commission will fix terms, and if you will not sell, then your refusal to sell will constitute me a present tenant under the Act of 1881, and I shall go into the Court and have a fair rent fixed." Now, I think it must strike the House that is an extraordinary privilege to give to evicted tenants. It is conferring on them all the benefits of compulsory sale—benefits you withhold from the honest tenants who, amid the greatest depression and difficulties, struggled to pay their rent. You propose to reward the men evicted, it may be, under circumstances of sheer rascality on their part, with this great privilege which you withhold from the great mass of tenants who honestly struggled to pay their rent in times of the greatest depression. What defence is there for that? It is no argument to say we have applied that principle to the long leaseholders, the men who have striven to be honest under great difficulties. Even for them it was considered a strong order. I rejoice that they got it, and that the provision has not been inoperative. This clause goes further than that. The hon. Member implied that one reason why the 13th section of the Land Purchase Act had not been operative was that landlords had refused to come to terms. I know of one case where there was such a refusal.

MR. J. REDMOND: I know of 300.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: But let me put this case. I have seen a proposal made in writing by the tenants on a campaign estate in the South of Ireland, and I have seen the landlord's reply to that proposal. When I saw the landlord's answer to the proposal I said, and I say again, that the terms suggested by the landlord were impossible terms, and that the landlord might as well have asked the tenant to pay the National Debt. I admit that. I was asked to communicate with the landlord. I knew the landlord, and I had visited the estate in bygone years. I did communicate with the landlord, and what was his reply? I confess I had no answer to it. One of the conditions the landlord sought to impose was that he should not be asked to leave the guarantee deposit. I thought at first this was a monstrous proposal; but how did the landlord justify it? He said—

"Mr. Russell, these tenants were well off, and they entered into a conspiracy to deprive me of my rent, and they did deprive me of a large sum. I had to evict them. What is the proposal now made? Should I agree to the terms of purchase, a fifth of the purchase money will be held as guarantee out of my portion; and what security have I that these men will not conspire again; and if they do, what happens? My fifth is the first thing to be seized. These men have conspired against me before, and why should I, of all men in the world, be security for them again? I who have been their victim?"

Candidly, I confess I had no answer to this. I mention this to show the difficulties landlords have in coming to terms under the 13th section as well as the tenants. Now, take a concrete case. What would be the position under this Bill? It is all very fine to talk about "planters." I do not believe that "planters" or tenants under that title are very numerous, or that it would be impossible to deal with such cases; but let me take a concrete case from the Lansdowne Estate. Lord Lansdowne was the landlord of the hon. Gentleman who represents one of the Divisions of Kerry. Lord Lansdowne has sold the farm, though the right hon. Member for Central Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) contradicted me when I made the statement last Session.

MR. SEXTON: It was not sold then.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: It was not sanctioned, but all the arrangements were made. The farm held by the hon. Member for Kerry passed into other hands by sale. It is not vacant; it is occupied by a new tenant, and it is proposed that after this new tenant has purchased under legislation passed by this House the hon. Member for Kerry shall have the right to go back and say to the new tenant, "You must clear out of this. I am the old tenant, and this clause gives me the right; here is a vesting order which evicts you and plants me." Now, that is a strong order for this House to make after having authorised this tenant on the Marquess of Lansdowne's estate to purchase under the Act. We passed the Land Purchase Act, the Ashbourne Act, and under the authority of the Act the Marquess of Lansdowne sold the property and the tenant bought it. The transaction was sanctioned by the Land Commission, and I say it is a very strong order to ask the House to pass this clause and authorise the old tenant to go back and clear out this man who has actually purchased under the authority of legislation passed by Parliament. You may call this a modest proposal, and such is the character given it by the hon. Member for Roscommon—

MR. SEXTON: It is not in the Bill. It does not apply at all.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Then what is the meaning of Clause 4? I may be wrong in my reading of the Bill, but I cannot be wrong in my understanding of the explanation given in this House by hon. Members who say that the clause is specially applicable to what are called planters on these farms.

MR. SEXTON: Tenants.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: What is the difference in law between the tenant and the purchaser? There are but few English Members in the House just now, but fortunately there are two on the front Bench below me. Will they bestow a little thought upon this Bill? They were violent opponents of the Land Purchase Act of last Session, and on what grounds did they oppose it? Because they objected to imperilling British credit in the purchase of Irish land. They objected to the imperilling of British credit notwithstanding the checks and safeguards that almost every clause of that Act contains. Now let them look at this Bill. Here is a proposal which certainly imperils British credit, and what is your security? In the first place the land, much of which is derelict, out of cultivation, ruined. Not much security this. Next you have the security of ruined Campaigners who have been loafing about for six or seven years in Irish towns and villages and have not improved by that. Your Insurance Fund, which at all events was good for something, disappears, and it is absolutely proposed under this Bill to give these men more favourable terms than under the original Act you gave to legitimate purchasers! What do English Members, who have previously objected to imperilling British credit with all the safeguards the Land Purchase Act contains, say to this Bill to-day, which imperils British credit and includes none of the safeguards the original Act possesses? I divide evicted tenants into four classes. The first class is those who may have been unjustly evicted. Now, my previous opinion with regard to the Clanricarde estate has been referred to here to-day. I have said over and over again that I consider the Marquess of Clanricarde a standing menace to the peace of the County of Galway, and I am not going to withdraw one step from that statement. I say there were tenants unjustly evicted, but I am bound to say that I cannot impeach the Marquess of having racked higher than his neighbours, or as high. I should be very glad if those tenants could be dealt with under Clause 13, or some extension of that clause. Then there are tenants who have been evicted and have been unfortunate, who have failed to make their land pay. The second class are the ne'er-do-wells. Why should you put them back into the farms and let them imperil the credit of the State when they could not make them pay when they were in them? The third class is those who conspired, at the bidding of a great organisation, not to pay their rent; who went out of their farms on a deliberate plan and system, the system being to produce anarchy in the country, and, though I have not the exact words, I remember the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. J. E. Redmond) saying that the Plan of Campaign was not organised so much in view of the relief of the tenants as with the view of embarrassing the Government.

MR. J. E. REDMOND (Waterford): That is not what I said.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I said I had not the hon. Gentleman's exact words. And, lastly, there is another class, and I suspect the most numerous, the dupes of that great organisation, men who went out after being told they would not lose a shilling, that the resources of the Irish race were at their back, these children of the nation who were never to be deserted, like the Tipperary tenants, who have left their homes and lost their all, and have never had the honour of even a passing visit from the hon. Members for East Mayo (Mr. J. Dillon) or North-East Cork (Mr. W. O'Brien) since they came out of gaol. I admit the misfortunes of these tenants, but I deny that they have any claim on this House. They derided the laws of this House, and trampled on the peace which those laws were intended to uphold. The people these men have claims upon are hon. Members below the Gangway, who urged them to leave their homes, and told them they would never desert them, and who, raising a fund for national purposes in the name of the evicted tenants, have applied some of it to a totally different purpose. I move the rejection of the Bill with a clear conscience, and if I said a word in support of a Bill like this, all I can say is that I should never stand face to face with the Ulster tenant farmers again, and in their name I move the rejection. It is not a modest Bill, but one of the most audacious that was ever presented to a British House of Commons.

MR. T. LEA (Londonderry, S.): I second the Motion.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. T. W. Russell.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

*(3.10.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): I find it difficult to reconcile the speech of the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down with his action last year on the clause to which he referred. Though he claims credit for having passed the 13th clause last year, he says that he did not hope much from it, and that he has not been disappointed in its not having succeeded in effecting anything. My recollection of the speech of the hon. Gentleman on that occasion is exactly the reverse.

Mr. T. W. Russell

I find, on referring to Hansard, that on moving the clause he expressed his ardent hope that it would effect the purpose aimed at, and settle all the unfortunate disputes which had occurred on the Campaign estates. He expressed confidence that it would settle three-fourths of the disputes. He gave the House the express assurance that it would settle the disputes on the Olphert, Ponsonby, and Clongorey estates. I think his language to-day does not agree with what he said then, and three-fourths of the violent arguments he has used to-day would equally apply to the clause of last Session. The question before the House is one of very considerable importance and great delicacy and difficulty. I think there was a general desire in the House at the end of last Session that these disputes should be settled in an amicable manner in the interests of the peace of Ireland. I may remind the House that early in last Session I myself moved a Resolution for the purpose of endeavouring to effect this object. I proposed a Resolution to the House that the Government should use its influence with a view to restoring these evicted tenants to their holdings in the interests of the peace of Ireland, and with the view also of conciliating Irish public opinion, especially at a time when the Government was proposing a great remedial measure, and that, if necessary, it should adopt legislation with that object. The then Chief Secretary (Mr. A. J. Balfour) replied to me in what I may call the earlier tone of his Irish administration and made a violent speech in reply, in which he said if he were an Irish landlord he would rather beg his bread than give way to the tenants, who were in combination. Later in the Session more moderate counsels prevailed and better statesmanship, and in the course of the discussion which took place on the Land Purchase Bill the clause which has been alluded to was moved by the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) and generally accepted by the House. The Chief Secretary himself spoke in a totally different tone to that of the earlier speech, and expressed great pleasure in giving his support to the clause. He said that if he were an Irish landlord he would be glad, even at a pecuniary loss, to re-instate the evicted tenants in the interests of peace. He also said that no one more than he desired that there should be a settlement of these disputes. These were wise and statesman-like words. The hon. Member for South Hunts (Mr. Smith-Barry), speaking for the landlords of Ireland, also expressed approval of the clause, and said that it would open the door to friendly settlements, and he believed would have the effect of settling a great proportion of the disputes. What has been the result? I am bound to say that it has been an almost total failure; practically no action has taken place under it. So far from the hopes and expectations of the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) being fulfilled, I find that, on the three estates he mentioned, very little has been done.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: On the Ponsonby estate the settlements amounted to half the rents.

*MR. S H A W L E F F E V R E: I am coming to that shortly. The great bulk of the landlords on whose estates evictions had taken place had made no proposals to their tenants. The tenants had been most anxious for a settlement, and had done their very best to induce the landlords to offer them terms. In other cases the landlords made offers of such a character that it could not be expected for a moment that the tenants would avail themselves of them. What was the case of the Olphert estate? The evicted tenants, 340 in number, approached their landlord through Father Boyle, the curate of Falcarragh, and asked for terms of purchase. Colonel Olphert, in reply, said he was prepared to sell his lands if the tenants would pay in cash at once a sum representing the rent of the three years they had been out of possession, and also 20 years' purchase of the land. I venture to say that these terms were practically prohibitive, and could only have been brought forward in the belief that they would prevent further negotiations. What was the case on the Ponsonby estate? I know something about it, for I have had communications from the excellent priest, Canon Keller, of Youghal. The offer made by the hon. Member for South Hunts (Mr. Smith-Barry)—who acts as chairman of the syndicate which has taken over this estate—I am sorry to say, hardly carried out the promise of his speech in the House. One would have expected that he would be one of the first to consider the subject in a conciliatory manner and offer reasonable terms. What were the terms offered by the hon. Member on the Ponsonby estate? They were asked to pay 19 years' purchase of their holdings, and to give promissory notes for one and a half years' rent, making about 20 years' purchase, which is considered to be an altogether unreasonable price. It is perfectly true that 102 out of 240 tenants have accepted these terms, but I am told that they accepted them under a feeling of panic, and in the hope that the Land Commission will not consent to such excessive terms. The remaining 140 tenants have rejected them. Under those terms the landlord would receive £20,000 more for the whole estate than Mr. Ponsonby was ready to accept, and had offered to the tenants to accept, three years before. That offer could hardly be said to be in the spirit of the clause of the Act of last year. So far as I have been able to learn, in the other cases no practical result has been arrived at. It does appear to me that the House having inserted this clause in the expectation that settlements would be arrived at, and having gone so far as to recognise the fact that the State credit might be used for the purpose of reinstating these tenants in their holdings, it is hardly satisfactory that the House should leave the question in its present state. Something more ought to be done towards carrying out that policy. I do not say that the measure before us is the best way of carrying it out; perhaps some better method might be devised for effecting the object. But it appears to me that the House is pledged to the policy of reinstating these tenants in their holdings. The present Chief Secretary (Mr. Jackson) spoke on the subject some nights ago in very proper terms, and expressed an earnest hope that a settlement might be arrived at on the whole of the estates. Now there is an opportunity for the House to do that. The adoption of the Second Reading of this Bill will not pledge the House to the details as to how the proposal shall be carried out. By reading it a second time we adopt the principle that settlement ought to be brought about, and that these tenants should be reinstated, leaving the question as to how it shall be done for discussion in Committee. Practically the clause of last year has failed ; the object the House had in view has not been carried out, and the opportunity now arises when the House may give some effect to the clause of last year, with the view of bringing about that result which Members desired last year, and which I believe they still desire. I do not think it necessary to follow the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) in his violent attacks on the tenants. I think the general disposition of the House last year was to forget what had been done in the past, and in the interests of peace, and in deference to the public opinion of Ireland, to bring these disputes to a conclusion. I venture to ask the House not to depart from that spirit—not to rake up old questions as to how far the tenants were justified or not in their combinations, but to look at the question from a statesmanlike point of view, and in deference to the public opinion of Ireland, which has been expressed on behalf of these tenants in a way in which it has never been expressed on any other question before the House, to take this opportunity of affirming the principle that a settlement should be arrived at on this important and difficult question. With a view to securing the peace of Ireland this is a time to make another effort to effect what was decided upon last year, and so bring these unfortunate disputes to a close.

(3.20.) MR. W. O'BRIEN (Cork Co., N.E.): The hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) has treated us to one of those attacks on the position of the evicted tenants in Ireland which he has hawked about

England for the last two or three years, with the result to the Tory Party that he has changed their solid base of 100 into 25. The Rossen election is, perhaps, the best proof the English people have begun to praise the value of the hon. Gentleman's misinterpretation of the character of the fight we have been making in Ireland. That fight is for the peace of Ireland, and the re-instatement of these evicted tenants. When the Bill of 1887 was introduced it promised again and again to drop the Plan of Campaign if only the evicted tenants, whose sacrifices won that were admitted to its benefits. Government deliberately excluded them and that is the origin of the whole trouble in Ireland. That is the struggle has been prolonged four years with results that are slightly less agreeable to hon. Gentlemen supporting the Government than they are to hon. Gentlemen on this side. The result of our fight has been that, after five years of coercion, the Government were forced, in the 13th clause, to attempt to make some provision for the restoration of these evicted tenants but it was, as usual, imperfect, utterly unworkable, and simply enacted by one or two men like the hon. Men for South Hunts (Mr. Smith-Barry) use the credit of the British taxpayer as he almost admitted, to coerce the tenants. If the Government are satisfied with this result of the five years' struggle to deny these unfortunate men justice they are thankful for such mercies. You have not broken the Plan of Campaign, but it has broken you. It has accomplished the object for which it was forwarded. It has wrung two or three Acts from the Government. It has victoriously protected these evicted tenants year after year in face of most fierce coercion. We have deserted the evicted tenants ; we are here still ; and though the hon. Member may taunt us that the unhappy Divisions which paralyse for the moment our power in Ireland have increased and aggravated our difficulties—we have not abandoned a single evicted tenant and we will not abandon a single tenant until you have either passed this measure or a General Election gives us the power of obtaining a just and effective 13th clause instead of the miserable and abortive clause of the Land Purchase Act of last year. I most cordially support the Bill, and warn you that if you do not pass it to-day, you will have to pass it some day.

(3.27.) MR. BARTON (Armagh, Mid): I do not think the House will blame the hon. Member for speaking with some warmth on this subject, but I desire to say a few words on the speech of the right hon. Member for Central Bradford, who is himself, we might almost say, a supporter of the Plan of Campaign. He went over to Ireland and took part in meetings and transactions in connection with the Plan of Campaign. I have no sympathy with the English Privy Councillor who becomes an Irish agitator. Irish Members cannot approach this question with a light heart. Landlords who have been the victims of the Plan of Campaign have been reduced to want, and their servants and dependants thrown out of employment. We cannot help sympathising also with the tenants who have been the dupes of designing politicians. Some of them have had to leave the country, and others have spent their time in the public houses in the neighbourhood of their old homes, losing all their habits of agriculture and of labour, so that if they are re-instated they will never be in the same position as formerly. The voluntary clause in the Bill introduced last Session was a fair clause, and I believe was an immense step towards conciliation. But as for the present Bill it is quite a different matter. It offers a premium upon lawlessness and dishonesty, for it proposes to give special and peculiar privileges and rewards to tenants whose conduct has certainly not entitled them to any special consideration. The right hon. Gentleman opposite has said that he would not take up matters connected with the origin of the Plan of Campaign. I dare say if the right hon. Gentleman could have foreseen the results of that Plan, and could recall the last few years, he would have taken a very different view of the matter, and might, in all probability, have spared himself the cost of sundry return tickets to Ireland. I hope the House will pardon me for referring to a speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian as to the Plan of Campaign. Speaking in Scotland, the right hon. Gentleman said—

"I believe I am right in saying that the Plan of Campaign has been declared by sufficient authority not to be legal, and I do not justify anything that is not legal."

I admit that the right hon. Gentleman went on to attribute the Plan to the policy of the Tories. But this suggestion has been recently denied on the best authority. Now, Mr. Andrew Kettle, one of the promoters of the Land League, writing on the 27th October, 1891, to the Irish Times, says—

"It may surprise some people to learn that the Plan of Campaign was not started by Mr O'Brien to settle the Land Question, or to work out the social emancipation of the tenants. It was promoted by a desire to make good Mr. Gladstone's words, that the Tories would have to govern Ireland either by Coercion or Home Rule, and as there was very little chance of the latter contingency the Plan was started to force the Tories to pass a Coercion Act? The tenants and the Land Question were only means to an end."

MR. W. O'BRIEN: Mr. Andrew Kettle is a very respectable man; but he has no special knowledge of the causes that led to the establishment of the Plan of Campaign.

MR. BARTON: The hon. Member should have heard me out. This Mr. Kettle was one of the founders of the League. But I do not solely rely upon Mr. Kettle's statement. In a recent speech the hon. Member for Waterford said, in reference to the Plan of Campaign—

"It was not simply started as an agrarian movement; it was started as a great political engine wherewith to fight Balfour and to fight Coercion."

But if the Plan of Campaign was a political engine why this Bill? If that is true, the promoters of the Bill are proposing to reward those who worked this great political engine "to fight Balfour and Coercion," and worked it for political purposes. This is a Bill meant to confer special privileges upon men whose policy was condemned by the Pope, condemned by the Judges, and condemned by statesmen and by the Press. The Daily News wrote as follows :—

" We by no means approve of Mr. Dillon's policy. His 'Plan of Campaign' seems to be vitiated with dishonesty. To withhold just rents because exorbitant demands are made is to take trouble to be in the wrong. The scheme which our special correspondent describes is one which attempts to cure a grievance of the tenants by inflicting a grievance on the landlords. It is doing an injustice as a protest against injustice."

As I have said, the Plan of Campaign was condemned by the heads of the Roman Catholic Church, the following question having been proposed to their Eminences the Cardinals of the Congregation :—

" Is it permissible, in the disputes between landowners and tenants in Ireland, to use the means known as the Plan of Campaign and boycotting? After long and mature deliberation their Eminences unanimously answered in the negative and, the decision was confirmed by the Holy Father."

Such was the decision of the heads of the Roman Catholic Church, and yet, for political purposes, the Rescript of the Pope was treated as so much waste paper. Again, the question came before the Courts of Law, and the Lord Chief Baron—dealing with this matter, which, according to the Daily News, was "vitiated with dishonesty"—in his charge to the jury in the case of Blunt v. Byrne, laid it down as a matter of law, deliberately and without any reservation, that—

" The Plan of Campaign is, in its essence, against the spirit of personal liberty, is against the law of the realm, and anyone taking part in it, aiding it, or promoting it, is guilty of an offence for which he may be made criminally responsible."

That judicial deliverance has never been dissented from by any member of the Judiciary in either England or Ireland. It will surely be difficult for hon. Members opposite who are not Nationalists to support a measure meant to give exceptional privileges to the tenants on the Campaign estates, when their only claim to exceptional treatment is that they have taken part in a course of action which the right hon. Member for Midlothian has himself refused to justify, which the heads of the Roman Catholic Church have so emphatically condemned, which the Judges of the land have declared to be illegal. But if this was the way in which the Plan of Campaign was initiated, how was it carried on? Was it conducted with a desire to arrive at settlements? Not at all. It will, I dare say, be in the recollection of hon. Members that, with regard to one estate upon which the Plan of Campaign was put in force, the Roman Catholic Bishop of Limerick wrote a letter, in which he almost prayed that a settlement might be come to. I will read the last sentence of that letter—

" It would be easy for me to win popularity by taking another course, but even if higher motives did not restrain me, I should be ashamed to ask poor people to endure heart-breaking sorrows of eviction which I had no notion of ever undergoing myself."

But how was that letter referred to in the House of Commons by the hon. Member for East Mayo? The hon. Member, speaking of the letter of the Bishop of Limerick, described it as "a most violent and dastardly letter," and said that the Bishop's conduct was "scandalous." He said—

" I am exceedingly glad that he stands alone among the Episcopacy of Ireland with his scandalous conduct."

Remarks of that kind throw an illuminating ray upon the manner in which the fight has been kept up, and shows that the aim of the promoters of the Plan of Campaign was to keep a festering sore open as long as they could, and not to heal it. Hon. Members opposite suggest that they, at any rate, have done nothing to prevent the clause which has already been referred to from working; but I regret to be compelled to say that my observations of the public utterances of hon. Members in Ireland have led me to form quite a different opinion. It is true that the hon. Member for Waterford, speaking on the 14th September of last year, said—

" What, in my opinion, should be done is this. There are many estates where reasonable settlements could be brought about, and where tenants might be restored at reduced rents, and I would say that the tenants upon such estates might be allowed to accept those settlements."

But how, I ask, was that received? Why, it was denounced as a most cowardly policy, and in proof of that

I may be allowed to quote from a speech of the hon. Member for North East Cork, who, alluding to this advice of the hon. Member for Waterford that settlements should be made where possible, said—

"For what does Mr. Redmond's policy mean? Mr. Redmond puts a pistol to the heads of the Clanricarde tenants and says: 'You must surrender at discretion to Lord Clanricarde. You must throw yourself at the mercy of a ravening wolf, and if you do not, I will take care that you do not get another shilling to keep you and your children from starvation.'

And now, what is the House asked to do? It is asked to put the men who entered into that criminal conspiracy in a position of advantage to which the rest of the tenants of Ireland could never hope to attain. What about the tenants who resisted the Plan of Campaign? What about those honest men who, in spite of the combination, remained on their holdings and went on paying their rent? Are the men who defied the law to be brought in and given privileges that the honest tenants never asked for, never dreamt of, and which they could not hope to obtain? In August of 1887 the hon. Member for East Mayo gave a remarkable warning to those honest tenants which I may venture to quote to the House. Speaking on the 23rd August of that year, he said—

"I am alluding now to the combination amongst the tenants known as the Plan of Campaign. Now let me say this: that if there be a man in Ireland—and I do not believe there is—if there is a man in Ireland base enough to back down, to turn his back on the fight, now that Coercion has passed, I pledge myself in the face of this meeting that I will denounce him from public platforms by name, and I pledge myself to the Government that, let that man be whom he may, his life will not be a happy one, either in Ireland or across the sea, and I say this with the intention of carrying out what I say, and without the slightest fear of the interpretation which will be put upon what I say by the Tory newspapers."

This Bill proposes that the men who have defied the law should be given privileges that those honest tenants, who resisted temptations and threats, never asked and do not now claim. But what about the men who have availed themselves of the Act of 1891? They have availed themselves of that Act, and yet they are to be placed in a worse position than those who declined to do so. The hon. Member for South Tyrone is quite right when he said that the farmers of Ulster regard this Bill with considerable curiosity. They are men who paid their rents regularly, and frequently legislation has come in which did them no good, but which favoured the less deserving tenants in other parts of the country. [An hon. MEMBER: Name.] I refer, for example, to the Arrears Act as a specimen of the legislation which, I care not who brought it in, rewarded the landlord who managed his estate badly and the tenant who did not pay his rent. The question involved in the Bill before the House concerns, more than any section of the House, the Members on the Front Opposition Bench. Nobody can, of course, blame Irish National Members opposite for defending the evicted tenants. They would be, indeed, wanting in honour if they did not; they would be wanting in honour if they deserted the men who kept up the fight; and, so far as I know, they are not wanting in courage to stand by those who agree with them in Ireland. But it is quite different with hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite. The misery of the evicted tenants really lies at their door, and now they are in a dilemma. They must either desert their dupes—the men who kept up the fight in Ireland, and without whom they would have found it absolutely impossible to suggest that the present Government have had any difficulty in governing Ireland; or, in the alternative, they will have by supporting this Bill to sanction, to justify, and to reward a course of illegal criminality which I challenge hon. Members and right hon. Members opposite to defend upon Liberal principles.

(3.53.) MR. J. DILLON (Mayo, E.): The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has treated us to a considerable deal of ancient history which has often before been referred to both in and out of this House, and into which I have no desire and no intention of following him. In the course of his speech I could not help thinking that I had listened to similar speeches before in Ireland, and I could not help imagining myself in the dock in Green Street, with the hon. Member engaged in conducting the prosecution. Hon. Gentlemen upon the other side of the House look, I think, upon the whole subject from a very narrow point of view. They hark back to the Plan of Campaign and to various organisations and agitations which it is impossible in the limits at the disposal of the House to go into, but which have for the last ten years been agitating Ireland. The hon. Member treats these matters as if they had not been again and again debated in this House; and he asks the House to believe that these agitations in Ireland arose from no cause whatever except from a desire to give assistance to the Liberal Party and to make political capital for them. The hon. Member charges the National Party in Ireland with having started the Plan of Campaign in Ireland for the simple purpose of making political capital for the Liberals in England, and for the purpose of proving that the English Government in Ireland was impossible. I can speak as to my own intentions, and I say, speaking for myself, that I do not believe there is in the House, or in the country, a man, who knows anything at all about the matter, who believes in his heart the truth of the statement. In the autumn of 1886 when the Bill of my late leader, Mr. Parnell, was rejected, I told the House that we would be obliged to fall back on the methods of agitation, which alone, in the past, have stood between the Irish tenantry, and which have wrung from successive English Governments large measures of concession. The hon. Member opposite talks about the grievances of the Ulster tenants. Why, nobody knows better than the hon. Member for South Tyrone that there is not a single benefit gained by the tenants of Ulster that has not been won by the sacrifices of the poor people whose rights the Irish National Members have been advocating. He and others might talk in this House until their hair grew grey, and I doubt if they would have got very much by their talking or that a single one of their grievances would have been listened to, much less remedied. Those very combinations, which are a constant mark for the denunciations of the hon. Members were, I take leave to say, the only root and source of every small concession gained for Ireland; and but for these very combinations the tenants of Ulster, in whom the hon. Member opposite professes to be so interested, would be still groaning beneath the heel of the landlord classes. We say that never, in the whole history of civilised mankind, has there occurred so great an alteration in the social condition of a country with so little bloodshed and disturbance as that which has marked the change that has come over the condition of the people of Ireland during the last ten years, and which I say was brought about by one of the greatest and, I will add, one of the most beneficial agitations that is known to history. There have been great combinations and great breaches of the law, if you will, but look back over the pages of history and point out to me any parallel instance where a whole people, who were practically in the position of serfs in the land, emancipated themselves, or to a great extent emancipated themselves, without some breaches of the law. I say there is no other country which has achieved so great results with so little disturbance, bloodshed, or breaches of the law; and because of one great combination a number of poor men, no matter whether they belonged to the Plan of Campaign or not—and the large majority of these men, I believe, did not belong to the Plan of Campaign, because there are only about 1,500 tenants on my book who did take part in the Plan of Campaign; so that the 5,000 or 6,000 tenants who would take advantage of this Bill can never have belonged to the Plan of Campaign. But whether they belonged to the Plan of Campaign or not, whether from lapse of time or from one cause or another, they have been shut out from the benefits which all the other tenantry of Ireland to-day enjoy. I do not mean to say that they enjoy all the benefits to which they are justly entitled, or anything like it, and I hope something more will be done for them before long; but these men for whom we now appeal, and for whose benefit this Bill has been introduced to day to save them from starvation and pauperism, have been shut out from the benefits which the law, as altered now by our exertions and agitation, confers upon every tenant to-day. And what we claim for these men is not, as the hon. Member falsely assures the House, that these men should be rewarded for a breach of the law. What we claim is, practically speaking, that a great amnesty of liberty should be extended to these people; that the voice of Justice, backed up by strong agitation—and it is worthless without that—the English Government, having been compelled by these two great forces to admit that the tenantry and the people of Ireland have been subjected for generations to a cruel and shameful wrong, they should undo that cruel and shameful wrong so far as in them lies. These poor tenantry are presumably—I say presumably, for the burden of proof lies on the other side—were unjustly evicted, because they were evicted from their holdings at a time when the law was unjust. Therefore I am entitled to say they were unjustly evicted. The law was unjust; you have altered the law, and the presumption is that before the law was altered the landlords used their powers of eviction unjustly. Our case, then, is that the tenantry evicted during the last ten years probably were unjustly evicted; and, in view of the great changes that have been wrought and the great ameliorations introduced into the law as affecting the position of the tenants in Ireland, I say it is not unreasonable, but reasonable and just, that some great measure of amnesty and healing should be extended to these tenants who, through the opposition and delay which the Irish Members experienced in carrying a measure of justice through this House, have been thrown out of their holdings and obliged to starve. I have only one word more to say, and it is this: over and over again we have warned this House and warned Governments of the danger of neglecting measures of this character, and in no instance that I can recollect have our words of warning been falsified. On the contrary, our position turned out in the main to be true. I ask the Government, and I ask this House, do they desire to have social peace in Ireland? and I ask them do they expect to have social peace in Ireland while four or five thousand tenants claim permission to regain possession of their farms, and four or five thousand half-starved families are watching those farms and determined to come back? You may think, or pretend to think, that it is not just that these families should get back to their holdings; but the question is, what do the people of Ireland think? It is not what the Members of this House think that will prevail. What must ultimately prevail is what the moral sentiment of the people of Ireland thinks. Though our ranks may be divided, and although, unhappily, things have occurred in Ireland which have weakened our position in that country, and incited landlords to act harshly and unjustly towards their tenants, that state of things will not last for ever; and the time will come again when the moral sentiment of the people of Ireland—as regards five-sixths of the people—will be able to re-assert itself through a unanimous Party with the same force as during the last ten years that have rolled by. It is not, therefore, what this House may say that will ultimately prevail, but what the people of Ireland with one united voice may say; and the time will come, be it sooner or later, when they will reinstate these evicted tenants in their farms.

*(4.6.) COLONEL WARING (Down, N.): I do not intend to follow the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down in what he has said touching the moral sentiment of the people of Ireland. On that question the hon. Gentleman is an undoubted authority, because for the last five or six years he has been forming and cultivating that sentiment which he is pleased to call moral. He has complained that the view taken by hon. Members on this side of the House has been a narrow one—that it has been confined to the tenants who took part in the Plan of Campaign, and to these only. I do not intend to emulate him in that respect, and in the few remarks that I shall make I shall endeavour, as far as possible, to break fresh ground. Now the hon. Member who introduced this Bill told us that it was a modest Bill; but he also told us that it was not a new principle. As to whether it is a modest Bill or an audacious one I think there will be a considerable division of opinion; but as to whether it is a new principle or not, I am perfectly certain there can be no question of this, because the principle that underlies this Bill is the same as underlay nine-tenths of the Bill on the same subject which have emanated from the same quarter. That principle in some cases was veiled confiscation; in the present one it is confiscation absolutely unveiled and unvarnished. The hon. Gentleman said that there were only 1,500 tenants on his book as evicted tenants under the Plan of Campaign, or about one-third. How about the other two-thirds? Admitting, for argument's sake, that the former were arbitrary, what evidence have we that the evictions of the other two-thirds were in any way harsh or unjust? There were men in possession of the farms from which these tenants were evicted for breach of their legal engagements, these men, now in occupation, for many years—some ten or twelve years—have been cultivating these holdings, putting them in order, making up for the loss of time, want of energy and application, which caused the failure of the previous tenants; and they are by a process, which is euphemistically called a vested order, to be chucked out upon the road, and have all their improvements confiscated without the slightest compensation. But there are other instances. Of course, a landlord is not to expect any possible mercy from hon. Members opposite. ("Oh, oh.") Well, is he?

MR. SEXTON: Certainly.

COLONEL WARING: When is he to have mercy?

MR. SEXTON: When he deserves it.

COLONEL WARING: When he deserves it? Well, take the instance of a landlord who has been obliged to evict a tenant who is hopelessly insolvent and idle, and suppose he takes that farm into his own hands, cultivates the farm, puts it in order, repairs the buildings, erects a new one, and is making a profit out of that farm—is he to be evicted by a vested order?

Are his improvements to be confiscated without any return? We are told that if he pulls the house down, if he clears off a mud cottage, he has to pay for it, and I presume if he built an additional house and put it in order for a man to live in, he would be turned out of that without mercy or one farthing's compensation. I will give an instance of that; I shall not enter into particulars; I shall simply say that I myself have got a farm of the kind, out of which I am able to make more than double the rent I was ever paid for it; and I do not think that it would recommend itself to the justice of English Members that I should be turned out of that farm.

MR. DILLON: Where is the tenant?

COLONEL WARING: Gone to America. I heard the other day he had come back again, and I believe he is doing very well.

DR. KENNY: How much was he rack-rented?

COLONEL WARING: He was so rack-rented that I am making double the rent of the farm that he promised to pay me, but never did pay me. But suppose another case. Suppose I let a farm from which some other people have been evicted to an improving tenant, what are you to do with that man? We have great sympathy for a man who has brought eviction upon himself. Here is a man who acts under the law, has not in any way transgressed the orders of hon. Gentlemen opposite, who simply takes a farm in open market on the faith that the law of the land under which he has lived will be maintained. Are you to say to him because, in other parts of Ireland, there has been a collision of interests and some of our friends have gone to the wall, you are to be turned out of your home and have all your improvements for the last fifteen years confiscated? We were told that a precedent was made for this Bill under the Act passed last year for breaking perpetuity leases. But under that Act nobody could be evicted, and consequently the result was that no such injustice could possibly take place. We are told that this Bill is intended for peace, but I fail to see where the war is. There was war, was disturbance certainly, in Ireland; but, so far as I can judge, the only war that is going on in Ireland now is between hon. Members opposite themselves. We were told by the hon. Member who brought in this Bill that we should have universal compulsion by way of getting rid of rent altogether. Where are hon. Members going to get the money to carry out this compulsory purchase? Hon. Members opposite know that they have strained their own consciences to the uttermost in voting 33 millions last year. Call it by its proper name—not compulsion, but confiscation—at once. I can read no other meaning in this Bill but an absolute confiscation. The real object of the Bill is not the reinstatement of the evicted tenants, but the destruction of the class to which I belong, and the throwing out of employment of the labourers and artisans who depend on it and support it against their machinations.

(4.50.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): The hon. and gallant Gentleman who has just sat down was pleased to refer to what he calls the war among the Irish Members. I venture to say that he has dignified it by too military a term. At any rate, I think the hon. and gallant Gentleman will find out in the long run that they are able to settle their disputes among themselves without any assistance from the hon. and gallant Gentleman or his friends. The hon. and gallant Gentleman, in my experience, rarely says anything of light and leading in a matter of large scope. The hon. and gallant Gentleman is too reminiscent. He ventured to sneer at my hon. Friend the Member for Mayo because of what he called his occupation. The particular occupation in which my hon. Friend has been engaged for many years of his life, and in pursuit of which he has uncomplainingly suffered the loss of liberty many times in the course of the last few years, has been an attempt—the noblest that any Irishman could make—an attempt to render Ireland a tolerable dwelling-place for the people, an attempt to save the mass of the Irish people from oppression, and it ill lies in the mouth of the hon. and gallant Gentleman to sneer at the occupation of my hon. Friend, because the gallant Gentleman belongs to a class of men who have more grossly and shamefully abused their powers than any class of men of whom mention is made in the history of the world, and who, as is proved by the records of the Queen's Courts in Ireland, have made themselves the curse of Ireland and the disgrace of the Empire. The gallant Gentleman asks, is a landlord to expect no mercy? If political justice were to be meted out to these Irish landlords, they need expect no mercy—they deserve none. But we, the most extreme advocates of the Irish tenants, are disposed to be more lenient to them, and from beginning to end of this Bill there is no proposal which denies justice or mercy to the Irish landlord; because there is no proposal in the Bill to commit his financial interests to any other than his own friends. Every proposal in this Bill refers the rent to be paid to the landlord, or the value of his interest, in case of purchase, to a Commission composed of landlords and their friends; and does the hon. and gallant Gentleman seriously contend that a question referred to Mr. Wrench, Mr. Lynch, and Mr. Justice Bewley is likely to be determined against the interests of the landlord? The gallant Gentleman asks what compensation a landlord is to have for improvements. Well, the Bill provides that the Land Commission shall fix the price if the landlord and tenant cannot agree; and if they were to sell that farm as it suited themselves, in that case any improvements which the gallant Gentleman—entirely against the rule of his class in Ireland—has made, of course would be valued and included in the purchase-money. It is much to be regretted that on a great question of State policy of this kind, which has been the subject of angry strife between Parties in this House, it is so difficult to introduce anything like a spirit of calm and impartial statesmanship, and that there is so fatal a tendency to look at the subject from the point of view of the landlord. The Government, in this case, I fear, are ill-inclined, and certainly they have a bad adviser. The evil genius in this case is the hon. Member for South Tyrone. I am sorry to say that I believe the hon. Gentleman has what I may call a vested interest in the perpetuation of ill-will. He has spoken to-day of funds, and has suggested that they were misappropriated. The hon. Gentleman seems to be sorry that there is a fund for the evicted tenants. He seems to be sorry that there is any hope that during this—

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I said that there were funds, and that all that I was sorry for was that they were not applied for the purpose, but for general purposes.

MR. SEXTON: The hon. Gentleman, by way of explanation, has made his position no better. The purposes of the National funds were stated with undeniable clearness and fulness by the Convention that was held in Ireland. These purposes were accepted, and are accepted, by the Irish people, and the main purpose to which the greater part of these funds has been applied is to the aid of these tenants. What right has the hon. Gentleman to speak of funds? Has the hon. Gentleman himself had no connection with funds? He has been connected with the fund for the squatters in Ireland, which was collected in England. He made himself cashier and treasurer of that, and he has published no audit of it to show how it has been applied. He blames us for encouraging hope in the breasts of the evicted tenants. What right has he, by means of this fund, to implant in the bosom of these squatters—

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I never got a penny of it.

MR. SEXTON: Surely he has. Evidence was given before the Courts in Ireland, and it was sworn that he gave £100 to one tenant.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: The Tipperary fund was a fund got up in relief of boycotting. The fund which the hon. Member is referring to is a fund for the derelict land; the fund for Tipperary has been dispensed there; it has been audited, and those who subscribed to it have got information of what was done with it.

MR. SEXTON: If the hon. Member could produce the audit hon. Members would be better able to follow the distinction, which is not observable in this Debate. When the hon. Gentleman makes himself cashier of a fund collected in England, and has had an audit to show how it has been disposed of, especially when he makes himself trustee for these squatters—when the hon. Gentleman is in a fiduciary position with regard to this fund—I have good a right to say of him, as he has of us with regard to the Plan Campaign tenants, that he has entered into a conspiracy in which the other parties are these poor squatters; and am entitled to assume, and I do assume, that this hon. Gentleman has entered into obligations and incurred rights according to which he stands discharged from the functions of a Member of the House.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I have no Sir.

MR. SEXTON: The hon. Member has been cited again and again in the House—and it has not been denied—the squatter's friend.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I again say that with these planters I have had relations whatever.

MR. SEXTON: I again say that the persons connected with this fund had published an audit of it, they would be in a better position. The hon. Gentleman has acted as intermediary, in some sense, between those who contributed these funds in England and those who received them in Ireland. I think it would have been more judicious of the hon. Gentleman—instead of planning ill-will in Ireland and setting up a title to these evicted farms, which is incompatible with social interests—if he applied himself to aid in the application for the health policy cited to-day. I say the hon. Gentleman is a bad adviser, and the evil genius in this case. I fear I must add that the Government themselves are ill-inclined. A heavy responsibility lies upon them. They were warned in 1886—the year for entering into peace—of the gravity of the case in Ireland; they were warned by the men best qualified to warn them. They did not deny that there was a case for legislation; they said the judicial rents were sacred and could not

House use its power to relieve those persons to the detriment of the law-abiding tenants of Ireland? If this House were to divide, not upon the question of the poetic justice which hon. Members opposite desire to mete out to landlords, but on the comparative merits of the tenants of Ulster and the tenants which the hon. Members have misguided, there would be very little doubt about the vote the House would give this afternoon.

(4.52.) MR. J. REDMOND (Waterford): Sir, the speech to which we have just listened might have been made by any hon. Gentleman who had not heard one single word of the Debate upon this Bill. The speech of the hon. Member for Mid Armagh might have been made at any time during the last few years. Every word said was equally true before Clause 13 was passed last year. What is our position? The Government, at the instance of the hon. Members for South Tyrone and West Belfast, Mr. Parnell and others, passed into law a clause which recognised that there was a state of things existing in Ireland with reference to evicted tenants which demanded legislation. The present First Lord of the Treasury put that clause in his Land Bill believing that the grievance existed, and that the clause would bring peace to Ireland. The clause has failed from the inherent defects which we have pointed out; and in this Bill we propose to apply the principles of the Redemption of Rent Act of last year. Sir, that is not an original suggestion. It is a suggestion that was made as long ago as the 5th June, 1891, by the late Mr. Parnell. He put down a specific clause against the Bill of last year, but the clause was, for some reason or other, ruled out of order. A question was addressed by the late Mr. Parnell to the present Leader of the House as to whether it would not be possible to include in the Bill dealing with long leaseholders a clause for the restoration of evicted tenants; and on the 4th June last year the right hon. Gentleman admitted the importance of such a clause, which he said would assist the landlords, and would be welcomed by the Government. The Member for South Tyrone said to-day that the chief reason why he thought the clause would not be operative was that the Land Commission would not sanction the transaction. He never said anything like that last year. He dealt with an objection which has been found fatal—and it is this, that the landlords will obstruct its working. The hon. Member said—

"The objection is not a practical one, because the landlords would be as anxious to come to terms as the tenants."

But, Sir, this clause has failed, because the hon. Member for South Tyrone was entirely wrong in his estimate of the landlords. The hon. Member said he knew one landlord who had refused to act under Clause 13. I said I knew 300. I spoke by the card; I had their names in my pocket. There was established in Cork an Evicted Tenants' Union, which was independent of any political Party, and in no way connected with the Plan of Campaign estates. It was an organisation called into being for the purpose of endeavouring to get a large number of the tenants evicted in recent years back into their homes. Last September this Association issued a circular to all the landlords in the neighbourhood from whose estates tenants had been evicted. The circular was sent out broadcast to all the landlords who had evicted their tenants in the neighbourhood; but out of the whole number there was only one case in which a settlement was brought about, every other case having been obstructed by the refusal of the landlord either to take notice of the circular at all, or to enter into negotiations. I submit that this establishes the point I have risen to make—namely, that this clause has failed owing to the fact that the landlords obstructed the working of Clause 13 of the Act of last year. It has expired, and the first clause of our Bill proposes that the time for its operation should be extended. The hon. Member for Tyrone is in favour of extending the time; but suaded the House to discriminate between tenants evicted under the Plan of Campaign as against tenants who have fulfilled their lawful obligations. The Plan of Campaign tenants may be taken as of one type, the Ulster tenants as another; and whilst the tenants of Ulster anxiously wished for compulsory powers of land purchase—which for weighty reasons of State this House refused—it is seriously proposed by the hon. Gentleman that we should give to the Plan of Campaign tenants that advantage that we refused to others. Not only that; not only would the hon. Member give these tenants the right of compulsory purchase, but he would give it to them because of their own mis-doings. Sir, of all the ways of promoting social order, I consider the last we should adopt would be the placing of a premium upon lawlessness and a penalty upon the splendid fulfilment of duty by private citizens. Sir, it is complained that in these Debates we traverse well-worn ground; but we have either to meet ancient arguments or allow the case against us to go by default. The hon. Member for West Belfast, following the hon. Member for East Mayo, stated it as a matter which admitted of no doubt that if Mr. Parnell's Arrears Bill of 1886 had been accepted by this House there would have been no Plan of Campaign. The answer to that has been repeated ad nauseum—namely, that Mr. Parnell's Bill would not have affected those tenants who did not pay their rents in 1876. The Bill of 1887 gave them what they had a right to receive. Another point is that Mr. Parnell's Bill only dealt with judicial tenants, and that the tenants affected by the Plan of Campaign were not judicial tenants. On the Ponsonby estate, for example, and it will be universally admitted to be a typical estate—out of 250 tenants the number of judicial tenants was only 27. Therefore, Sir, I say that 90 per cent. of the tenantry would have been excluded from the benefit even under Mr. Parnell's Bill. That being so, I think my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Mid Armagh gave an explanation and mentioned the sufficient cause giving rise to the Plan of Campaign. The reasons given by hon. Members opposite are altogether inadequate, but if reference be made to the outside speeches made by hon. Members in the past, I venture to think the true origin will be found. My hon. Friend quoted from a speech said to have been made by the Member for Waterford at the Chicago Convention. I have also seen in the Enniscorthy Guardian of November, 1886, a speech of the hon. Member for Waterford, and this is what he is reported to have said:—

"Home Rule was defeated at the last election, and I say, advisedly, in the face of the defeat, that if the Tories had been able to govern Ireland by the ordinary law the cause of Home Rule would be thrown back for a generation."

When the Home Rule Bill was introduced by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian, he rested his case upon the social condition of Ireland, saying that there were only two alternatives—we must either yield to the demands of the Irish Representatives, or go in for a system of coercion such as was never known before. To make that good, the Home Rule Bill not having passed, it was obligatory upon hon. Gentlemen opposite to force upon us a policy of coercion. That was the simple explanation, and not the rejection of the Bill of Mr. Parnell, which could not have affected the object it was intended to serve. Sir, we have all heard of an original mode of warfare—namely, wounding the soldiers on their own side in order to excite the compassion of the enemy. When the compassion of their opponents had been excited, steps were taken to relieve the victims of the Plan of Campaign. On behalf of the victims in Tipperary, appeals were made in the Press. They denounced the Plan of Campaign, and appealed for alms to relieve them. A letter appeared in the Irish Times in which a woman named Eliza O'Connor stated that she had applied to Father Humphreys for assistance, and that the reply of Father Humphreys was that he would not degrade the noble warfare against Smith-Barry and landlordism by establishing a system of outdoor relief. If Father Humphreys would not do that, why should this House use its power to relieve those persons to the detriment of the law-abiding tenants of Ireland? If this House were to divide, not upon the question of the poetic justice which hon. Members opposite desire to mete out to landlords, but on the comparative merits of the tenants of Ulster and the tenants which the hon. Members have misguided, there would be very little doubt about the vote the House would give this afternoon.

(4.52.) MR. J. REDMOND (Waterford): Sir, the speech to which we have just listened might have been made by any hon. Gentleman who had not heard one single word of the Debate upon this Bill. It has expired, and the first clause of our Bill proposes that the time for its operation should be extended. The hon. Member for Tyrone is in favour of extending the time; but let him and those who think with him be logical, and if they think it is a good clause, let them agree to amend it so as to make it workable. The only Amendment which can do so is one which will apply compulsion in those cases where the landlords stand on their strict rights, and refuse to make terms with their tenants. Here is a clear and definite point at issue. You passed that clause, admitting it to be important; it has been inoperative, and we ask you to remove the defect which has been discovered in it, and enact it in such a form that it will work. If you do so, we may hope in the near future that in Ireland peace will be re-established on those estates, and the result will be to smooth the path of Government in Ireland, and hasten the arrival of the day when we may see the tenantry of Ireland contented and peaceful in their homes.

*(5.6.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): I had hoped this Debate would not have closed without some expression of opinion, from some occupant of the front Opposition Bench, on the measure now before this House.

MR. JOHN MORLEY: The right hon. Member for Bradford has spoken.

*MR. MADDEN: I am aware of that, but what I complain of is that the right hon. Member for Bradford, when he spoke, gave the House no expression of opinion upon the merits of the Bill.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I spoke on the Second Reading of the Bill, and I said matters of detail could be dealt with afterwards.

*MR. MADDEN: That is precisely the point of my complaint. The right hon. Gentleman said he would vote for the Second Reading of the Bill, because the only principle it established was, at all events, that some new step should be taken to settle this question. Is the right hon. Member aware of the principles contained in this Bill, and which would be affirmed by voting for its Second Reading? It establishes, in the first place, the principle of compulsory sale in favour of one class of tenants only. I admit that the question of compulsory sale may fairly be discussed on its merits with reference to the tenantry of Ireland as a whole; but when it is brought forward, let this be done with an appreciation of its full consequences, and with some practical suggestion as to the source from which the necessary money is to come. But the objections to the Bill are far greater and deeper than that. It not only establishes compulsory sale, but its essence is that that principle should only be called into operation in aid of evicted tenants. The 4th clause of the Bill is one of the most remarkable ever submitted to the consideration of any Legislative Assembly. It provides that after the lapse of any number of years, even if the evicted tenant is dead, he or his representative may come to the Court and simply say—"I, or the man I represent, was evicted, and therefore I have a right to the land, and ask to be put in possession of it." The Bill draws no distinction between just and unjust evictions, and the mere fact of eviction is a test of the man's right to repossession. And that is not all. The landlord may have let the land, and the occupying tenant may have been for years in possession of it; yet there is no recognition of his right, and he is to be hustled out of possession, and if he does not go he is to be sent to gaol. In the 4th clause, what is called a vesting order is to be made in favour of the evicted tenant, and that may be put in force by attachment against anybody. When the hon. Member for Tyrone pointed out that this would apply even if the substituted tenant had purchased his holding under the Land Purchase Acts, hon. Members opposite seemed to be somewhat startled by it, and they said, "Oh, no! If the new tenant has bought he will not be disturbed." In this they were mistaken. The Member for the North Division of Dublin said that the clause might be incorrectly framed, but for the purpose of its framers it could not have been better drawn. But what I cannot understand is why hon. Members opposite should admit the injustice of disturbing the new tenant who has bought under the Purchase Acts, while there is no hardship in turning adrift the tenant who has not purchased, although he may have been for years in occupation, and may have invested his capital in the improvement of his holding. This is a short outline of the Bill, and I do not wonder that on the opposite side the discussion should have wandered somewhat far from its provisions. At the same time, I think the evicted tenants in Ireland will derive but small comfort from a study of this Debate, and from the attitude of the Front Opposition Bench. The right hon. Member for Bradford tells us that he votes for the Second Reading simply because he thinks some new steps should be taken. The hon. Member for Waterford speaks of this proposal as if it were a sort of continuation and practical application of the policy of the Government, as embodied in the Land Purchase Bill of last year, and he referred to a statement of my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary, that it is desirable, by a legitimate arrangement between parties, that these disputes should be brought to an end. Everybody must re-echo that sentiment, and that is the underlying principle of the 13th clause of the Act of last year. It does no injustice to any person, and does not touch any tenant occupying a holding. But this measure is founded in injustice, both to landlords and outgoing tenants, while it proposes a partial law in favour of the class of tenants in Ireland which least deserves the consideration of the House.

(5.20.) SIR G. T R E V E L Y A N (Glasgow, Bridgeton): I am much obliged to the right hon. Gentleman for leaving me time, before the Division, to answer his questions. From this Bench we support this Bill for the reasons that we gave last Session for supporting, first, the 13th clause of the Purchase Bill, and afterwards the Amendments that were moved to that clause by Gentlemen below the Gangway. This Bill embodies those Amendments, and the gist of it is the 3rd clause. The hon. Member for Dover and the hon. Member for South Tyrone tell us that we put the bad tenants, who have not paid their rents and who have broken the law, in an advantageous position as compared to the tenants who have obeyed the law, by giving them compulsory purchase. As I read the Bill you do no such thing. What the clause does is not to give compulsory purchase without an alternative, and that alternative is that if the landlord is not willing to make use of the 13th section of the Purchase Act, then the tenants who suffer by his unwillingness shall be put, not in a better position than other tenants, but in the same position of being allowed to be farmers under a fair rent. We say that this is the only method by which you can settle the Irish difficulty. To-day we have gone back from the point of conciliation to which the House had, as a whole, advanced. In the Debates on the 13th clause of the Act of last year, the Government and the whole House adopted a conciliatory and pacific tone, and ceased to talk of the rights and wrongs of the Plan of Campaign, and only talked of how the miseries which resulted from that Plan, as fought on both sides, should be healed. But that has not been the tone of some Gentlemen who have spoken in this Debate; but it is still the intention of hon. Gentlemen who sit beside me on this Bench. We wish to heal these wounds of Ireland, and we believe that this Bill will do so. I have defended the 3rd clause, which merely makes compulsory, under the penalty of having to give a fair rent, that power which was voluntary in the Purchase Bill. The Attorney General for Ireland sees something wonderful in it; but is it not the case, Session after Session, when we find that the voluntary principle will not work, that we make it compulsory? As to the denunciation of the 4th clause by the right hon. and learned Gentleman, you would think that nothing had passed in this House before on the question of the "planter" tenants. But last year we asked the Government to allow these tenants to be bought out under the Irish Church Fund, and on this Bench we are still anxious that means should be adopted for buying them out. We do not wish anything to be done which is harsh or unjust towards them; but we ask that these five or six thousand evicted tenants, instead of being punished to the end of time—and recollect that they have already been transported from their homes for three or four years, which would be a legal punishment almost sufficient for any fault they might have committed, whatever it was—shall have hope given them of being restored to their homes, and of becoming again peaceable and contented citizens. We say that the Purchase Act has not fulfilled one of its main objects, that of pacifying Ireland; but that this Bill, amended as it will be if it passes the Second Reading, will do justice to the landlord and justice to the planter tenants, and give some hope of mercy and salvation to these five or six thousand evicted men, without mercy and kindness to whom you will never pacify Ireland.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I have not had the opportunity of consulting the Irish Local Government Board upon this Bill. ## HOUSE OF LORDS,

CLERGY DISCIPLINE (IMMORALITY)

BILL.—[H.L.]

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

*THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY: My Lords, I feel myself to be in a rather unusual position in moving a Bill which has been, to my great satisfaction and thankfulness, included and mentioned in Her Majesty's Gracious Speech; but my only desire is that this Bill should be passed, and therefore I am ready to take any part which I possibly can towards that end. I only wish that it had the benefit of one advocacy. Archbishop Magee, whose position here for so many years was so high, whose eloquence, wit, and common sense so recommended any measure which he advocated, and who commanded such influence everywhere outside this House, among the laity of the country as well as among the clergy, was not among the actual framers of this Bill, but he was a very enthusiastic advocate of it; his last great speech was devoted to explaining to the Bishops and clergy of his province the provisions of this Bill and to advocating them. My Lords, it is the same Bill as he then advocated, except in one point to which I shall call attention. Although it is much reduced in bulk, it is only compressed, and compressed in a very simple manner; the wording here and there has been abbreviated; but the large clauses, which, for the sake of fulness, were printed in the Bill as it came before your Lordships on the last occasion, taken out of previous Acts of Parliament, have been placed together in a Schedule at the end. My Lords, the one point which is added to the Bill I shall dwell on at length, and I will say, in the first instance, that it was not advocated but disliked by Archbishop Magee. He objected to it on the ground that it made too little of the office of a Bishop. Another high authority objects to it on the ground that it makes too much of the office of a Bishop. It is not for me to decide which of the authorities is the higher; but to me it causes a certain amount of satisfaction that the objections mutually destroy each other; and I do not think there is much fault to be found with the provision, as a just mean between the two. Indeed, my Lords, though Archbishop Magee's advocacy would have been so powerful and so impressive, I cannot believe that this Bill really needs any advocacy. It has been prepared through some years by a Committee on which were good enough to sit some of the strongest, wisest, and most experienced Members of this House, both in the Church and the State. It passed through the Standing Committee, where it received a careful examination; it passed your Lordships' House; and Mr. Smith, that wise and sound statesman, whom we lost so immediately after the Archbishop, had undertaken to pass it through the House of Commons; and, indeed, it only perished on one of the very last days of the Session with other victims, and unexpectedly. I would remind your Lordships that this Bill deals with morals only; that it has no relation to doctrine or to ritual; it is simply confined to cases of clerical immorality. The necessity of such a Bill lies in small compass. If a layman of influence in a parish is a licentious man, his influence of course is extremely mischievous; his example is followed by the young and foolish over whom he has influence—he discredits his position. But, if the offender is the one man in the place who is commissioned, and supported by law, to be the guide and the teacher and the comforter of the young, the sick, the dying and the poor; if he is the counsellor of many; if he is placed there to be the expounder of Divine Revelation and the minister of Holy Sacraments and there is no other man who can be recognised by the Church there; then how fares it with the people if he is drunken, if he is profligate or a seducer? We know the visible signs—there is the empty Church; but there are worse invisible signs,—the lack of his influence in regions which are not before the public eye is almost more terrible than the emptiness of the Church in which men ought to be worshipping God and learning His ways; the sick are unwilling to send for him; the parsonage house, which ought to be the centre of so much that is good, is suspected, is shunned, is pointed at; the man himself is conscious that he has no message to deliver but what would reproach his own actions: that he has no mission because he is the parishioner who most of all needs to be reclaimed. But, my Lords, the law, which surrounds the good pastor and keeps him in his place, and so supports him and confers on the country such vast benefits by that support,—this law virtually offers no means by which a traitor can be got rid of. And the reason why it offers no means is a singular reason. It is a long sad history. It begins in an old wrong theory. It began in the theory that the man, as priest, was an essential intermediary between God and man; that good morals were a most desirable and necessary addition but not essential to his office among his people. Consequently the first processes instituted, in order to put an end if possible to scandals, were instituted upon what we cannot but in this day call a most wrong basis. Processes instituted against such a man were held to be pro salute animæ; it was not the parish or the people that were in view; it was the improvement of the priest that was intended. And when legislation started from so wrong and so mistaken a base, then there came in a steady constant accumulation of precedents of leniency, and even favour, which have landed us in this position: namely, that really and truly there is no means certainly available of getting rid of an evil pastor. Consequently, you have certain scandals not arising frequently, but from time to time, and echoed all round the sky until it seems as if the air was full of them. Such a case as that which occurred in a diocese a little north of this, last year or the year before, when a man, guilty of repeated acts of drunkenness, has at last evidence produced against him, is brought into the Arches Court and receives a sentence of three months' suspension. At the end of three months he comes back, and the first sermon that he preaches is a lively description of the holiday that he has enjoyed abroad. And there is the case well known to your Lordships and to all England, that infamous case which cost two successive Bishops of Exeter £14,000 and £1,400 respectively. Now, my Lords, so much has been said on this subject before that I will not amplify this part of the matter, but will call your Lordships' attention at once to the change that has been made in the Bill. In the last Bill the conviction of certain crimes and misdemeanours enumerated in Clause 1, as well as conviction of treason or felony, vacated the living ipso facto. The law before was that cases of treason and felony brought home should vacate the living ipso facto, and there were added to these certain new offences which should ipso facto vacate a living. Well, my Lords, we have found that very wide objections indeed have been entertained to these additions to the ipso facto-principle of vacating among people of all sorts of opinions. There is this to be said obviously at once: that it is a strange thing that a property, and still more a spiritual function, should be vacated by the sentence of a Magistrate who has no relation whatever to a benefice, and who in his sentence can take no notice at all of the effect which it will have in the deprivation of the benefice. It is not well that there should be no notice taken of the sentence; it is well that it should be made known as widely as possible. A clergyman, we must remember, is necessarily in his position as a beneficed man in two capacities. He is the holder of property by the authority of the law, and he has a spiritual work and duty—what is called the cure of souls of the parishioners—committed to him by his Bishop. Now when the patron has presented a man to a benefice, so that the property will come to him, the Bishop is then required by law to institute him to the spiritual care of the benefice, upon the presentation of the patron; and it does seem reasonable that he should also be similarly required to declare that the living is vacated, before he proceeds to institute another man into the same place. It is different, of course, in the case of death; there is no necessity for a declaration upon that occasion—the fact is notorious that the late rector is dead. Well, then, Clause 1 enumerates two kinds of gross offences. It first of all mentions those which already ipso facto vacate the living, and then the other class which at present do not ipso facto vacate the living, but ought to be made to do so. We have in this Bill made no change whatever as to the first class. Treason and felony will still, according to this Bill, vacate a living exactly in the same manner as they do now, and the benefice can be immediately re-filled. We do not repeal the Treason and Felony Act, or any clause or any word of it. But the Bill does lay upon the Bishop the further duty then of declaring that it is vacant, before he proceeds to institute another man. The declaration of the Bishop in this case has nothing whatever to do with vacating the living—it is vacant, and, if it is so wished, a man can be instituted to it; but the Bishop is to be called upon to declare it vacant before he proceeds to put another man into the place. And the man by this Bill is also rendered incapable of receiving further preferment, which seems the most just of measures, until he is either pardoned by the Crown, or until he is otherwise declared once more capable of receiving preferment. That is the first class of offences. The second class of misdemeanours is recited in the first clause, and I will venture to say that the world at large, reasonable sensible people being judges—nay, vicious men themselves being judges, there can be no doubt that everyone would agree that the man who commits such offences is disqualified from being the pastor of a flock, disqualified from exercising this cure of souls, and there ought to be no difficulty in removing him from that pastorate and that cure. But, my Lords, as the law stands now the offence may be proved, the man may be convicted, the man may be sentenced, and yet he is safe in this position to all intents and purposes; he has to be again tried from beginning to end before he can be displaced; and he has to be tried by processes which are expensive and complicated, technical and uncertain, in the very highest degree; he can appeal, and appeal again, until the expense, protract-tion, and uncertainty of the suits into which he may bring the authority who tries to do his duty by him and the Church, may absolutely win the day. Now the effect of this Bill then is to make civil conviction for these offences conclusive as to the fact of their having been committed; and the Bill then provides that the Ecclesiastical Authorities should accept the verdict as a fact, and that they should declare the vacancy of the living. Now this, my Lords, is the point upon which there is difference of opinion; but, as I said, the difference of opinion is this: it is not simply one difference of opinion with the Bill, but on one side it is thought that the office of the Bishop is made too little of, by requiring him simply to declare that the living is vacant when vacated in this manner; and, on the other hand, it is thought that it is making too much of the office of the Bishop by bringing him in at all. I do not really think that, those being the two poles of difference, your Lordships will differ from the Bill. I believe your Lordships will consider that the Bishop is in his proper place and too much by no means made of his office. If once this Bill passes into law, the first effect of it will be that there will be no longer this wearisome and most uncertain process to go through. Those are the two classes of offences proposed to be dealt with: those which already vacate livings, and those which ought to vacate livings; and this the simple step which is to be taken. At present, my Lords, it is the authorities who attempt to do their duty who are punished and not the offender—the offender is pretty secure. What with time, with expensiveness, with technicality, men are, as well as have been, secure in their place. There they stay, safe, to old age; and in that old age the hoary head is not only a crown of shame to that man, but it is a crown of shame to that Church which cannot help keeping him in his place. I repeat once more, what I have said emphatically in this place before, my Lords, that these cases are very few. I doubt if you could find anywhere a body of 26,000 men among whom there are so few offenders of this kind—I think that is quite certain. The cases are few, but there ought to be none. The cases are few, but every single case counteracts. I do not know what amount of labour of excellent, virtuous, and devoted pastors. And, my Lords, how unfair such administration and how unfair such a state of things upon a great profession which we ought to render attractive! What would be said, my Lords, if in any other profession—if in the Army or the Navy, superior officers had not only to defray the cost of every inquiry, but to find themselves baffled and defeated by technicalities at the close? What would be said if the Judges (many Judges are noble Lords in this House at the present moment) what would be said by all the world if the Judges had to bear all the costs of both sides whenever an attempt was made to remove a criminal from office? The rest of the Bill, my Lords, after the 1st clause is occupied simply by procedure; no principles are changed, but it is a simplification of the procedure for the trial of a man accused of moral offences who has not been in the Civil Court. The case of a man who has been in a Civil Court is already disposed of; but then there are other cases where a man has not been in the Civil Court. The improvements or simplification of procedure are these: The Diocesan Court remains, and the improvements are in three obvious points. First, the Diocesan Court is strengthened by five Assessors who are to act as a kind of jury on matters of fact—not a jury, which might make difficulties in the way of appeal—five Assessors; the Chancellor, the head of the Court, is a layman; two of his Assessors are to be Judges or Justices of the Peace, holders of judicial appointments, laymen; and three are to be clergymen. They are to decide upon matters of fact only; not to deal with matters of law. That is the first improvement. The second improvement is that there should be only one appeal; these are not cases which need more than one appeal, if any; but it is desirable, as error is always possible, that the man should have power to appeal, and, with the proper permission, one appeal is allowed, but only one. At present, as I have said, the number of appeals is one of the worst causes of the defeat of justice. The third improvement introduced is this—and your Lordships will agree with me I am sure that it is the greatest possible improvement. I have pointed out how fatal the old precedents of punishment are and in what evil condition they have landed us, and the 5th clause of the Bill provides that henceforth the decisions are to be made in the interests of the place and people, and not to rest upon precedents of punishment. In the process of abbreviation the words "rather than on the precedents of punishment" have been dropped out, simply for the purposes of abbreviation; and I shall ask your Lordships' leave to introduce them again by way of amendment. But that is what the clause means as it stands—that regard is to be had to the interests of the people. There is another point to which I desire to call your Lordships' attention. In order that it might be thoroughly intelligible to all, even the most obviously essential steps of the processes were described in separate clauses in the Bill as it was before your Lordships' House last year; but, by very wise instructions, as it seems to me, from Her Majesty's Government, such steps as those are to be committed to the Rule Committee. All these steps that have been placed under the ordering of the Rule Committee are so placed for reasons which have commended themselves to the Legal Advisers of the Government; but I need scarcely say that, if there are any such steps which it is thought, in the wisdom of this House, should be replaced as clauses in the Bill, that can easily be done in Committee, and we shall be only very thankful for suggestions of that kind. I would remind your Lordships that when the rules are made they have to lie 40 days on the Table of both Houses, and that any Rule is capable of being annulled by an Address to Her Majesty praying that it should be so annulled. Well, my Lords, the Bill seems then, in the light in which I am able to view it,—its necessity and its provisions—so just, so reasonable, to answer so necessary an end by such simple means, that one asks oneself who are the opponents of the Bill. My Lords, there are enemies and enemies. I shall speak with the utmost moderation, I hope, of any opposition to the Bill; but there are honourable adversaries of the Church, very decided adversaries but fair and honourable men, who, in the other House, and in other places, have declared emphatically that the Bill ought to pass. If there are any others who have different motives; if there are any who would keep abuses in the Church to forward their own views of what ought to be done with the Church; what a serious position they stand in! They cry out one moment "Souls are perishing because of neglect"; and the next moment they cry out "Let them perish until we can carry destructive measures of our own." If there be any such opponents, we can but trust that they will pause. At any rate, the very existence of such a reason puts an end to the influence that any other reasons which they might allege could produce. And I trust that no professed Churchmen will swell their number on grounds which are not much more than matters of etiquette. I do not then believe, my Lords, that any Legislature would withhold legislation upon such a subject for such a purpose, —still less these two great Houses: legislation recommended, as this is, by some of our very wisest both in Church and State: simple legislation I must call it, for the removal of vicious men from positions which have been created for one purpose and one purpose only: to be the very strongholds and vantage grounds of virtue.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>d</sup>."
—(The Archbishop of Canterbury.)

*LORD GRIMTHORPE: My Lords, I certainly am not one of the enemies of the Bill, though it is not the Bill which your Lordships passed last year, and I cannot say that I am at all convinced by the reasons given by the most rev. Prelate for altering that Bill, by the Government, and not by the Bishops. Perhaps your Lordships will allow me to remind you of the course that these Clergy Discipline Bills have taken during the last four years. This Bill, in a very important respect which I shall mention presently, is put back very much to the condition of the Bill of 1888; of which it is not too much to say that the late Archbishop of York, I mean Archbishop Thomson, destroyed it by his speech on Third Reading. Complaint was made of his not intervening earlier. He answered that complaint by saying that he had not intervened for the very good reason that he had not received the altered copy of the Bill at York until the very day when it was to be discussed here. Everybody felt, I think, that his speech on Third Reading, although neither he nor I divided the House against it, was fatal to the Bill. What happened next after that is not altogether immaterial. The most rev. Prelate has rightly mentioned Archbishop Magee as having taken an active part in this matter from the beginning. In the course of the winter of 1888, he and a Member of the Government, knowing I had begun the opposition to the Bill of 1888, asked me to draw a fresh one. I said, "It is no use my drawing a fresh Bill if you are going to insist upon its being upon what is commonly called the lines of the late Bill, if it is to contain what I and other people call clerical aggression." I was assured by both of them, and by the most rev. Prelate who has now spoken, afterwards, that they had no such wish or intention, and that, if the Bill of 1888 did do what I said, it was not by their desire. Of course I was satisfied with that, and I did draw another Bill. I took counsel with two most competent persons, namely, the gentleman who then sealed with seven seals (I mean Mr. Justice Jeune, who was Chancellor of seven dioceses) and with Archbishop Magee himself; we spent a considerable time in settling that Bill; and without repeating the compliments the most rev. Prelate has paid to Archbishop Magee, I will pay another: I was greatly struck not merely with his acuteness (because everybody knew that) but with his readiness to apprehend legal principles, and being able to discuss a Bill with two lawyers on quite equal terms. It was too late, I suppose, in the winter to proceed with it in the following year; at any rate it was not proceeded with; but I know this: Archbishop Thomson expressed the opinion that the Bill of 1888, or anything like it, would not do, and that something like the Bill which had been settled by the three persons I have mentioned was the basis to go upon. Early in the following year, as the most rev. Prelate told your Lordships last year, he convened a sort of Lambeth Congress, or Conference, or Conclave (or whatever is the proper term) consisting of the two Archbishops, the Bishop of London, my noble and learned Friend opposite, Lord Selborne, another of my noble and learned Friends, Lord Herschell, Lord Thring, Lord Cross, who had taken an active part in 1888, Mr. Justice Jeune, and myself. And this singular thing happened: although several of those persons had taken very different views in 1888, when we came to discuss the Bill in 1890 there was absolutely no division, except upon one comparatively trifling point, as the most rev. Prelate mentioned last year, and the one dissentient, Archbishop Thomson, did not think it worth while to express any further opinion about it; and, what is more, Archbishop Magee, who had succeeded him before the Bill came into Parliament in the following year, was perfectly satisfied with the Bill as it had been drawn, and vindicated it in the way the most rev. Prelate has mentioned, and indeed more strongly than he has stated, on what I and others think the most important deviation now. My Lords, the most rev. Prelate has said that he will move an Amendment to restore certain words in the section which we all thought of great value at Lambeth. I am very glad that he will, and I need not say more about it. The other point, about procedure, is a more serious thing than the most rev. Prelate seems to take it to be. To put it shortly, I may say that the Bill of this year gives very much larger powers to what is called the Rule Committee than the Bill of last year did. It enables the Rule Committee, which is to consist of the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Chief Justice, the Dean of Arches, and the three Privy Councillor Bishops, to make any rules they please relating to "procedure"—a very large word which was not in the Bill of last year. Then come some other points in that clause which I need not dwell upon, as they are not very material, except that it includes, quite unnecessarily, the appointment of a Deputy Chancellor, which was provided for completely by a very simple clause last year. Then comes a thing which I know is thought of much consequence by more learned people than I am, and that is that the Rule Committee may make rules "concerning the enforcing of sentences, whether by civil or ecclesiastical officers." It seems to me perfectly clear that under those terms together, "procedure" and "enforcing of sentences," any kind of jurisdiction may be invented. No doubt it is a good thing to save both Houses of Parliament the trouble of discussing details which are of no public consequence or interest, and which can be quite well done by a small Committee; but, surely, such matters as procedure, and enforcing of sentences by certain officers, which were the great questions in 1888, do seem a great deal too large to leave to a mere general clause, protected by nothing but the subsection which follows, that the rules are to be laid on the Table of the Houses of Parliament, and take their chance of somebody being able to get a night in this House or the other to discuss them if he has any objection to them. Moreover, the result will be that nobody can learn from the Act what it really enacts, or what influences are being used to get particular things enacted by that Secret Committee. My Lords, I am told that, tempting as it is to remove from discussion in both Houses of Parliament details which some people may think immaterial, there is another view of it—that certain people resent very much that mode of withdrawing things from their discussion and decision which they think of great consequence; and I cannot help thinking that, in avoiding Charybdis, the Government (who, I suppose, are the promoters of this Bill) have run into a Scylla which may perhaps bring them to ruin if other things do not. That is all I have to remark upon the minor details of the Bill; I mention them first merely to get them out of the way. Now, my Lords, I come to that which the most rev. Prelate rightly treated as a material alteration, and there I must first dissent from the view that he takes of the 1st clause. He said—and no doubt he intended that it should be so—that the present law was left alone, and that—

"If a clergyman is convicted of treason or felony"—

I stop there—his conviction ipso facto deprives him. But, I think, if the most rev. Prelate will read carefully a little lower down, he will see that it is not so. I will read it to your Lordships, leaving out the immaterial things—

"If a clergyman is convicted of treason or felony . . . then, after the date at which the conviction, order, or finding becomes conclusive, the preferment (if any) held by him shall without further trial be"— what? "Shall be vacant"? Nothing of the kind—

"shall be declared by the Bishop to be vacant."

That is a total alteration of the law of England. Whether it is the intention of anyone I cannot tell, but if it is, it is, at anyrate, very badly expressed, and certainly will in future years be demanded to involve an alteration of a great deal of the existing law. Because I can tell your Lordships, to put it shortly, that there have been at different times since the Reformation more than a dozen enactments (I do not say Acts of Parliament, because one or two of them comprise several distinct enactments), all of which, as Archbishop Magee pointed out to his Convocation—and I am surprised that the most rev. Prelate has not paid more attention to that speech—ipso facto do vacate livings for all kinds of things—some of them doctrinal things; and, surely, if a doctrinal or ritualistic error may vacate a living ipso facto, immorality ought to do so. I will just run through them as shortly as possible. First, the earliest Reformation Acts of Henry VIII. and Elizabeth expressly "restored" all spiritual jurisdiction to the Crown. All the four Acts of Uniformity enabled clergymen to be deprived, without the intervention of the Bishop, either by a Judge at Assizes, or by the Chancellor of the diocese; and it is expressly stated in the Act of Elizabeth that the law to be observed is not the canon law, which I shall have to mention presently, but "the Queen's ecclesiastical law"—a well-known old phrase used by the greatest lawyers of all times since the Reformation. Then comes perhaps one still more remarkable—what is called the Great Heresy Act of the 13th of Elizabeth, which expressly leaves to the Ordinary, who is the Chancellor of the diocese generally, the power to deprive, which he always had and always exercised. Besides that, the same Act, without any relation to heresy, ipso facto vacates a living if the clergyman does not read himself in in proper time,—that is, publicly declare his assent to the Prayer Book and the Articles. No Bishop intervenes there; no Court intervenes; simply if he does not do it in the proper time anybody may take note (it has been so decided) and the living is ipso facto vacant. All that will soon be demanded to be repealed if this Bill passes. Then there is the very important Act of 1870, which the first clause of this extends in the confused way I noticed just now. As the most rev. Prelate mentioned last year, the old law before 1870 was that treason and felony ipso facto forfeited a living. The word "forfeiture" was used, not "vacation," but the result is exactly the same. Then to come to later things, take the 1st and 2nd of Victoria c. 106—a very long Act which provides for many different things. If a clergyman engages in trade or takes a farm above 100 acres he may be prosecuted in the Chancellor's Court by the Bishop—the Bishop being not the judge, but the prosecutor; and the Chancellor is to suspend him first and deprive him afterwards. I know very well that the word "Chancellor" is not put before "deprive" in the latter case; but that cannot matter the least, because, as I say, the Bishop is the prosecutor and not the judge. The same Act deals with pluralities. If a clergyman happens to have two livings or benefices of any kind, and takes another without declaring which of the former ones he vacates, he ipso facto vacates both. If he is instituted to a living without any right to hold two, the institution ipso facto vacates the former. Non-residence after a certain time, after two years' sequestration, under the same Act ipso facto vacates the living. Surely that is a thing in which you might expect to find the Bishop having this jurisdiction, if anywhere. But no, the law has not entrusted it to him: this modern theory had not been invented then, or in fact until four years ago. Then comes the Act with which it is now the fashion I see with all parties to find fault—the Clergy Discipline Act of 1840. That was Bishop Philpott's Act; he imposed it upon the Bishops and upon Parliament after having been thoroughly beaten in the previous Session. The only precedent for Episcopal Judges was the Court of High Commission, which your Lordships know was twice abolished by Parliament. Under a clause in that Act of 1840 the Bishop may indeed sit and try, but he cannot declare without trying; and that clause was described in the Royal Commission on Ecclesiastical Courts as being thoroughly obsolete; it was found, for reasons which I need not go into, unworkable or unsuitable; and it was said, I do not know with what correctness, by some of the witnesses before that Commission, that it has only been acted on twice; except of course by consent, for anybody may consent to the Bishop trying, depriving, or anything else. Then comes in the order of date the Act of 1870, which Archbishop Magee naturally dwelt on much in his speech to his Convocation. And, my Lords, what has been the excuse made by the agitators against this Bill, who, in spite of what the most rev. Prelate has said, are mainly of one party in the Church, for the Act of 1870 being passed without objection or complaint till now? That it was not understood. I have taken the trouble to look at Hansard to see what evidence there was that it was not understood; and I find that it was fully and clearly explained on that point by perhaps the clearest explainer of an Act of Parliament that there has ever been. I mean Lord Westbury. Whatever may have been his defects, certainly want of clearness of explanation was not one of them; so that excuse is a mere ex post facto invention without the least historical foundation. And the real history is that in all the three and a half centuries since the Reformation began the personal intervention of a Bishop has never once been recognised as necessary for complete deprivation. It is just possible somebody may say that I have forgotten one declaration (I cannot call it an enactment, for it is not one) that the Bishop is to declare sentences of deprivation only in the 122nd Canon of 1603. To which I give this simple answer: that that Canon was illegal: it was first ultra vires. Convocation has no power whatever, as great authorities have said, to do anything relating to judicature; and, further than that, it is expressly illegal, because the great Act of Henry VIII., for the "Submission of the Clergy," under which any power was left to Convocation to make Canons, expressly says that if a Canon is contrary in any respect to the law of England, either present or future, it shall be void. It was also historically wrong. It is a doctrine that has been laid down in the Courts that, if a Canon is only declaratory of ancient law, it may stand as a recognition of the Queen's Ecclesiastical Law. That Canon could not be so, because it was contrary to all the previous Acts I have mentioned; and, moreover, a Canon had been made in 1571, saying exactly the contrary, though that code was never ratified by the Queen. Moreover, let me tell your Lordships that a person who is more a layman than a great many Diocesan Chancellors have been, has been held to have a complete right to deprive—I mean the Dean of Arches. So far as I can make out from the books that tell of such things, there has been no clerical Dean of Arches since 1559, but there have been many clerical Chancellors until recently. Then & fortiori, if the Dean of Arches has been decided—as he has been by the Privy Council—to have the right to deprive, that Canon, professing to take away the power of the Chancellors to deprive, was invalid and good for nothing. Let me call your Lordships' attention a little more to Archbishop Magee's great speech, as the most rev. Prelate rightly called it, which was mainly directed to this very question of deprivation. It is true, as the most rev. Prelate says, that he gave both reasons: both that it was making too much of the Bishop, and also too little. But that is not a dilemma, as the most rev. Prelate imagines, but a cumulation. Archbishop Magee said, in substance, "I resent the idea of being ordered to come into Court (and I remember that he used these words) as the executioner or crier of a Court to proclaim a judgment which I may differ from. I shall have read the proceedings in whatever Court has ordered the man to be deprived. The Chancellor, who may have proceeded under the rules of procedure which are to be made, or the Civil Court, may have decreed the deprivation; but I may think that the man ought not to be deprived. Am I to come in, thinking all that, and, as a mere machine, a mere crier of the Court, to declare him deprived when I think he ought not to be? That was Archbishop Magee's argument, not mine, though I had helped him with the legal history; and it seems to me a very good one. But I will carry it a little further. Supposing any Bishop says, on high spiritual grounds, "I do not choose to be ordered by the State to do this and that, which is no part of my regular spiritual duty," he would be doing a thing which would be most popular with the High Church Party, who have got up all this opposition. They are fond of saying, "Oh, we would obey the Bishops if they were free, but they are bound to act under the State law; and we decline to recognise that." It is easy enough to say that no Bishop would dare to retain a convicted clergyman. But he may think it a case for suspension and not deprivation, and then what are you to do? Are we to have Bishops mandamus and sent to prison if they will not obey? Everybody knows that will be impracticable. Then there was another point that Archbishop Magee took, which I confess had not occurred to me, though I see no answer to it. He said, "How is deprivation more of an episcopal or spiritual act than suspension? A man can be suspended by the Chancellor for five or ten years, or any time. What is the spiritual difference between that and deprivation?" Nobody in his lower House of Convocation, which voted against him, could answer that question. The fact is, my Lords, that this demand is only made as a first step towards getting more; and the sort of things that are wanted more we have the means of knowing; because a body of great importance, called the English Church Union, which seems to me to play very much the part of another very important Body at Rome—namely, the Jesuits,—I do not mean to call Church Unionists Jesuits in the popular sense; but it is said that the Jesuits are more powerful than the Pope; and it is quite plain that the English Church Union are more powerful than the Bishops and can frighten them—yes, can frighten them into accepting things which they would never have done voluntarily, and which they never thought of a year ago, or rather which they all agreed against. Just let me tell your Lordships one or two of the things that this important Body, which, by-the-bye, I see boasts of having 25 members of the Episcopate, not all English, I suppose, but still I believe some.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY: There is not one.

LORD GRIMTHORPE: I am glad to hear that; I know there was one.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY: He went out of it.

LORD GRIMTHORPE: It is a very powerful Body nevertheless. What have they proclaimed to mankind lately? "The power to govern the Church," they say, in a published series of 18 resolutions,

"resides by succession in the Episcopate acting synodically, and in other canonical manner, and in the Episcopate alone."

What is the power that they say belongs to the Bishops and to them alone?

"This power is not limited to doctrine, but embraces positive discipline." "The Church, by its own inherent authority, has power to make laws, to administer laws, and to enforce the observance of its laws in the spiritual domain: in other words, it possesses legislative, executive, and judicial powers."

Then they say—

"The law administered is the Canon Law."

Canon Law is Roman Law, composed of the decrees of Popes, which have been declared over and over again not.

to be the Ecclesiastical Law of England. Then they go on to say—that is to say, not by Parliament, but by the Canon Law, which is nothing at all. Then your Lordships will be interested to know perhaps how much rights you have as the State—

“Procedure, legislative and judicial, is expressly provided for by the Canon Law;”

“The State being jure divino the guardian of civil rights is by consequence bound, upon complaint made, to ascertain.”

What?

“Whether justice has been done to an incriminated clerk.”

That is, if the clerk is not satisfied with the decree of the Chancellor, or the Bishop it may be, he may go to the Civil Court; but if it is the other way the party on the other side may not appeal; which is flatly contrary to one of the fundamental Acts of the Reformation. Then further they say—

“The Statute Law touching ecclesiastical matters is ‘mere temporal’”

(a piece of bad English that they have copied from some ecclesiastical source)

“and consists only of rules laid down by the State for the conduct of the civil power in dealing with such temporal rights as come in contact with spiritual duties. Any so-called Ecclesiastical Court”

(that is to say, the Diocesan Court which this Bill, like former Acts, purposes to authorise to do certain things)

“constituted by Act of Parliament only, possesses no spiritual jurisdiction, and, consequently, all its proceedings are spiritually null and void.”

Your Lordships will remember that everything the Ecclesiastical Court may do under this Bill will be done under the State; and therefore it is expressly denounced by this English Church Union. Then there is a paragraph dealing with the particular thing in this Bill that they have been raving at, I may say, ever since your Lordships passed the Bill last year.

“None but a Bishop has power to suspend, deprive, or depose a clerk”— that is to say, all the laws of England that I have been reading to you are wrong and impudent aggressions on the Spirituality, as they call themselves. Then they say—

“No provision for pro facto voidance of an office or benefice can operate without the declaratory sentence of the Bishop in the Spiritual Court.”

Lord Grimthorpe

That is to say, that all that multitude of enactments that I have read to you are ultra vires and good for nothing. And then finally—

“Any scheme for the alteration or regulation of procedure in the matter of discipline must be embodied in Canons enacted by Convocation, and such action of Convocation should preclude any Parliamentary action needed to give civil sanction to the Canons.”

Now it is very easy, my Lords, to say that such things as those are only ridiculous, and that everybody laughs at them. What do they care about their being ridiculous if they get their way? It reminds one of the famous saying in one of Thackeray’s books: “What does it matter being called obtrusive provided only you obtrude?” That is what these people want. They do not care what they are called, if they can get their own way. But, if anybody is inclined to treat the English Church Union with ridicule—which I quite agree it deserves, while it deserves something more—there is something else that can hardly be ridiculed. I have had a publication sent to me—issued and signed by himself—a declaration by one of the oldest Bishops, a man who has hitherto passed for a man of sense, but who has got frightened; he has been making a sort of manifesto or declaration to his diocese, from which I must read your Lordships a few words, to show that it is not only the English Church Union that says things of this kind, but some of the Bishops are frightened into adopting them:

“Nor do I hesitate to agree with the principle that Resolutions of Convocation, expressive of approval of a Bill in Parliament on the subject of Church Discipline, cannot give real spiritual authority to such a Bill if it becomes law. If we are to adhere to real Church lines, Canons prescribing the due course of procedure must be enacted by Convocation, and Parliamentary sanction to such Canons subsequently obtained”; in other words, he has exactly adopted one of the resolutions that I read to you of the English Church Union. What comes next is worth attending to for another reason; it shows that all the Bishops, at any rate, do not feel so strongly the immediate necessity for this Bill as the most rev. Prelate does—

“That this will involve delay, and probably some difficulty and friction, must certainly be admitted.”

I read as far as that, and wanted to know how he was going to answer that point. This is the way—

"Still principles are principles"— with which I thoroughly agree, and it is a principle of the Constitution of England, and has been ever since the Reformation, that neither the Convocations nor any clerical body whatever have any power to meddle with these things. Then he ends by saying—

"I hope then in this matter we shall keep to the old highway."

My Lords, I venture to ask this question: Is a Bishop justified in telling more ignorant people than himself—I mean his clergy, who naturally take the law from him—that such and such things are principles of the law of England, and that those things are the old highway, when he could not walk three inches along the old highway in company with any lawyer, or law book, without seeing that every word he had been saying was wrong? He might just as well say that he had been into the street and performed a miracle. One statement would be no more true and no less true than the other. Yet this is the way in which, as I said, the English Church Union frightens even Bishops into saying exactly what they want them to say. They know it will be applauded by the dominant party of the clergy, and take their chance of its veracity being questioned. My Lords, I will not trouble you with anything more of that kind, though I could. But the most rev. Prelate, and a great many other people, he says, on both sides in the Church, are impressed with this: that, inasmuch as the institution to a living must be done by the Bishop, it is at any rate logical, though it is not the law of England, that deprivation must be done by the Bishop. But does the most rev. Prelate really think it is the law of England that institution must be done by the Bishop? I do not know whether he has altered the practice in the diocese of Canterbury—I have not looked at it lately;—but I have often read in the papers that the Vicar General of Canterbury had been admitting persons to their benefices; and he is the very person who, in most dioceses, would deprive them if the Bill were carried as it was passed last year. In Canterbury alone, I think, the Chancellor is not the Vicar General. Your Lordships may think that that is peculiar to Canterbury diocese; but I can show you in five minutes that it is not. First of all I look—and, surely, any Bishop might look—at such common books as Phillimore's Ecclesiastical Law, or Stephens's; and there they will find that it is part of the duty of the Vicar General to grant institutions; they will find a decision as long ago as the reign of Charles I that an institution by the Chancellor of St. David's, even with the wrong seal, was good: no Bishop invoked; and, what is more, no complaint made, by a man who clearly wanted to get rid of the institution, that the whole proceeding was irregular because the Bishop himself had not done it. But I can tell you something more; because, by good luck, the patents of all the Chancellors and Vicars General were printed by the Ecclesiastical Courts Commission; and I find that in no less than six dioceses, and, as it happens, three in each province, Canterbury, London, Durham, Carlisle, Worcester, Chester, the patents of the Vicars General expressly recognise—I say "expressly" for a reason that I will give presently—the duty of the Vicar General to grant institutions if the Bishop does not want to do it himself. But the notion now is that the Vicar General is incompetent to do it! I say that every law book you can read says he is competent to do it; and I say further that in the diocese of Canterbury the Archbishop generally does not do it, and in the other dioceses it is entirely optional with the Bishop whether he will do it or not. In some of the other patents it is left open; that is to say, the powers and duties of the Vicar General are declared to be what they have been in the time of their predecessors; and, inasmuch as you cannot have two laws about the same ancient office, you must look and find what the old law was, and then, whatever the Bishop may do or say in a particular place, the Vicar General has the old power; he is the judicial officer; he comes under the Acts which transferred all spiritual jurisdiction to the Crown; and the Bishop has no more power to diminish his duties or his rights than he has to increase them. Therefore, although some of the patents, in evidently modern words, except the power of institution, I say that the whole of this allegation is founded upon a mistake. It is an entire mistake to suppose that institution to a living cannot be given by anybody but a Bishop. In the case of a donative (and nobody knows how many they are) the Bishop does nothing. Moreover, my Lords, I can tell you a fact that will astonish many of you. Your Lordships probably, most of you, are under the impression that a man is made a Bishop of a See by the Archbishop of the Province. He is not. I ought to know, because I have had to read the Queen's mandate at a good many consecrations. The Archbishop is not ordered to consecrate him Bishop of any See ; he is ordered to consecrate him a Bishop. If he is translated from one See to another, or from no See at all to a Diocesan See in England, that is done entirely by the Crown : either by letters patent in the case of the new Bishoptrics where there are no Deans and Chapters ; or, if there is an election by the Dean and Chapter, it is done, as you know, under Congé d'élier ; but further (which perhaps everybody does not know) if there is any mistake, or neglect, in obeying the Congé d'élier, the Crown can do it at once by letters patent. It is only the Crown therefore that gives any episcopal jurisdiction at all. If that is the case in regard to Bishops, it is surely asking us to swallow a good deal to ask us to believe that the personal intervention of the Bishop is necessary for institution. And so ends the whole of this claim, which is notoriously and obviously put forward by the High Church party, and is totally unfounded. I alluded a little time ago to a much higher authority than myself upon the question of the rights of the two Convocations to interfere in matters of this kind, except by petitions to Parliament, like anybody else. I find that my noble and learned Friend opposite me (the Earl of Selborne) in 1874, and I think again in 1881, said (confirming Archbishop Tait) :—

"I am not aware of any single occasion on which any Statute of the Realm has been passed on Ecclesiastical Courts or their procedure, when there has been any concurrent action of Convocation."

My noble and learned Friend also used lately, in an important, though not exactly legal, body called the House of Laymen, of which he is Vice-Chairman, some very strong language about that very thing that I have been speaking of a little time ago—the English Church Union resolutions—however, I will not at this time of day stop to quote it. My noble and learned Friend is here, and he will recognise that I am correct. My Lords, not only he, but on more than one occasion Lord Cairns expressed very strong views against any recognition of Convocation, except in the one case in which I agree that they ought to be recognised—namely, the alteration of the services. When the Shortened Services Act, as it is popularly called, was passed, it was expressly referred by Her Majesty to Convocation—not to vote upon as a legislative body, but to report, as had been previously done by a Royal Commission. I do not question in the least the right of Convocation to petition either House of Parliament, or to report to Her Majesty when she desires them to do so. But I do entirely protest (to use my noble and learned Friends' language in substance) against their claiming any right to intervene in legislation. But, my Lords, I must also mention another person—not perhaps of so great legal weight as my noble and learned Friend, but of greater weight from other points of view—I mean the noble Marquess below me (the Marquess of Salisbury). In 1874, on the Public Worship Act, Convocation and the clergy generally protested against any interference by Parliament in far larger numbers than they have done at present. So they did on the Burials Bill of 1880—16,000 of them, besides the Convocations, protested, and you may see some of the threatening letters, as I may call them, which Archbishop Tait received, in his Life, which I suppose many of us have been reading lately. What said the noble Marquess in 1874?—and this is specially noticed, I see, in Archbishop Tait's Life. He said: "The claim of Convocation" (to interfere with a Bill of that kind) "is entirely new"; and either then, or on another occasion (for I cannot quite make out from the book which it was) he said, "I protest against the competency of Parliament to deal with Clergy Discipline being denied." How could you have a stronger declaration against the interference of Convocation than those of Lord Cairns, of my noble and learned Friend opposite, and I must add, of the noble Marquess? Yet the strange thing is that, after all that, it is Her Majesty's Government who have taken upon them to alter your Lordships' decision of last year, in which they concurred, and some of them actively, and to say, practically, to the laity of England, "You shall not have a Clergy Discipline Act unless you will consent to alter the law of England, and let the Bishop be the person to declare, or refuse to declare, a living vacant after the incumbent has been convicted and sentenced." My Lords, I shall not trouble myself to move Amendments to this Bill. If Her Majesty's Government choose to go to the country with this declaration that the Protestant Church laity of England shall not get rid of bad clergymen without consenting to this first step in clerical aggression, that is their look-out, and not mine.

*THE EARL OF SELBORNE: My Lords, my noble and learned Friend, in the speech which he has just addressed to your Lordships, has gone into topics of very wide range, of which I should be the last to deny the importance. He has said many things with which I agree; and some things with which perhaps I may not agree; but I do not think it necessary on this occasion to define either the limits of my agreement with him or the points upon which I may not agree; because it really does seem to me that nearly the whole of my noble and learned Friend's speech was not strictly relevant to the Bill which is now before your Lordships. (Hear, hear.) Certainly, if your Lordships ever had occasion to consider the pretensions advanced by the body, which has no public authority, to which my noble and learned Friend has referred, and whose recent manifesto he went into in some detail, I am afraid that with all the respect which I feel for some members of that body, I should be found very much in agreement with my noble and learned Friend as to those pretensions. (Hear, hear.) But I do not think there is anything in this Bill which gives encouragement to those pretensions, or which those who advance them could claim as originating with them—I am totally unable to find anything of that kind. The words of this Bill, upon which my noble and learned Friend has thought it necessary to make the interesting and large comments which your Lordships have heard, are simply these:—That when a temporal Court has pronounced a certain sentence in cases which the Act defines, the preferment, if any, held by the clergyman should, without further trial, be declared by the Bishop to be vacant, as from the date at which the conviction becomes conclusive. Now there are two classes of cases dealt with uno statu by these words. One, as my noble and learned Friend has said, has been the subject of legislation already by the Treason and Felony Act of 1870, which Act declares the benefice of a clergyman convicted of treason or felony to be actually void; and, notwithstanding what has fallen from the noble and learned Lord, I must declare my agreement with the most rev. Prelate, who said that there is nothing in this Bill which, if it passes into law, will repeal a syllable which is in that Act; if this Bill should pass into law, in the exact form in which it is now before the House, the effect of the Act of 1870 will continue to be what it is now,—namely, to make the benefice ipso facto vacant upon conviction of treason or felony; and that being so, I am unable to see what there is inconsistent with that Act in saying that upon that state of things arising the Bishop shall declare the benefice to be vacant. The law says it is vacated, and what inconsistency with that law there can be in saying that the Bishop shall declare it to be vacant, I am at a loss to understand; and I can well believe that, not merely upon those somewhat imaginative grounds to which my noble and learned Friend has referred, and which may open, as it seems to me, a very unnecessary field of controversy, but independently of those grounds, and for very plain, simple, and practical reasons, it may be a proper, and in some cases a very desirable thing, that the Bishop should declare a living to be vacant which the law has already made vacant in a certain state of circumstances. In cases of treason or felony, in all probability the matter may have some notoriety; in the other class of cases with which this Act proposes for the first time to deal, namely, misdemeanours, it may, or may not be so; but anyhow, it seems desirable that the vacancy should be formally and officially declared and recorded. Whether the importance of this, from any point of view, is greater or less, if anyone thinks it, for practical or even for sentimental reasons, to be desirable that the Bishop should make a declaration in conformity with the law and with the policy of the law, what there can be in that to rouse a storm of speculative objections I cannot conceive. If it pleases anyone I am content to do it for the sake of removing a difficulty, for the sake, it may be, of satisfying even scruples with which I do not agree. If that in any quarter will tend to conciliate men's minds and remove opposition to a measure, which all agree to be in substance necessary and desirable, for my part I sincerely hope that such degree of consideration, even for men's weaknesses, will not appear to Parliament to be a compromise of any principle.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK: My Lords, there is at least one satisfaction to be found in the speech of the noble and learned Lord (Lord Grimthorpe)—that he has certainly found out in the Bill every little weakness that it can possibly have, and that you have before you the whole indictment that can be possibly brought against it. I cannot help feeling that it was very unfortunate that the noble and learned Lord was not consulted about this particular clause, or that he had no share in framing it. Those who had that responsibility would have been able then to deal with and weigh his objections before the matter came into Parliament. But after what has been said by the noble and learned Lord who has just spoken, I do not think that any of us who are not lawyers, at least, can attach very grave importance to the tremendous difficulties which the noble and learned Lord has found in this Bill. For in the greater part of the noble and learned Lord's speech he was not discussing the Bill at all; he was discussing the utterances of an utterly irresponsible body, and not dealing with the provisions contained in the words of the Bill itself; and, in so doing, I think he has obscured the real points at issue, and made difficulties to arise from the utterances of that society, which have not their origin in the Bill itself. My Lords, it is not my part to follow the noble and learned Lord in a discussion of all the enactments of past times which have dealt with this subject or with cognate subjects; but yet I could not help being struck by the fact, when he made a complaint against the powers given to this Rule Committee in matters of procedure, that he at least ought to have remembered that in the Act of the 38th & 39th Vict., which constituted the Supreme Court of Judicature, the very word "procedure" is used in connection with the rules which were to be drawn up by that Committee, and they were not enacted in the Act itself. Further than this, the noble and learned Lord spoke of institution as a matter belonging really to the Vicar General, and he went into very learned arguments to prove that it is so; but I should like the noble and learned Lord to tell us whether any Vicar General could institute where there was no Bishop, or where there was nobody holding the position of the Bishop during the vacancy of the See. Is not the Vicar General in every case acting for the Bishop, and is it not the Bishop who institutes? Qui facit per alium facit per se. As regards the matter of the intervention of the Bishop, with which the noble and learned Lord finds so much objection, he must remember that from our point of view, whatever it may be from the point of view from which he regards it, the preferment of a parochial clergyman consists of two parts : it involves the freehold that he possesses during the time he holds his office, but it involves also a spiritual element, which we call the cure of souls. Now, I hold that no Civil Court either does or would wish or profess to affect the spiritual cure of souls, but it claims, and rightly claims, the power to deprive of the preferment. As the noble and learned Lord has pointed out, the preferment is vacant whether the Bishop declares it or not ; but the Bishop desires to have the privilege, which belongs to his office, of declaring the cure of souls to be vacant, and of relieving the clergyman of that tremendous spiritual responsibility which the Bishop committed to him on the day of his institution. As regards this institution, I do not know into what dioceses or what histories the noble and learned Lord has looked, or what acquaintance he has with the practice of the present day.

LORD GRIMTHORPE : I said I had looked into the report of the Ecclesiastical Courts Commission.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK : I can only say that during the 14 years of my own episcopate I have, in every instance, excepting when I have been absolutely prevented by circumstances, instituted the clergyman myself, and have never once asked the Vicar General to do it ; and I propose to carry on that practice to the end of my episcopate, unless the noble and learned Lord can convince me, which he has not yet done, that I am wrong in so doing. What then the Bishop desires, and what in the Bill we are very thankful to find he is permitted to do, is to pronounce a clergyman incapable of handling a cure of souls if the Civil Court has deprived him of his preferment, and the freehold involved in it. And is there nothing similar to this, my Lords, in other professions, if I may so speak of my own calling ? Does the noble and learned Lord not know anything of disbarring ? Is it not the case that for certain offences, for which a lawyer is convicted by a Civil Court, after such conviction the legal authorities proceed to disbar that lawyer or to strike him off the rolls ?

LORD GRIMTHORPE : It is mere surplusage.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK : It may be mere surplusage, but it is what takes place ; and, if it takes place in the profession to which the noble and learned Lord belongs, surely it is not a very unreasonable desire upon the part of a Bishop ? The noble and learned Lord suggests that possibly the Bishop might refuse to do this. What would be the circumstances ? The living is vacant, whether he refuses or agrees.

LORD GRIMTHORPE : That is a mistake ; the living would not be vacant under the Bill.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK : I will not argue that point of law with the noble and learned Lord ; I think that other lawyers of authority differ from him on that point ; but in any case, supposing the Bishop refused, all that he could do would be to deprive himself of one of the privileges and prerogatives of his office ; for it would be impossible for him to retain in his living a clergyman who had been found guilty of any of these crimes, and the living would become actually vacant, although the words do not remain as in the Bill of last year, "ipso facto vacated" by the sentence of the Court." My Lords, I would say one word in conclusion—not that there is much to say after the exhaustive speech of my most rev. Brother,—but on behalf of the northern province I do most earnestly implore your Lordships to pass this Bill, and to pass it as it now stands before you. I do not mean without some modifications of detail—I am sure my most rev. Brother and myself are quite willing to accept such modifications if they are likely to make the Bill more practicable ; for what we want is not an ideal Bill,—we want something now, and we do not get ideals just at the moment when we want them ; we want something that will work and help us to get rid of these few, these very few unworthy clergymen who are found in our body, without being led into that interminable delay and incalculable expense which has attended the operations of the law in such things in the days that are past.

LORD HERSCHELL : My Lords, I desire, in saying a few words in support of this Bill, to express my conviction that this measure rests upon a broad basis, and appeals widely for support in that it deals with a matter in which not alone the Church of England is interested—because that ministers of religion should be enabled, under the existing law, to remain in charge of a parish or a living when they have been guilty of notorious misconduct and ill living, is an injury to religion itself, no matter what the sect or denomination. (Hear, hear.) Supposing that you have a man of this sort living in a parish, in charge of the parish, as representing the Church of England there, can anybody doubt that his very existence there will be a stumbling block in the way of every minister of religion in the place? The Nonconformist minister, who is endeavouring to bring men to a belief in the truths of religion, or to enforce upon them the morality of religion, finds the existence of such a person living in the midst of those whom he is addressing a serious hindrance to his work. Therefore, it seems to me that it is a mischievous and evil thing, far beyond the bounds of the Church itself, that such a state of things should exist, and that there should be no speedy and simple means of removing it. And, my Lords, I would go further, and I would say that, apart even from questions of religion, it is a mischievous thing as regards the interests of morality itself, because a minister of religion is teaching religious truths intimately connected and associated with moral obligations; and can any one suppose, for a moment, that, even as regards mere moral influence, that moral influence will not be diminished, and the young very likely be freed from restraints which otherwise they might be led to regard, on account of a scandal of this sort existing in a particular part of the country? Therefore, my Lords, it appears to me that there are grounds, quite apart from any grounds of the interest of the Church or the advantage to the Episcopate, in the reduction of the expenses of prosecutions, upon which support may be claimed for this Bill. No doubt, my Lords, there are those who are opposed to a measure of this description, because they are opposed to the existence of a Church establishment, and think that there should be a separation between the Church and the State; but I would venture to suggest, even to them, that it is worthy of consideration whether it is not paying too high a price for any advantage that might be gained to the cause which they have at heart, to put an obstacle in the way of removing a scandal of this description, which is injurious to religion and morality. I am quite certain that if the time comes for the Church to be disestablished, its disestablishment will not rest upon a certain number of scandals existing in different parts of the country, arising from an immoral or a criminal clergyman; if the day should come, it will rest upon a much broader basis, and much wider considerations than these; and they themselves would be the first to rest it, and they do rest it upon such broad considerations. Therefore I trust that there may be a disposition to regard this measure upon its merits, as one in which all who have the interests of religion and morality at heart may find a common ground for the purpose of removing an evil which is injurious and mischievous to all. Now, my Lords, with regard to the criticisms of my noble and learned Friend opposite, I should like to say just a word or two. I am certainly not deeply impressed with the views which have found expression in the document to which he has alluded; but, on the other hand, I must frankly confess that I am not deeply convinced either by the arguments which my noble and learned Friend has produced as to the evil which would be done by yielding, if there be a yielding, to the extent contained in this Bill. I look at the thing from a practical point of view. I cannot see myself that there is any danger in giving, if it be an additional power, such additional power to the Bishop as is given by this Bill. What is it? It is only to say that, under certain circumstances, in the case of particular convictions, the Bishop shall declare the living vacant. Well, my Lords, I do not think that a duty of that sort, arising under the provision of an Act of the Legislature, is a recognition at all, certainly not of any serious kind, of any such principles as my noble and learned Friend suggested are involved in it. But, my Lords, I think there may be really a distinct advantage in requiring this declaration, and for this reason: This Bill extends the findings of temporal Courts, which are in effect to render the living vacant, because they are to lead to the Bishop declaring it so. At present that exists only in the case of treason and felony. The Bill extends it to certain serious misdemeanours. But the more you extend provisions of that description, the more possible it is that the conviction may not be a matter of notoriety to everybody; and there does seem to be a distinct advantage in requiring of some one a public declaration which shall make it, in each case, a matter of notoriety to those concerned and interested—amongst others to the patrons of livings—that the living has become vacant; because, of course, the living becomes vacant from a particular time; and if it becomes so merely by reason of the conviction, the right of the patron would accrue at that time, and his right might lapse, possibly, without the matter being brought to his notice. Therefore I think there is an advantage in the provision that some official should make a public declaration of the avoidance of the preferment; and I cannot see any more appropriate person than the Bishop of the diocese. Therefore there seems to me a practical advantage in it; and I do not feel myself that, whatever view one may take upon the question, that has been a good deal discussed, there is any admission of which anyone need be afraid. I would only suggest to the most rev. Prelate whether it might not be desirable to provide that, in case the Bishop failed, within a certain time to be limited (it must be a short time) to do it, it should be done by the Arch-bishop or the Vicar General—for this reason: that it is certainly a thing which should be speedily done. You might have a case, where the Bishop was ill, and not in a condition at the time to make the declaration; and, therefore, I think there is a reason for making a provision of that sort, which would probably be an additional safeguard gratifying to the noble and learned Lord opposite, and would, I think, be an improvement upon the Measure as it stands. And, my Lords, I would only say this, with regard to the apprehension that the Bishops might refuse, and be liable to mandamus: that Bishops are liable to mandamus now for many acts that they have to do. In fact, cases of mandamus to a Bishop are within one's own experience. If a Bishop refuses to institute, when he is bound to, he may be made the subject of, and is liable to mandamus; and, as my noble and learned Friend will know, there have been instances of mandamus to a Bishop for refusal to do an act which, by the law, he is bound to do.

LORD GRIMTHORPE: If my noble and learned Friend appeals to me, he probably alludes to the Gorham case—

LORD HERSCHELL: I was thinking of Marshall v. The Bishop of Exeter at the moment; that was a case of mandamus.

LORD GRIMTHORPE: In the Gorham case you know the Bishop did not do it.

LORD HERSCHELL: Still with a provision of this sort I am not afraid of the Bishop not doing it. I do not think we shall be driven to a mandamus; but, after all, if a mandamus has to be applied for, and is applied for, when a man has been convicted of a grave offence, and the statute has said that the Bishop should declare the living vacant, if the Bishop refuses to declare it vacant and goes to the extent of defying the law, I do not think there is any party who will have any great sympathy with him, or any great regret if he is made to obey the law. My Lords, I will not trouble you with any further observations upon the details of the Bill; but I desired to state the grounds on which I give it my hearty support.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> (according to Order), and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Thursday next.

SMOKE NUISANCE (METROPOLIS)
BILL—[H.L.]—(No. 9).
SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

*LORD STRATHEDEN AND CAMPBELL: My Lords, last year when I

rose upon this subject, having upon four previous occasions discussed it at considerable length, I moved the Second Reading in a very perfunctory manner. The result was so much controversy that although the Bill was read a second time I acknowledge the necessity of going to-day into the question with greater accuracy and precision. At the same time I will not detain your Lordships longer than is necessary, especially after the serious debate which has taken place and from which it may seem an undue descent to pass to any lighter topic. In consequence of the black fogs which occurred consecutively for five days about Christmas there has been lately a good deal of popular attention drawn to the subject. At that time the hunting world,—for frost occurred simultaneously,—being driven up to London might well have murmured at the darkness that awaited them; at the same time the skating world was under great impediments as it was scarcely possible to move to the ice in the vicinity of London. Now as these two worlds contain men of every class from the highest to the humblest, there can be no wonder at the feeling which existed and still continues to exist. The noble Marquess, the First Minister, and the noble Viscount sitting usually behind him (Viscount Midleton), who questioned him not long ago, appear on this important subject to have opposite opinions. According to the noble Marquess it is useless to correct fogs as you would only change the colour. According to the noble Viscount it would be possible to eliminate the essence of fog altogether as well as to remove the dark and solid particles which are now unfortunately added to it. My Lords, I hold a middle view between these two, as it appears to me, extreme opinions. I hold that it is possible to remove the black and solid particles but that it is beyond, at least the present grasp of science to deal entirely with fogs that spring not only from the exhalations of the river but also from the exhalations of the ocean. But in order to convince Her Majesty's Government that it is worth while at least to eliminate the peculiar blackness which smoke must add to fogs, I would refer for a moment to some other cities. It is notorious that fogs exist in other cities, but that the blackness and malignity of which we complain is entirely peculiar to our metropolis. I happened to witness a fog quite recently at Hamburg, which is in some degree analogous to London. It is the second city and the great port of the German Empire; it is on a tidal river, not far from the mouth of it; it is exceedingly commercial, but not exclusively commercial. The fog there set in and lasted two or three days, and may be going on still; but as a witness of it I could mention that in consequence of its being confined to mere unblackened vapour, it had in it nothing at all to interrupt the traffic of the place, and nothing which could be injurious to health if due precautions were adopted. However that may be, my Lords, I think all men must admit that a campaign against the artificial must precede the campaign against the natural ingredients, that you must first direct your legislation against the peculiar element which we superadd to fogs existing here alone, and then aspire, perhaps, either by further drainage or by undiscovered agencies to combat the element itself in which fog originates. But there is something else to be remembered. The attention of the public has been drawn to fogs of late, and very justly; but fogs are not at all the only evil which this kind of legislation is intended to control or to diminish. If by the efforts of the noble Viscount who alluded to the subject fogs were entirely removed, you would still have the smoke of London; you would still have its effect on flowers, on furniture, on constructions, on health, and on the human system. But that topic I leave to the noble Viscount to consider, hoping that he will bring to bear upon it the impressive eloquence which a few days ago drew down the admiration, if not the envy, of his leader. It has been powerfully treated by Mr. Rollo Russell, whose pamphlets on the subject have entitled him to just and great celebrity. He agrees, I think, with me in a rough estimate that for 20 days of actual fog you have, perhaps, 100 days in which our light and sunshine is obstructed. I will now go on and touch in a few words upon the details of the measure. As framed this year, the Bill adheres, as far as possible, to the form in which it quitted a Select Committee in the year 1887, comprising the Duke of Westminster, the Earl of Harrowby, Lord Mount Temple, Lord Balfour of Burleigh, the Earl Brownlow, Lord De Vesci, Lord Monkswell, and Lord Dundonald. In compliance with the Public Health Act, which passed only last Session, it is necessary that certain functions should be transferred to the Local Government Board which were originally entrusted to the Home Office. It is also requisite to refer to certain Acts of Parliament which exist instead of others which are abrogated. The executive authority of the Bill will as before reside entirely in the Vestries. The Local Government Board, if the Vestries are inert, will have admonitory powers to impel them, but it will not be able to keep their bye-laws beyond a certain limit in abeyance. There is a special clause, although it was not needed except for clearness, to prohibit all entry into the interior of houses. The Bill dictates nothing to householders, but leaves them to avert objectionable smoke by any method they think proper. It is less disturbing and less drastic than the law as it now exists at Dresden. The law of Dresden, of which I have a copy, gives the authorities control over interior arrangements instead of merely laying down that the householder should do anything he chooses except to permit black smoke to flow out of his chimneys. The Bill, as always, rests on the fundamental principle that the householder is entitled to burn whatever he desires in any mode he fancies, but is not entitled to send into the public air elements which vitiate it. It is a principle which came into existence so long ago as the time of Charles II. who directed Mr. Evelyn, the well-known proprietor of Wootton, the author of the Diary, to frame a measure to support it. It is only by the use of coal in its bituminous and uncorrected forms during two centuries that we have become gradually demoralised and have lost sight of the principle, while at the same time our habitations and our thoroughfares have been gradually thrown into an obscurity from which it is now desirable to rescue them. My Lords, I wish with a view to the satisfaction of noble Lords to answer a question which is nearly certain to suggest itself, although I am not bound to do so by the provisions of the Bill. It is a question as to how the new law would be carried out in practice. I can only give my personal impression that it would be carried out in practice with the greatest ease and with the minimum of outlay, by mixing anthracite and coke rather than by changing and modifying fire-places. Having been much in Germany last autumn, and having opportunities of entering into the subject with the first mechanical inventor, and also in consequence of other observations, and looking also to the movement of the public mind, I learn that anthracite is there regarded as the true and practical solution of the problem. I have convinced myself by some inquiry not only that anthracite may be drawn from Germany and from America but that in the Principality of Wales large stores of it exist which have not been exhausted. But supposing that no effect immediately arises, I should still contend that the Bill will be salutary. It will embody in the Statute Book the principle that domestic as well as industrial smoke requires to be combated. No doubt some further legislation may very possibly be requisite. Amended statutes may be frequent before an absolute solution is arrived at, but that has often been the case on other subjects. I happen to remember the late Sir Robert Peel remarking in the House of Commons that although he had been over thirty years in Parliament he never knew a Session in which there had not been a new Bill for regulating salmon. But he did not therefore draw an inference that legislation upon salmon had been useless. If he had, I am inclined to think that no one who knows the Tweed or any Scottish river would have been able to agree with him. I will now, my Lords, briefly answer an objection of the noble Viscount, to the effect that no Bill upon this subject can be carried unless a Government initiates it. Glad indeed should I have been if Her Majesty's Government had resolved upon that conduct, But I am bound to point out, as it appears to escape the recollection of some who may exert an influence upon the measure, that the Bill as it left the Select Committee was on the point of being adopted by this House, and there is no proof that it would not have gained the sanction of the other. Her Majesty's Government intended to support it with one or two minute Amendments, which would have been easily accepted. It was then destined to a smooth and unresisted course, so far at least as the Third Reading in this House, when at an unusual stage and in an unexpected manner a noble Earl on the Cross Benches—I think he is absent to-day, I mean the Earl of Wemyss—came forward to oppose it. His oratorical ability was such—and I refer to it without the slightest acrimony—that he carried round the Government, who were induced to swerve from their original design, and resolved upon outvoting it. I recall it merely to show your Lordships that had it not been for something wholly unforeseen, wholly unexpected, and, to a great extent, unprecedented, the labours of that Committee would not have been thrown away, and it is probable, at least, that the law would now be in existence. What tends strongly to urge it upon both Houses is the grave consideration, that unless something is done to improve the air and light of the Metropolis it may not be easy to maintain it as the capital much longer; but that topic is much too large for me to handle it this evening. My Lords, if your Lordships have the goodness, as I scarcely doubt, to read the Bill a second time, I am glad to understand that by the arrangement now in force it will naturally go before a Committee of the whole House. That is my object. I desire that its clauses shall there be freely canvassed and impartially decided on. If a question had arisen as to whether it should go before a Committee of the whole House or before the Standing Committee, I should have had some further observations to address to you, which I am glad that I can properly avoid; and I will now, therefore, merely move that the Bill be read a second time.

Lord Stratheden and Campbell

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>o</sup>." — (The Lord Stratheden and Campbell.)

*THE DUKE OF WESTMINSTER: My Lords, I desire to make one or two remarks, and they shall be very short, in the hope that you will be induced to read this Bill a second time. The principle has been accepted on previous occasions by your Lordships, and its objects are twofold—namely, to enable the Sanitary Authorities of London to make bye-laws for abating, or regulating, the emission of smoke of houses and buildings, and those that are not included in the Public Health Act of last Session. The machinery of the present Bill is identical with that of the Public Health Act of 1891, and will apply to the same extended area. Therein, of course, London becomes very much enlarged. The old Acts affect only the inside ring, it may be so called, of London; and there is a very great deal of smoke beyond that ring; and that area is proposed to be included in the present Bill. It affects, as you will observe, the emission of smoke, not only from factories, but from private houses and those very great offenders in the matter of smoke, the hotels and clubs of London. Your Lordships may very often have observed that about luncheon time, at 2 o'clock, Pall Mall is very often over shadowed with a dense pall of smoke coming out from those clubs at that interesting time of day. The second part of the Bill is to enable the County Council to make byelaws, in all cases of new houses, for the construction of fire-places so that they may consume the smoke which arises from them. I hold this to be a very moderate and almost permissive Bill, because it gives powers to Local Authorities for the execution of the Act. As your Lordships are well aware, the evil is increasing, and must increase, owing to the number of additional fire-places that are built every year. It has been computed that the amount of coal consumed in one year amounts to the enormous total of 8,000,000 tons—that is the bituminous coal full of smoke. It is easy to see that that enormous amount is being increased every year by the increase of population, and the increase in the number of houses in all parts of London. There is also the melancholy consideration, in connection with the case, that there are fogs and fogs—of course country fogs are not so deleterious as London fogs, because the London fogs are thickened and deepened by the amount of smoke that adheres to the globules in the air; but I am sorry to say that by the register the foggy days in 1887 were 93; in 1888, 119; in 1889, 151; and in the year 1890 they amounted to the larger number of 156. All that shows a very increasing state of the evil, and one which this Bill may affect. We cannot expect very much from it; but we hope it may tend to affect it in some slight degree. In regard to the state of the law of prosecutions for offences against the Act, the law at present affects only the industrial chimneys; and it has been considered that there is a spirit of some unfairness when other chimneys, also emitting a great deal of smoke, are let off, and are not subject to the provisions of the law. This question no doubt affects the decision in some cases of the Bench; at all events, the law would be more efficiently carried out if all the chimneys in London were placed so far upon an equality. It is also held that, if this Bill were passed, inventions for the consumption and getting rid of smoke will be very considerably stimulated. Those inventions are being arrived at every day, and I have a line here from Mr. Brunner, M.P., of the large firm of Brunner Mond and Co., Northwich, the great alkali works, where he tells me that 125 tons of slack at 7s. a ton produce in his case four tons of sulphide of ammonium worth £12 a ton. At that rate, 7s. a ton for 25 tons of slack, he makes a total of £43 7s., and by the sale of four tons of ammonia, produced by that consumption of slack, he makes £10 10s. a ton, or £42 10s. That is so far satisfactory and encouraging as showing that, by the production of this very valuable ammonia, no very considerable loss, in fact hardly any loss at all is entailed by the consumption of smoke. At the same time that would not apply, or very slightly, to the question of smoke consumption in London; but it may fairly be considered to apply to industrial factories. Then there is an increasing consumption of oil in the heating of London, and of gas and coke; and facilities are given by low prices for numbers of poor people to avail themselves of gas and coke. Then again anthracite coal can be obtained in any quantity in the world, both from South Wales and America, where the supply is practically inexhaustible; and I understand that in Paris anthracite coal is used to a very considerable and large extent; and there are restrictions there as to the consumption of smoke; I am not sure what they are, but there are considerable restrictions; with the result that a great deal of smokeless coal, anthracite, and coke (I do not know about gas) is used. The question of the consumption of smoke, my Lords, does not affect us in our position as much as it does the poorer classes of the community; we can get away to purer and fresher air, at all events, occasionally; but the poor cannot, many of them,—the great bulk of them,—are in London day after day, and week after week, through sunshine and through fog; and I think in their interests my noble Friend the promoter of this Bill, and those who wish to see something, however slight (and I do not believe in any very great result from this Bill, certainly not so far as the private grates are concerned), may do some good, and we should be very glad if your Lordships would, under the circumstances of the case, consent to pass the Second Reading of this Bill.

*THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): My Lords, I will not resist the appeal to pass the Second Reading of this Bill; but the noble Lord who introduced the Bill spoke of indirect pledges of approval. I beg to say beforehand that, by assenting to the Second Reading of the Bill, I give no pledges as to what we may think it right to do at any further stage of it. I cannot help feeling that the noble Lord who has just sat down is indulging in sanguine anticipation, and that the results will not be very large, even if it were possible to carry out the measures which he suggests; and, if the results are not large, I do not think we shall be paid for losing the comfort of a flaming fire. I was a little alarmed at the proposal of the noble Lord that we should recoup ourselves, for the expense of a new installation, by the manufacture of sulphide of ammonium in our own houses. I do not know whether the noble Lord is familiar with that drug.

THE DUKE OF WESTMINSTER: No.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: It smells more exactly like a drain than any drug I know; and I am afraid we shall hardly thank the reform that the noble Lord has brought in if we are compelled to have much of it about us. However, what I would suggest to the noble Lord is that if we read the Bill a second time he should allow us to refer it to Lord Midleton's Committee, so soon as that Committee is appointed.

Motion agreed to: Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> (according to Order), and committed to a Committee of the Whole House.

EAST INDIA OFFICERS BILL [H.L.]

CONVEYANCING AND LAW OF PROPERTY ACT, 1881, AMENDMENT BILL
(No. 17.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read

LORD HERSCHELL: My Lords, this is a Bill to effect certain amendments in the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881. The Bill is similar to, and, I believe, identical with a Bill which passed through the other House last Session, and was read a second time in your Lordships' House; but at a very late period of the Session—in fact at the very close; and, on the Motion to go into Committee, the noble Marquess opposite suggested that the Bill was one of some importance, and that it was too late to deal with it during the Session. My Lords, it has come up early enough this Session for us to be able to deal with it. The Bill contains a variety of provisions—each of them entirely independent; and, therefore, there is no principle involved in the Bill; it is a question simply of the expediency and propriety of each of the several provisions. The first of those provisions relates to cases of forfeiture by bankruptcy or execution; if the property is conveyed to another, within the time limited in the Bill, it avoids the result of bankruptcy or execution, the effect of which will be to preserve to the creditors of the bankrupt, very often, property that is very valuable; because, in some cases, there have been failures in building operations, and the result has been very disastrous to the creditors, owing to the impossibility of dealing with the property in this way. The next provision relates to conditions against assigning or under-letting; it enables the Court to relieve from a forfeiture, by assigning or under-letting, where the permission to assign has been unreasonably withheld, and to prevent money being insisted upon by way of payment for the licence to assign. As your Lordships are aware, the Act of 1881 contains provisions enabling the Court to relieve against certain forfeitures, but excepts the particular cause of forfeiture with which I am now dealing. My Lords, it would not be right to pass a measure of that sort without considerable safeguards. The Bill excludes from this section all agricultural or pastoral land; it excludes mines or minerals; it excludes a house used, or intended to be used, as a public-house; it excludes what I may briefly describe as a furnished house; and it excludes property with respect to which the personal qualifications of the tenant are of importance for the preservation of it. To all those cases the Act does not apply. It only applies, in short, where the personal qualification or position of the tenant is a matter of indifference; and in those cases it provides that the Court may relieve against forfeiture, if the permission to assign is unreasonably withheld. Then there are certain powers inserted for the protection of under-lessees, enabling the Court to give certain relief, that I need not trouble your Lordships with in detail. The only other provision is to remove doubt as to whether in the Act of 1881 "lease" includes also "an agreement to let"; there has been judicial doubt on that point, and that is removed by that last section. My Lords, as I said before, I believe there are some amendments which it is desirable to propose to the Bill, which my noble and learned Friend (Lord Selborne), who is not here now, has indicated to me, which may have to be considered. I ask your Lordships now only to give a Second Reading to the Bill, which, as I have said, involves no question of principle, but is simply a question of expediency.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, my noble and learned Friend has truly said, I think, that there is no particular principle involved in the Bill; but I am rather anxious to guard myself against the qualified approval that I once gave to the Bill by saying that, upon a more mature and careful consideration of it, I cannot help thinking that there are one or two objections to the form in which it is cast. I will tell my noble and learned Friend at once that I am only referring to that part of the Bill which has reference to conditions or covenants to assign. With respect to the rest of the Bill I entirely concur in its provisions. In the first place, I want to point out that I think the Bill is improperly cast, and ought to be amended in that respect. Instead of making a general proposition, from which you afterwards exclude almost everything (which seems to me a very awkward mode of drafting), the more natural course would be to say that which you intend to be the subject of enactment. But I have a still more serious objection to the form in which the third Clause is conceived; that is, by giving a non-natural and unreal meaning to words which in themselves have a very common and reasonable meaning. It is to be enacted there that "in all leases" and so on—

"Containing a covenant against assigning or underletting"—

I omit any unnecessary repetition of words meaning the same thing—

"Such covenant, condition or agreement shall be deemed to be subject to a proviso to the effect that such licence or consent shall not be unreasonably withheld."

It seems to me that the more natural thing would be, if you mean to prohibit the landlord from entering into such a contract, to prohibit it, and it would be plainly manifest upon the face of the instrument. But to say that people are to contract in words of ordinary common sense, and that the Legislature should put upon it, in a Statute which very few people but lawyers would see, another and entirely different meaning and additional condition, seems to me very unreasonable. I think a more reasonable and rational way of doing it would be to say that in such cases as you want to exclude, it shall not be lawful to enter into any such contract. And, my Lords, one word as to the fourth exception—

"Any property with respect to which the personal qualifications of the tenant are of importance for the preservation of the value or character of the property."

My Lords, I am not quite certain that I am able to comprehend what are the "personal qualifications of the tenant," and I do not quite know whether I am able to define beforehand what is "the value or character of the property." In a hunting county, for instance, would it be a personal qualification of the tenant that he can shoot foxes or anything of that sort? That is one illustration of what I mean. But the things are so wide that the difficulty I have is whether that is not a trap for a lawsuit, and whether, although it looks very innocent in itself, and you would say that it was very unreasonable of a landlord to refuse except where the character or value of the property is affected by the personal qualifications of the tenant, yet, when one comes to analyse it (and I admit that I did not myself at first consider the full effect and value of those words), I confess it looks to me very much as if it would be a very interesting Debate, possibly in a great number of Courts, as to what it meant; and, although that might be very interesting to the learned profession, it might not be so interesting either to the tenant or the landlord. My Lords, I have thought it only right to call attention to this matter. I agree with my noble and learned Friend that there is a good deal that is of value in this Bill which I should be sorry to see lost; but I think that in the Standing Committee it would be very desirable to see whether some construction cannot be put upon those words to prevent their being made really a trap for people getting into lawsuits without really knowing that they were in dispute at all.

LORD HERSCHELL: My Lords, I shall, of course, be glad to consider the points to which my noble and learned Friend has called attention, and I quite agree with him that there may be improvements made in the drafting of the Bill. It arises, as my noble and learned Friend knows, I daresay, from this: that the Bill is introduced in a certain form, and various proposals are accepted from opponents of the Bill, so as to satisfy them; and then the result is that it comes up with everybody satisfied, but not always, consequently, in the best possible form.

Motion agreed to: Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> (according to Order), and committed to a Committee of the Whole House.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

WESTMINSTER (PARLIAMENT STREET, &c.) IMPROVEMENT BILL
(by Order.)
SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Bill be now read a second time."

*(3.9.) MR. DIXON - HARTLAND, (Middlesex, Uxbridge): I rise to oppose the Second Reading of this Bill. It is no new proposal; it is the prolongation for some three years more of exceptional powers granted to private individuals, with a proposal to withdraw the safeguards which the Act of 1887 possessed. By that Act it was arranged that a certain company should be formed with £500,000 capital, of which £100,000 was to be paid up as a safeguard for the carrying out of the work. Well, five years have elapsed and no company has been formed, and not a penny of the capital has been subscribed. I may say from my own knowledge that the promoters have been to almost every financial authority in the City of London to try and get their case taken up; and the financial authorities, having examined the question, have decided there is no chance of any profit being made; and one and all have utterly declined to have anything to do with the scheme. Why is this the case? Because when the Bill was before Parliament, to buy off opposition, an enormous number of agreements were teaklessly made, regardless of results should the company ever be formed—the object simply was to buy off opposition. But now they find that, so long as these agreements exist, it is impossible for the company to be successful in any possible way. We are told that the First Commissioner of Works is in favour of this scheme, and I do not wonder at it if that is so. If I were First Commissioner I should help on the Bill, because the Board of Works is one of the parties bought off with an agreement. No doubt if the scheme could be carried out it would be a good thing for the Board of Works; but at the present moment it is really a short-sighted policy on the part of the Board of Works, because to continue the existing agreement would simply hamper the Department, and render it impossible to make terms with a bona fide company. Certainly this company will never be able to carry the scheme through. If any profit is to be made it certainly will not be made by the present promoters, and the scheme is not one that should be left to be carried out by private individuals. This is the finest site in the whole of the Metropolis. If the front part of a piece of Parliament Street were removed, and the Public Offices extended from the Local Government Board through the land which belongs to the Government up to George Street, I say it is one of the finest sites you can possibly have in this Metropolis, and if the work were taken up by a responsible body a very great improvement would be carried out. But I contend there is now no prospect of it being carried out, and to pass this Bill is simply to lock up the site for a still further period of time. I notice that the name of the Cadogan Estate Company has been imported into the case; but I do not see what that company has to do with it. That company is in no way bound by the Bill, and is merely introduced as a kind of stalking-horse to make the House of Commons believe that if the Bill passes this company will see their way to have something to do with it. But the mention of the company is deceptive, for the company are under no obligation. It is a company with no capital whatever. I believe the whole of that company's work was carried on by means of debentures, and the company have no capital to carry out the undertaking even if they wished to do so. The Cadogan Company have carried out improvements on the land they acquired from Lord Cadogan; but then that estate was vacant; but this ground is covered with buildings of a valuable description. We are told that the company may raise money on debentures; but that will mean ground rents 50 per cent. above any other rents in the immediate neighbourhood. It is perfectly impossible that they can get any financial authority to take up the debentures saddled with the conditions they will be obliged to make—conditions which were entered into when the Bill was last before the House of Commons, and for the purpose of buying off opposition. If this Bill is passed in its present form it will do away with all the protection to public and private interests which Parliament has thought necessary. This is an attempt to do away with Clause 4, which is the only protection the public have that the scheme will ever be carried out. I believe all the owners of the property in the neighbourhood are opposed to the hanging up of this site for another three and a half years, for they are convinced that the body of gentlemen who are promoting this Bill, however well-intentioned, are unable to carry out the scheme. A Petition has been presented to this House by the Institute of Civil Engineers, in which they say they are owners of three of the largest houses in Great George Street, and that they are in treaty for the acquisition of another adjoining (No. 27), and they propose to pull the whole down and to erect a large building for their institute on the site. All this will be stopped for three years if this Bill is granted, and though they might not object to that if they had an assurance that the scheme would really be carried out, they protest that there is no chance of this being done. I hope the House will not read this Bill a second time, not because the House is opposed to the scheme proposed, but because the position of the promoters is such that the scheme can never be carried out.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Dixon-Hartland.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

*(3.20.) MR. GILES (Southampton): This is called a Westminster Improvement Bill, and it would be a great improvement to remove the block of houses between Parliament Street and King Street, but there is not the least necessity for the creation of a new street from the middle of the Foreign Office quadrangle to Westminster Abbey. In the carrying out of this design valuable properties would be destroyed, amongst others the building forming the Institute of Civil Engineers, which has existed for 75 years, and which has a frontage of over 120 feet. This Bill has been before the House in 1887 and in 1890, and the powers have lapsed. The promoters, who are simply impecunious speculators, are now trying to renew these powers, to the prejudice of all the inhabitants dwelling in the neighbourhood. It has been decided by the Institute of Civil Engineers to rebuild their property, but are they to wait in a state of uncertainty for another three years, and with, as they think, no chance of the scheme being carried out?

*(3.21.) COLONEL MAKINS (Essex, S.W.): So far as I gather, nothing has been said against the principle of the Bill, and that, I understand, is the subject of debate on a Second Reading. A great deal of what has been said by hon. Members may be perfectly true; but the question as to whether or not further safeguards are necessary for the protection of private interests is a question for the consideration of the Committee to whom the details of the Bill will be referred. Now the history of the Bill is not quite that given by the hon. Member for the Uxbridge Division (Mr. Dixon-Hartland). The object of the Bill now before the House is to bring back the position to what it was when the Bill left this House in 1887. The 4th clause, on which so much stress has been laid by the hon. Member, was inserted at the last moment in the House of Lords at the instance of Sir Richard Nicholson, clerk to the Middlesex County Council and an occupier in the district, who is also the leader of the present opposition. Sir Richard Nicholson's position is this: he made an agreement with the promoters of the Bill for the protection of his own interests, and at the last moment he got this clause put in. The promoters took it and have since honestly endeavoured to carry it out, but now the object of the Bill is to get rid of the 4th clause, because the promoters find it is impossible to raise the money in the way provided—that is, by subscription of £500,000 in open Stock. Investors will not subscribe to an undertaking of this kind in open Stock, but they will take Debentures with a contingent claim on profits if hereafter made. The hon. Member has alluded to the Cadogan Land Company, and the connection of this company with the matter is simply this: they have succeeded in carrying out, I will not say a precisely similar, but in most respects a similar undertaking; they have made great improvements on the Cadogan Estate in Cadogan Square and Lennox Gardens, which they have converted into one of the handsomest quarters of London, and what has been done once can, in all probability, be done a second time, and if it should not be done, those whose interests are concerned are protected over and over again in most cases by agreements, and they have also the ample protection of the Lands Clauses Act incorporated into this Bill, which safeguards can, if the Committee think necessary, be increased and extended; and, lastly, they have this protection, that no property can be taken until the money is provided. The alarm expressed by my hon. Friend is, therefore, exaggerated. He says he does not want to have this matter hung up for the next three years. Nor do the company wish to have the scheme hung up for the next three years; but, unfortunately, through the action of the opposition, the scheme has been hanging since 1887, owing to the very clause it is now sought to remove. I do not wish to trifle with the House, and I therefore say that if the clause be re-enacted neither the promoters nor the Cadogan Company could possibly undertake the scheme. If, therefore, the House should be of opinion that the safeguards provided by the 4th clause are necessary and ought to be inserted, then the House had better throw out the Bill at once, for it will be absolutely impossible to carry out the improvements. It is not necessary to say a word in favour of the improvements. They are most desirable. That is admitted. The only question is, who are to do them? In the Petition presented by the hon. Gentleman on behalf of those whom he represents, it is asserted that the improvements ought to be carried out by public authority. Well, the London County Council have been approached, and their opinion is that the work ought to be done by the Government. They decline to undertake the widening of Parliament Street: they say it is more an embellishment than a public improvement, and they say it should be undertaken by the Government: and I daresay the right hon. Gentleman will tell us that the Treasury are not prepared to find the money. So it follows that the only other resource is a private company which will act under the powers of the Bill if the House will grant them. The Government look with benevolence on the undertaking, because they have acquired considerable property, which now lies idle, which they cannot deal with, but which under this scheme they can make useful to the public service: but, in any case, before they allow a single step to be taken, they would have to be satisfied, and would be satisfied, that the promoters were able to carry out their intentions. The last day for petitioning has gone by, and two Petitions only have been presented. One of these is from the gentlemen who are represented by the hon. Member who has spoken, and the other is from the Middlesex County Council. The Chairman of the County Council informs me that they look with favour on the project, and that theirs is merely a watching Petition, so as to get a further safeguard, should it be found necessary, in Committee. This is really a matter of procedure. The nature of the improvements intended is well-known, and it is for the House to decide whether the Bill should pass this stage, whether the Bill of 1887 should be re-passed without the fatal clause introduced in the House of Lords, so as to enable the company to carry out this much-needed improvement. I do not know what the Chairman of Ways and Means may have to say on the subject, but it appears to me the question raised by my hon. Friends are wholly questions for Committee, and that they have not at all attacked the principle of the measure, which is the question to be decided by the House now.

(3.29.) MR. WOOTTON ISAAC-SON (Tower Hamlets, Stepney) : A short time since papers and plans in relation to this scheme were brought to me. I examined them, and I found that the ideas of various leaseholders were so capacious that I could see no chance of carrying out the scheme so beneficial to the neighbourhood. Any hon. Member who has examined the matter must come to the conclusion I have arrived at, that this locality is one of the grandest quarters in the whole of London. It might be made an embellishment to the Houses of Parliament, to Westminster Abbey, to the whole Metropolis. But I do object to the House of Commons being made the means of foisting a company on the public. Not a penny of capital has been subscribed, and when the project was put before me, and I found that the House was to be asked to assist in floating the company, I would have nothing to do with it. I hope the House will not pass the measure until perfectly convinced that the capital has been found. If there are gentlemen interested in these improvements, let them find the money and make their profit in the best way they can, and not come to the public to subscribe for a purpose out of which they will never get a penny.

*(3.30.) THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET, Dublin University) : As the Department I have the honour to represent has been referred to, perhaps the House will allow me to say a few words. As to the prospects of the scheme as a commercial undertaking I express no opinion whatever, and as to whether the Bill is a proper one in its details, that is a question, I think, for the decision of a Committee upstairs. So far as the Department of Works is concerned we are, speaking generally, satisfied with the proposals contained in the Bill. My hon. Friend who moved the rejection of the Bill spoke of our having been offered extravagant terms, but I think there was exaggeration in his remark. We have been offered what I consider are fair terms, but no more than fair terms. Then as regards the proposition that a project of this kind should be taken up by the Government, I myself should be very glad could I foresee any chance of it, but I am afraid I cannot hold out any immediate hope of that. I will give the House the reasons that induce me to give my support to the Second Reading, but I do not wish to put any pressure upon any hon. Member who sits on this side of the House to vote with me. It seems to me that the proposals in this Bill having passed through Committees of both Houses within the last few years is a circumstance that should induce us to regard this Bill with favourable consideration, and if an alteration introduced, as we have been told, at the last moment in another place has made the success of the undertaking impossible, inasmuch as it was attaching to it an unworkable condition, then I do not think it is improbable that some other plan may be devised which would provide the security which I fully admit the persons interested are justified in asking for ; therefore it seems to me the Bill should be allowed to go before a Committee. If the scheme can be carried out successfully, I certainly agree it will confer an enormous advantage on this part of the Metropolis, not only because the traffic at the point is fearfully congested to an extent that is a danger to the public, but looking at it from another point of view, I think the condition of Parliament Street is a scandal to the Metropolis. I never walk down that street without wondering how it is that it has been so long left in its present condition. Parliament Street does not unite, so much as it separates, two of the finest sites existing in any capital in Europe. At the one end you have Whitehall Place and Charing Cross, and at the other end the venerable Abbey of Westminster and the buildings of the Houses of Parliament, two magnificent public places separated, I say, at the present time by a narrow insignificant street. The Bill under other circumstances was considered a good one, and I see no reason why a Committee upstairs might not be able to put in such terms as, while allowing this important public improvement to be carried out, would provide all security for the private interests concerned.

(335.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): I have no intention of opposing the Bill, and if, as the result of passing the Bill, Parliament Street is widened, and handsome buildings erected, no doubt a great public improvement will be carried out. But I may remind the right hon. Gentleman and the House that it was originally intended, many years ago, that the widening of the street should be effected by the Government, and that the War Office should be built in the front street. That intention was abandoned when, later on, it was agreed that the War Office and the Admiralty should adjoin each other on the Admiralty site. Then, as the Government no longer wanted the site in Parliament Street, the plan of leaving the carrying out of the improvements to a company seemed to be a wise one. But since then, again, the scheme for uniting the Admiralty and the War Office has been abandoned, the Admiralty being in course of building on the site by itself. But it will be necessary hereafter to build a new War Office, and it seems to me there are only two possible sites—the one in question and the one opposite the Admiralty in Whitehall—and so it becomes matter for serious consideration whether it is wise for the Government to part with the property the site of which is, I believe, on the whole, about the best remaining site for a new War Office. It is a matter for the Board of Works to consider whether it is altogether wise to entrust the carrying out of this scheme to a private company. I merely throw out the suggestion to the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. PLUNKET: With the permission of the House, I may be allowed to say that this very point has been carefully considered by the Office of Works; and if the scheme were successfully carried out, it would greatly facilitate the application of the site the right hon. Gentleman has referred to, to the erection of a new War Office or any other public building considered necessary.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: Then I understand it is not intended absolutely to part with the site—that the Government will retain some kind of lien upon it?

(338.) THE CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES (Mr. COURTNEY, Cornwall, Bodmin): The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) has intervened with a special question, not, indeed, without warrant, and I thoroughly sympathise with him in regretting that the War Office and the Admiralty are not united upon one site in Spring Gardens. I still think that it would be well to have the new War Office near the Admiralty, so that the two arms of the Military Service of the Crown may be close together. But I do not think, in view of what has just been said, that any adequate reason has been advanced for not referring this Bill, in the ordinary course, to a Committee, arising from the course that may be adopted in regard to the new War Office. The question is now, Shall we send this Bill to a Committee or not? Those who have opposed the Bill have some ground for their opposition. The projectors of the scheme got their Bill in 1887, and their powers were renewed in 1890, but practically nothing has been done from that time to this. Those who are interested and concerned in this matter are the Institute of Civil Engineers and house owners in the neighbourhood, who not unreasonably may complain of being left for many years in an uncertain position. They do not know whether it is best to make alterations and improvements in their buildings, or whether or not they may be liable to be turned out at short notice. Of course, the whole question turns upon facts, and the promoters now propose to give a guarantee that they will within a short time carry out their plans. They say they are able to lay before the Committee an absolute guarantee that they will be able to proceed with the work subject to the preliminary Certificate of the Commissioners of Works; that in twelve months they will proceed with the work or abandon it altogether. On the other hand, the hon. Member for Stepney (Mr. Wootton Isaacson) assures us that he has private information, and his view is shared by the hon. Member for the Uxbridge Division (Mr. Dixon-Hartland) that the promoters are not in a position to carry out their plans. But are we competent here, on the floor of this House, to determine the question? I have the greatest regard for the accuracy of the judgment of the hon. Member for Uxbridge, and I pay due deference to the opinion of the hon. Member for Stepney; but I do not think that what those hon. Members have said can be accepted as conclusive upon points of detail which can only be decided upon examination of financial facts and the evidence of financial experts. They will bring their data before the Select Committee, and the Committee will decide in the usual course. But the facts cannot be ascertained here; and if we are to proceed with reasonable caution, we must refer these matters of detail to a Committee upstairs. If the Committee are not satisfied from what is laid before them, that the future fortunes of the scheme will be different from what they have been in the last five years, the Committee will report against the Bill, but we cannot decide here and now whether the plan is hopeless or not. The merits of the plan as a public improvement are admitted, and the Board of Works, after full examination, are favourable to it. I hope the House will allow the Bill to follow the ordinary course, and that the Committee will be left to decide questions a Committee alone can decide.

MR. WOOTTON ISAACSON: Would the right hon. Gentleman favour a proposal that the scheme should be held up for less than three years?

(3.46.) Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 228; Noes 14.—(Div. List, No. 16.)

Bill read a second time, and committed.

MANCHESTER, SHEFFIELD, AND LINCOLNSHIRE RAILWAY (EXTENSION TO LONDON, &c.) BILL (by Order.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Bill be now read a second time.”

Mr. Courtney

(3.59.) MR. BOULNOIS (Marylebone, E.): If, Sir, I do not oppose the Second Reading of the Bill now and wish to move the Reference of the Bill to a Hybrid Committee, should I be able to make that Motion now or at a later date? I mean supposing the Bill is unopposed.

MR. SPEAKER: The Bill, if unopposed, will be read a second time and referred to an ordinary Select Committee. It will be open to the hon. Member to move the discharge of the Order for reference to a Select Committee, and to move that the Bill be referred to a Hybrid Committee.

MR. BOULNOIS: Shall I be able to do that now if the Second Reading is unopposed?

MR. SPEAKER: The Question now is the Second Reading, and whether this is opposed or not a subsequent Motion may, as Opposed Business, be deferred to a later day.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time.

MR. BOULNOIS: Then, Sir, I give notice that to-morrow I shall make the Motion for the Reference of the Bill to a Hybrid Committee.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member should in terms make his Motion now.

MR. BOULNOIS: I beg to move the Motion which stands in my name.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That the Bill be referred to a Select Committee of Seven Members, Four to be nominated by the House and Three by the Committee of Selection.

That, subject to the Rules, Orders, and Proceedings of this House, all Petitions against the Bill presented on or before the 27th February last be referred to the Committee; that such of the Petitioners as pray to be heard by themselves, their Counsel, Agents, or Witnesses be heard upon their Petitions if they think fit, and Counsel heard in support of the Bill.

That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records.

That Four be the quorum.”

MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby): I object. I would suggest that it be taken this day week.

MR. SPEAKER: It would stand over till to-morrow in the usual way.

Debate adjourned till To-morrow.

MR. BOULNOIS: I beg to give notice that to-morrow I shall move—

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee to consider, if they think fit, whether, if the Railway is shown to be required, the proposed approach to London, and the district in which the terminus is to be placed, is the most suitable, regard being had to the character of the particular site and the neighbourhood, the means of access thereto, and the convenience of the Metropolis generally."

QUESTIONS.

EXPENSES OF INDIAN MILITARY EXPEDITIONS.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether he can state to the House what progress has been made in preparing the Return regarding expenditure incurred by the Government of India beyond the north-west frontier of India in military expeditions and explorations, and upon military railways and roads, notice to move for which Return was given last July, and with regard to which he stated, on 24th July, that communications would be addressed to the Government of India, and that "all details compatible with the public interest will be given;" and if he can say when it is likely that the Return will be presented to the House?

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir JOHN GORST, Chatham, for The Under Secretary of State for India, Mr. CURZON, Lancashire, Southport) : The special collection and tabulation of the figures of the various departments from the Accounts for the past ten years is being made. The Secretary of State is not able to state when the Return is likely to be presented, but he is informed that it is difficult and laborious, and causes a heavy strain on the staff of the Secretariat.

MR. BRYCE : Will the right hon. Gentleman tell me in what form the Return is to be made? He undertook last Session to give me an idea of the form in which the Return would be asked for.

*SIR JOHN GORST : I am afraid the hon. Gentleman must apply to my successor for information on that point.

POLICE AND PUBLIC HEALTH (SCOTLAND) BILL.

MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.) : I beg to ask the Lord Advocate when the Government are to introduce the Police and Public Health (Scotland) Bill; and whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to arrange that the Bill may be read a second time before Easter?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Sir C. J. PEARSON, Edinburgh and St. Andrew' Universities) : In reply to the first part of the question, I hope in a few days to introduce the Burgh Police and Health (Scotland) Bill, to which, no doubt, the hon. Member refers. The question of when it may be read a second time, will depend on the progress made with the Public Business already before the House.

FAMINE KITCHENS IN INDIA.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the attention of the Secretary of State for India has been directed to the following paragraph from the Times Correspondent, dated Calcutta, 28th February, and appearing in the Times, 29th February—

"According to a Madras telegram the collector at Kinnoul reports that women of the higher castes will not resort to the famine kitchens. The Famine Commissioner, however, thinks they should be given a chance of attending before that opinion is formed," and what course the Government of India intend to take in the matter?

*SIR JOHN GORST (for Mr. CURZON) : The Secretary of State has seen the telegram. The next sentence in the Times telegram to the one quoted by the hon. Member, would appear to show that the opening of special relief kitchens for these classes was under consideration. The Famine Code makes full provision to meet these cases, and there is no need for special inquiry.

THE INDIAN CENSUS.

MR. BRYCE : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether, considering the importance of much of the information contained in the Returns of the late Census of India, and the difficulty of procuring those Returns here, Her Majesty's Government will cause to be presented to Parliament such parts of those Returns as are most likely to be of interest and value in this country ?

*SIR JOHN GORST (for Mr. CURZON): The only tabulated results of the Indian Census were given as an Appendix to the last Moral and Material Report. The final Report is not expected for some months, and when it is received the Secretary of State will consider in what form the information can best be made public in this country.

PROPOSED CADASTRAL SURVEY OF INDIA.

MR. MAC NEILL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the Reports of the Government of Bengal and the Government of India, and the Orders of the Secretary of State regarding the proposed cadastral survey of Behar, can be laid upon the Table of the House along with the Reports of the Divisional Commissioners and District Officers who were consulted by the Government of Bengal regarding the introduction of the present measure; and whether, considering the general indebtedness of the zemindars and ryots in Behar, the Government of Bengal will proceed with the cadastral survey, which will lead to additional expense?

*SIR JOHN GORST (for Mr. CURZON): If the hon. Member will move for the Papers, the Secretary of State will present them as an unopposed Return. The Secretary of State considers it necessary, in the interests of the ryots, to proceed with the survey. He has received no representations as to the general indebtedness of the zemindars.

THE ROYAL NIGER COMPANY.

MR. W. H. CROSS (Liverpool, West Derby): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been drawn to a statement in the Times of 9th February, of Lord Aberdare, the Governor of the Royal Niger Company, Chartered and Limited, to the effect that Her Majesty's Government have exacted from that Company the amplest information as to the application of their administrative revenue; whether, in view of the special provisions contained to that end in the Royal Charter, the Government have yearly exacted full and verified particulars of the incidence, collection, proceeds, and application of all revenues raised by the Royal Niger Company: whether the Government will now lay these Returns before this House, together with particulars of what, if any, modifications have from time to time been suggested to the Company by Her Majesty's Secretary of State; and whether such suggestions have been duly carried into effect?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. J. W. LOWTHER, Cumberland, Penrith): There is no provision in the Charter for a yearly examination. It is stipulated that the Company shall furnish accounts from time to time as may be directed by the Secretary of State. The statement made by Lord Aberdare is correct. In 1888, Major Macdonald, on behalf of Her Majesty's Government, personally examined every branch of administration, inspected the police force, visited the stations and ascertained the amount of Government work done by the Fleet. Some modifications in the duties have been made with the sanction of the Secretary of State, and a Return will be prepared and laid, similar to that laid in 1888, as soon as the requisite information can be obtained.

THE SHETLAND TELEGRAPH CABLES.

MR. LYELL (Orkney and Shetland): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether it is true, as reported, that both the telegraph cables to Shetland are broken; and, if so, when one or both of these cables will be repaired, so that telegraphic communication may be restored?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): When the hon. Member gave notice of this question, both cables to Shetland were broken; but the direct cable from Sinclair Bay in Caithness-shire was repaired yesterday, and the cable ship of the Department will now proceed to repair the local cable from the Orkneys.

THE CASE OF P. W. NALLY.

MR. HAYDEN (Leitrim, S.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the disorderly conduct of which the late Mr. P. W. Nally was alleged to be guilty, and for which he was deprived of some of his good conduct marks, consisted of a protest at Downpatrick Railway Station against being forcibly brought to England to give evidence against Mr. Parnell and the Irish Members before the Times Commission ; what was Mr. Nally's general conduct whilst in prison ; what was the entire length of time he was in prison, including the period he was, through no fault of his, awaiting trial ; and what is the time an ordinary convict would be allowed out of a term of ten years if he conformed to the prison rules ?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.) : The General Prisons Board report that Nally was punished on the occasion in question not for any protest, but for having shouted in a loud and disorderly manner calculated to create a disturbance, and no force whatever was used in bringing the prisoner to England, as he was merely escorted there under the order of the Special Commission Court. Beyond the case mentioned, he does not appear to have infringed the prescribed prison rules. He was ten and a quarter months in custody before trial, and he served seven years and seven and two-thirds months under his sentence of ten years' penal servitude. A convict undergoing ten years' penal servitude is, under the prison rules, released on licence at the end of seven years and eight and a quarter months from the date of the commencement of his sentence, provided that his conduct has been invariably good.

MR. JACKSON : As I understand the question, it is whether he was punished for having made a protest. He was not, but for disorderly conduct, which consisted of shouting loudly in a disorderly manner.

MR. P. O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.) : Was not the disorderly conduct the singing of "God Save Ireland" at the railway station while he was being removed ?

MR. JACKSON : I do not know whether the disorderly conduct consisted of the use of any particular words, but it was perfectly well known that prisoners in these circumstances ought not to have shouted at the railway station while being removed.

Subsequently,

MR. MCARTAN : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, whether any professional gentleman was instructed to represent the Crown at the Coroner's inquest held on the remains of P. W. Nally, who died in Mountjoy Gaol ; and whether he will have laid upon the Table of the House copies of the depositions taken at the inquest, and also a copy of the verdict of the Coroner's Jury ?

MR. JACKSON : I am informed that no professional gentleman appeared on behalf of the Crown at the inquest on Mr. Nally. As regards the second paragraph I have caused inquiry to be made, and so far as we know there is no official copy of the depositions or of the verdict.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.) : What information does the right hon. Gentleman now propose to lay before the House to enable the House to consider the circumstances of Mr. Nally's death ; and also with regard to the statement that the Crown was not represented, I would ask what is the law and practice on the representation of the Crown at inquests on men who die in the custody of the Crown ?

MR. JACKSON : That is a question which should be addressed to the Attorney General for Ireland. No counsel were specially engaged on behalf of the Crown.

MR. SEXTON : There are two questions I have to ask. First, what means the House is to be afforded to allow it to judge whether the officials of the Crown were blameworthy in reference to the death of Nally ; and, secondly—and I address this to the Attorney General for Ireland—what is the law and practice as to the Crown being represented by professional gentlemen with a view to securing a record of the causes of the death of a prisoner dying in the custody of the Crown?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): There is no such law, nor is there an invariable custom for the Crown to be represented at inquests on the death of persons dying in the custody of the Crown.

MR. SEXTON: An inquest was ordered in this case to determine whether the man came to his death by the blameworthy action of others. Does the Attorney General justify the Crown not being represented at the inquest so as to secure a record of the proceedings, so that now we have no record of them?

MR. JACKSON: I understand it is not the duty of the Crown to engage professional assistance in such cases. This was a perfectly simple case, and was referred to the Coroner in the ordinary course.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: Did the Crown find legal assistance at the inquest in reference to the suicide of the late Mr. Ridley?

MR. MADDEN: Yes; that is my recollection.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: Why was that course not adopted in this case?

MR. SEXTON: I shall take the earliest opportunity of calling attention to the fact that as soon as this man died the Government showed themselves indifferent to the consequences.

HAULBOWLINE DOCKYARD.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether steps will be taken to facilitate the erection of the machinery and other plant necessary to make Haulbowline Docks available for the purpose for which they were erected; and whether instructions will be issued at an early date to have all necessary repairs to Her Majesty's ships stationed in Irish waters executed in these Dockyards?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): The machinery and plant required in connection with this dockyard is in course of supply. When the dolphins have been erected, the dock will be available for use by ships in emergency. I am anxious to utilise this dock as much as possible, but I cannot lay down a rule that repairs in the future must be executed at a certain place, unless the nature and extent of the repairs are well known, and the capacity of the dock admits of it.

NEWCASTLE (COUNTY DOWN) HARBOUR.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, with reference to the necessity for harbour accommodation at Newcastle, County Down, whether he is aware that, according to the Report of the Inspectors of Irish Fisheries, of the 41,729 mease of herring, sold at £37,989, and caught along the Irish coast last year, 21,794 mease, which sold at £20,206, were caught in Dundrum Bay on the County Down coast; whether he is aware that Scotch and Manx boats made up the greater number of those engaged in the herring fishery there last season; whether his attention has been called to the last Report of the Inspectors of Irish Fisheries, in which they state that "boats cannot get in or out (of Newcastle Harbour) without great risk and difficulty"; and whether, considering that Newcastle is situate at the centre of the coast of Dundrum Bay, he will now inquire if anything can be done to provide Newcastle with proper harbour accommodation?

*SIR JOHN GORST: I am informed that the Harbour of Ardglass, where nearly all the herrings alluded to were caught and sold, lies to the north-east of, and not in, Dundrum Bay, and that while Scotch and Manx boats frequent Ardglass in large numbers none are believed to use Newcastle. The third statement in the question is correct, but I am afraid that I cannot add anything to the answer which I gave to the hon. Member on the 22nd and 25th ultimo.

KINSALE HARBOUR BOARD.

MR. FLYNN (for Mr. MORROGUE, Cork, S.E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury how much of the sum of £11,059 15s. 1d. alleged by the Board of Works, Ireland, to be due by the Kinsale Harbour Board is principal and how much interest; whether compound interest has been charged; and, if so, will he have the rebate of 1 per cent. promised on 29th February calculated on the same basis; and is he prepared to state what the rebate, calculated from the date of the award, 23rd April, 1890, to 29th February, 1892, will amount to?

*SIR J. GORST: Of the sum named, £10,722 15s. 1d. represents the outstanding principal, and £337 represents the outstanding interest. This interest, which had accrued up to the 31st October, 1889, was capitalised under the award of the 23rd April, 1890, and to this extent, therefore, compound interest has been charged. The effect of the reduction of interest now granted will be simply that all interest after the 1st November, 1889, the date covered by the award, will be calculated at 4 per cent. instead of 5 per cent. The reduction on this account from 1st November, 1889, to 29th February, 1892, will, I am informed, amount to £256 17s. 2d.

MR. FLYNN: May I ask if it is possible for the Treasury or the Board of Works in Ireland to relieve a portion of the compound interest which has been charged at 5 per cent.?

*SIR J. GORST: I do not see my way clear to disturb the award which was made as from the 1st November, 1889.

Subsequently,

MR. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury what is the usual rate of interest charged by the Irish Board of Works to the different Public Bodies in Ireland on advances in connection with public works; and if the interest charged on the Kinsale Harbour Authorities will be reduced to the lowest rate charged by the Treasury?

*SIR J. GORST: The usual rate of interest on loans for Public Works which are granted, as in the present case, under general powers and not under special Acts was originally 5 per cent., it is now 4 per cent. The interest on the Kinsale Harbour loan has accordingly been reduced to the lowest rate charged by the Treasury for such loans.

THE VACCINATION COMMITTEE.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether, in view of the Report of the Select Committee on Vaccination in 1871, recommending—

"That whenever in any case two penalties or one full penalty have been imposed upon a parent, the Magistrate should not impose any further penalty in respect of the same child," and of the fact that Section 10 of the Vaccination Bill of 1871, legalising this recommendation, was carried in the House of Commons but rejected in the House of Lords by eight votes to seven, he will now introduce a Bill to give effect to the recommendation of the Select Committee of 1871?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I hardly think the hon. Gentleman can be serious in asking the Government to bring in a Bill to give effect to the recommendation of a Select Committee which sat 21 years ago upon a subject on which a Royal Commission is at present sitting.

MR. CHANNING: Can the right hon. Gentleman say when the Interim Report ordered by the Royal Commission is likely to be issued?

*MR. RITCHIE: I am not aware that such a Report was decided upon. I referred to the Secretary of the Commission on the question put to me the other day on the subject, and I understand it will receive their consideration, but I am not aware that they have come to any decision in the matter.

CLARE CONSTABULARY FORCE.

MR. SEXTON (for Mr. Cox, Clare, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the County Clare is entitled to a constabulary free force of 363 men; that the free force at present amounts to only 344; and that the extra force numbers 144, at a cost of £6,000 a-year to the ratepayers; and whether he will now consider the advisability of withdrawing the extra force from the county; and whether the cess in County Clare was not higher than any other county in Ireland?

MR. JACKSON: I have no information before me with regard to the last part of the question, and therefore I cannot answer it. With regard to the other part of the question, the hon. Member is under a misapprehension. The police force to which County Clare is entitled, according to the last triennial re-distribution made by Order in Council in May, 1891, is 344 men. The present force in the county is 144 men, and the charge against the county for the force is at the rate of £5,000 per annum. The number of the extra force serving in the counties is, as I have already stated, carefully considered from time to time, and when the circumstances warrant such a course a reduction will be made. The question of reducing the extra force in County Clare is now under consideration.

MR. SEXTON: As the county cess is now 8s. in the £1, is there any cause why this enormous extra force of 144 men should be employed? Has Colonel Turner recommended any reduction?

MR. JACKSON: I have already said in my answer that the state of County Clare is being inquired into. Whenever circumstances warrant a reduction a recommendation to that effect is generally made to the Authorities, and is usually adopted.

KERRY COUNTY CESS.

MR. GILHOOLY (Cork, W.) (for Mr. SHEEHAN, Kerry, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if his attention has been called to the fact that the county cess in Kerry at the present time is 5s. 3d. in the £1, and the poor rate 2s. 3d. in the £1, thus bringing the gross taxation payable by the ratepayers up to 7s. 6d. in the £1, while the average taxation of the whole of Ireland is only 3s. in the £1; whether 295 policemen in excess of the legal free quota are at present stationed in Kerry at great yearly cost to the taxpayers; and what is the reason for this large extra police force in the county, having regard to the declarations of the County Court Judges at the various Quarter Sessions that the county is in a peaceable and orderly condition?

MR. JACKSON: I understand that in 1891 the county cess in Kerry was about 4s. 8d., and the average poor rate 2s. 4d. The question of reducing the extra police force in the various counties is considered from time to time, and a reduction made whenever practicable. The Police Authorities, who are responsible for the preservation of the peace in Kerry, report that the present number of police there cannot be reduced.

IRISH SCHOOL TEACHERS' PENSIONS.

MR. COGHILL (Newcastle-under-Lyme) (for Mr. T. W. RUSSELL, Tyrone, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the pension age for ordinary National School teachers begins at 55, the maximum age being 60, whilst the pension age for the teachers of the Model Schools begins at 60 and reaches the maximum at 65; whether there is any reason for the difference; and if it would be possible to assimilate the pension rules of the Model School teachers to those of the ordinary class?

*SIR J. GORST: Perhaps the hon. Member will allow me to answer this question. The rules for both classes of teachers were originally the same, and the ages for retirement still remain the same. In 1885 the ordinary teachers were allowed to retire on the maximum pension if they had served<sup>4</sup> complete years from the age of 21 in the case of males, and 18 in the case of females. The Model School teachers, at their own urgent request, are allowed to pay high premiums and to earn higher pensions. I do not think that either class would wish to lose the benefit then accorded to them.

FINTONA POLICE BARRACKS.

MR. COGHILL (for Mr. T. W. RUSSELL): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is proposed to remove the police barrack at Fintona, County Tyrone, from the Main Street to King Street; and, if so, what are the circumstances which necessitate the change?

MR. JACKSON: The Constabulary report that it is the case that efforts are being made to obtain another house for the police barracks, their object being to secure a position more central than the existing one, and nearer to the markets.

HIGH SHERIFFS' EXPENSES.

MR. COGHILL (for Mr. T. W. RUSSELL) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Government have recently received resolutions complaining of the practice of requiring land-owners in Ireland to bear the expenses attendant upon the office of High Sheriff; and whether, in view of the altered conditions under which land is now held, the Government intend to legislate upon this question?

MR. JACKSON : The Government have received resolutions complaining of the expenses attendant on the office of High Sheriff, and are now considering whether some means can be found to remove or mitigate the expenses complained of.

THE CONTRACT FOR LOAN AND LEDGER PAPER.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar) : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether a contract for loan and ledger paper has been given to the firm of James Spicer and Sons; whether any portion of the contract has been sub-let to Messrs. Turner, Symons, and Company, Tuckenhay Paper Mills, Totnes, and whether he is aware that Messrs. Turner pay those they employ considerably below the rate of wages usually recognised as fair for those engaged in the manufacture of hand-made paper?

SIR J. GORST : No such contract has been given to the firm in question since the 13th February, 1891; nor, so far as I can ascertain, for some years previously. The second and third questions accordingly fall to the ground.

PENSION AND SUPERANNUATION ALLOWANCES.

MR. F. S. STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye) : I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he would object to a Motion for a Return, showing the total amount expended during the year by Local Authorities upon pensions and superannuation allowances, together with the total amount paid out of the local taxation account for the same purpose?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.) (for Mr. RITCHIE) : If the hon. Member has in view the expenditure of the year ending 29th September, 1891—that is, the police year—the Returns can be given; but if he means the financial year ending 31st March, then the figures for that period must be obtained. The total amount paid out of the local taxation account in respect of police superannuation will be found in Return No. 373 recently issued by the Local Government Board.

EMPLOYMENT OF MARINES IN HARVESTING.

MR. LOGAN (Leicestershire, Harborough) : I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if he is aware that during corn harvest of the years 1890 and 1891, a farmer occupying at Walmer was permitted to employ Marines at 1s. 6d. a day to get in the harvest and serve the threshing machine, whilst agricultural labourers of the district were unemployed because the farmer in question declined to pay the wages current in the district and paid by his neighbours; and if the Admiralty will take steps to prevent the men of Her Majesty's Naval Service being used as instruments to reduce wages in that or any other district?

*LORD G. HAMILTON : Upon the application of certain farmers in the neighbourhood of Walmer who stated that they could not obtain civilian labour, 25 Marines in 1890 and 19 in 1891 were permitted by the General Officer commanding the South Eastern district to assist in getting in the corn harvest in those years. In 1891 the want of civilian labour was coupled with continuous wet weather, which threatened to render the corn useless unless quickly harvested. It is believed that Marines are paid the same rate of pay as that given to civilians employed by the farmers. The Regulations admit of the employment of Marines in harvest work provided that the employment of the population is not interfered with, and that no strikes or disputes exist between farmers and their men. I am not aware that the conditions imposed upon the employment of Marines have been in any case infringed.

THE MCKINLEY TARIFF AND THE WEST INDIES.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he is aware that the Reciprocity Treaty which has been made between the United States and several British possessions in the West Indies has led to considerable loss of revenue in the British Colonies affected ; whether he is aware that in Trinidad, when the Estimates for 1892 were laid by the Governor before the Legislative Council, it was stated that there was an estimated loss of £15,000 under the McKinley Tariff negotiations ; whether he is aware that on 8th January, 1892, the Legislative Council of Trinidad met in camera, and imposed additional taxation to the extent of £44,000, including an increase in the Import Duty on textiles of 50 per cent.—namely, from a 4 per cent. to a 6 per cent. ad valorem duty ; whether he is aware that duties upon textiles fall to a very large extent on British manufactures ; and whether Her Majesty's Government will use such influence as they may possess to prevent the effect of the Reciprocity Treaty with the United States from being this : that whilst it will diminish or abolish duties levied on American products it will at the same time lead to an increase in the duties imposed on British manufactures ?

*SIR JOHN GORST (for Baron H. DE WORMS) : The answer to the first four questions is generally in the affirmative ; but the increased duty on textiles is only estimated to produce £6,000 of the £44,000 named, and a duty of 6 per cent. ad valorem is certainly not high when compared with the rates levied in most of the Colonies, to say nothing of foreign countries. Her Majesty's Government will certainly endeavour to secure that the effect of the arrangement to which the hon. Member refers shall not be to increase the duties levied on British manufactures. But the fair comparison is not as the hon. Member puts it, between America and British products, but between duties on food and duties on manufactures from whatever countries they may come.

MR. SUMMERS : I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the Government approves of this increase of taxes ?

*SIR JOHN GORST : I am afraid I cannot answer the question without notice.

THE DEATH OF BULWUNT RAO OF INDORE.

MR. SEYMOUR KEAY (Elgin and Nairn) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether he will now state the result of the trial of the persons charged with the murder of Bulwunt Rao, formerly an official of the Indore State, in the town of Ujain, on 19th May last ; whether one of the persons implicated belonged to the railway police, under the control of the Government of India ; whether he is aware that Mr. Inverarity and other English counsel of eminence, who defended the prisoners at a cost of Rs.30,000, stated in Court that they were employed for that purpose by the Maharajah Holkar, the Ruler of Indore ; whether he is aware that a copy of the record of the trial has been refused to the widow of the murdered man by the British officer who presided over the Court ; and whether the Government of India propose to institute an inquiry into the real origin of the crime ?

*MR. CURZON : The special Judge, appointed by the Gwalior Durbar to try the case, found that the Indore Superintendent of Police had bribed the Gwalior police to connive at the forcible removal of Bulwunt Rao from the City of Ujain ; that there was no direct intention to cause death, but that in removing Bulwunt Rao violence was used which caused his death. The Judge found four of the accused guilty of homicide, not amounting to murder, who were sentenced to 14 years' rigorous imprisonment ; five guilty of abetting that offence, of whom one was sentenced to 14 and the other four to seven years' imprisonment ; and two guilty of abetting the bribery of a police constable, of whom one was sentenced to six months' imprisonment and the other to a fine of Rs. 200. Four persons were acquitted. One of the convicts—sentenced for 14 years—was a railway constable in the service of the Government of India. The Secretary of State has no information as to the 3rd and 4th clauses of the question. So far as the Secretary of State is aware, the Government of India do not propose to institute any further inquiry in this matter.

THE PURCHASE OF LAND (IRELAND) ACT.

MR. KEAY: I wish to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the Treasury has yet made the rules mentioned in Section 27 of the Purchase of Land (Ireland) Act, 1891, and when such rules will be laid before Parliament?

MR. JACKSON: I have already answered several questions that have been addressed to me upon this question. The rules are practically settled; but there was one small point remaining which I think has been settled to-day, so that I hope to be able to publish the rules at once.

TRAFFIC IN THE WEST END.

COLONEL BLUNDELL (Lancashire, S.W., Ince): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the change which has taken place both in the pace of heavy traffic and in the weights which horses are required to draw at the West End of London since wood pavement has been put down; whether his attention has been called to the cruelty to horses resulting therefrom, especially on hilly ground, whenever the wood pavement becomes slippery, either in frosty weather or after a sudden shower of rain; and whether he will consider the propriety of having the regulations bearing on such matters reviewed, or regulations made if none exist?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am informed by the Commissioner of Police that he is not aware of any general change in the pace of heavy traffic since wood pavement was laid down in the streets, although it is possible that the lightness of draught on the wood pavement has tended in some degree to accelerate the pace. The Commissioner has recently addressed a communication to the Vestries and the County Council, stating that the police had been instructed to give information when any of the streets or thoroughfares are in a slippery state, in order that these Authorities may take action by putting gravel on the roadway. Neither the Commissioner of the Police nor I have power to make regulations as to the condition of the roadway. The police do deal effectually with cases of cruelty to horses.

THE CASE OF THE CONVICT CLARKE.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when was the insane convict Clarke removed from Portland Prison to Broadmoor Asylum; is he aware that Clarke was perfectly sane when removed from Chatham to Portland last December; will he inquire whether his present insanity is in any way due to the severity of the treatment in Portland; is he aware that he had a black eye on the 20th February; and will he state how he received the blow?

*MR. MATTHEWS: This prisoner was removed from Portland Prison to Broadmoor Asylum on the 26th February. He was thought to be sane on his admission to Portland, but within a month it became necessary to place him under observation. I have already informed the hon. Member that there is no ground for supposing that the insanity is due in anyway to the severity of the treatment which the prisoner received in Portland Prison. On 20th February he had self-inflicted bruises on his eye and face.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: If the treatment of this prisoner was under observation surely you must be able to say how the prisoner got the black eye. I am told he was beaten by a warden.

MR. MATTHEWS: That is not my information.

TRAWLING IN GALWAY BAY.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that the majority of the fishermen living near Galway Bay desire that trawling should be prohibited in the whole or part of Galway Bay; if trawling is prohibited in Belfast Lough, Dublin Bay, and most of the Scotch bays; and if he can state the reasons why the wishes of the Galway fishermen should not be acceded to?

MR. JACKSON: The Inspectors of Fisheries report that it is probable that the majority of the fishermen living near Galway Bay, who follow line fishing, desire the prohibition of trawling in that bay. The Inspectors carefully inquired into the subject in 1888, and decided not to make a bye-law prohibiting trawling in this bay. An appeal against their decision was heard before the Privy Council, at which both the line fishing and trawling interests were represented by able counsel, the result being that the Privy Council upheld the decision of the Inspectors. The prohibition in Belfast Lough appears to apply to a portion of it only, and to be confined to night trawling, and for three months of the year only. Trawling is prohibited in Dublin Bay. The Inspectors have recommended the prohibition of trawling in Galway Bay from steam vessels, and the case is before the Lord Lieutenant. They do not propose to prohibit trawling from sailing vessels there, as from the result of their inquiries they do not consider that course necessary.

CARLOW BARRACKS.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if it is a fact that the Military barracks at Carlow have fallen into a dilapidated condition owing to their being occupied only during the Militia training season; and whether these barracks were repeatedly used as Cavalry barracks?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): Nothing is known in the War Office as to Carlow barracks being in a dilapidated state. I will cause inquiry to be made. It appears that a troop of Cavalry was quartered in these barracks during the winters of 1888-9 and 1889-90.

TELEGRAPH STATION AT RATHVILLY.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether the frequent applications which have been made to the Post Office to obtain a telegraph station at Rathvilly, County Carlow, will be considered; and, if practicable, the request of the people of the district granted?

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: A telegraph office at Rathvilly was offered to a local proprietor in September, 1887, under a guarantee of £34 a year; but it is possible that since then the circumstances may have altered, and I will have renewed inquiry made, and let the hon. Member know the result.

THE DOCKYARD STAFF AT HAULBOWLINE.

MR. HAMMOND (Carlow) (for Dr. TANNER): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether there exists at present any dockyard staff at Haulbowline, Cork Harbour; and, if so, in what numbers as regards specified crafts; and whether it would now be possible to dock and repair any seagoing warship in these docks; and, if not, when will it be possible?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: The present authorized staff at Haulbowline is: one store-houseman; three shipwrights; one blacksmith; one store labourer, and 14 other labourers. Provision has also been made for employing additional labour as required for coaling work and for repairing, and for maintaining yard machinery, to the extent of about six workmen for the year. It will be possible to undertake small repairs as soon as arrangements have been made for facilitating the entrance of ships and the supply of certain machinery, &c. This will be early in the ensuing financial year.

THE MILITARY FORCES IN BURMA.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether his attention has been called to the statements of Lord Roberts at Rangoon, in the Times, of the 26th instant, in which he urges strongly that the Military Forces in Burma should be definitely removed from the Madras command, and placed directly under the orders of the Commander-in-Chief in India; whether this opinion is shared by the chief Civil and Military authorities in India ; and whether, in pursuance of his statement on the Debate on 17th February, 1891, on the Indian Presidential Commands, Her Majesty's Government will proceed, at an early date, to carry out this re-organisation of command suggested by the Commander-in-Chief ?

MR. CURZON : In reply to the first paragraph, I have to say that the Secretary of State has seen the statements attributed to Lord Roberts. As to the second paragraph, the Government of India shares this opinion. With regard to the third, so long as the Presidential system remains in force, it is not desirable to deal piecemeal with questions of commands, or diminish the authority of the Local Government over the troops composing the Armies of Madras and Bombay. At present the Secretary of State is not prepared to undertake the necessary legislation for this purpose.

THE IRISH REPRESENTATIVE FOR THE CHICAGO EXHIBITION.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE (Dublin Co., S.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury who is the Irish representative on the Commission for the Chicago Exhibition ; what newspapers did they advertise in, and on what dates ; what proportion of the grant of £27,000 was placed at the disposal of the Royal Society to organise Ireland ; was any Irish artist or architect invited to act on the Committees ; and how many Irish applications have been received ?

*SIR J. GORST : I am informed that the Duke of Abercorn is a member of the Royal Commission for the Chicago Exhibition. Advertisements were inserted on the 28th November, the 12th December, and the 26th December of last year in each of the following papers :—The Belfast Newsletter, the Cork Examiner, and the Dublin Daily Express. Also advertisements were inserted in the Freeman's Journal and the Belfast Morning News on the 5th December, the 19th December, and the 2nd of January, and in the Dublin Irish Times on the 25th November, the 9th December, and the 23rd December. I do not know whether any of the Artists or Architects on the Committees are Irishmen ; none were invited as such. No proportion of the £25,000 (not £27,000) was placed at the disposal of the Royal Dublin Society. 23 applications have been received from Irish exhibitors up to date.

SOLDIERS AS RURAL POSTMEN.

MR. H. R. FARQUHARSON (Dorset, W.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether the recent arrangement by which pensioners, reservists, and time-expired soldiers are to have preference for appointments as rural postmen is intended to enable such pensioners, though not resident in the district where the vacancy occurs, to be preferred to resident civilian applicants for the post ; if so, whether he will consider the case of young farm labourers and others who have always looked forward to becoming rural postmen ?

*SIR JAMES FERGUSSON : The officers of the Department are instructed on the occurrence of vacancies for postmen, porters, &c., to apply to the Regimental District Office where lists of applicants of approved character are kept. These men would naturally belong to the district, but there is no limitation to the source from which they may be obtained. I have thought that the public interest is promoted by the service of the Post Office being supplied by men who have been taught habits of regularity and obedience, and whose intelligence has been developed ; while a better class of men will be induced to enter the Army by having the expectation of lifelong employment. In time some 30,000 situations may be thus filled by soldiers who have served their time. The class of young men referred to in the question can qualify for them by accepting such service ; and I hope that in consideration of the objects I have mentioned, those who have hitherto recommended persons for such employment will acquiesce in the measure that has been adopted.

THE "EAST INDIA (SALARIES)" RETURN.

MR. KEAY : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether he can state what progress has been made with the Return entitled "East India (Salaries)," notice to move for which was given in April last ?

MR. CURZON: In answer to the hon. Member's question, I have to state that the Secretary of State has not received any report as to the progress being made with the Return.

BUSHMILLS POST OFFICE.

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether the letters for Bushmills are sorted in the train; and, if not, whether he will arrange that they shall be in future; whether he has received complaints as to the unsatisfactory postal service to Bushmills now in force; whether he is aware that, in consequence of the delay in delivery of letters, very great inconvenience is caused to people carrying on business there; and whether he will consider the advisability of making the sub-office at Bushmills a post office?

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: Letters for Bushmills are not sorted in the train; the place being still served by mail car from Coleraine, where the mails are made up. Representations have been made, and it is admitted that there is room for improvement. The matter is now being inquired into. It is considered that there is no case for a head office at Bushmills, as only about 1,500 letters a week are received there for delivery.

THE GOVERNMENT OF NATAL.

MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether anything, and, if so, what, has been done to meet the demand of Natal for power of representative government; and whether the Government still consider that all Native affairs must be kept out of the hands of the Colonial Parliament?

SIR J. GORST (for Baron H. de Worms): The question under discussion between Natal and Her Majesty's Government is that of establishing responsible Government in the Colony, representative government having been in force there for the last 35 years. The latest telegraphic information on the subject is that an amended Bill has passed through Committee in the Local Legislature;

but until the text of it is received, Her Majesty's Government cannot say whether it fulfils the requirements which they deem essential. In reply to the second part of the hon. Member's question, I have to say that Her Majesty's Government, whilst requiring certain safeguards for Native interests, have never considered that all Native affairs must be kept out of the hands of the Colonial Parliament.

THE VEXATIOUS INDICTMENTS ACTS.

MR. ADDISON (Ashton-under-Lyne): I beg to ask the Attorney General whether his attention has been called to a grievance alleged by editors of newspapers, publishers, and other persons to have been inflicted on them in recent cases by the law concerning libel and other offences within the Vexatious Indictments Acts, inasmuch as when, after investigation by the Magistrate, a charge has been dismissed as "unfounded," or as "one in which no jury would convict," the prosecutor may bind himself over to continue the prosecution, without finding any security to pay the costs in case of an acquittal; and whether the Government will consider the advisability of remedying this defect in the law?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): I am aware that cases have arisen in which prosecutors under the circumstances mentioned in the hon. and learned Member's question have been unable to pay the costs. The point is, however, one of general importance, affecting not only the class of cases to which the question particularly refers but to all cases to which the Vexatious Indictments Act applies. I cannot undertake to initiate any legislation dealing with the matter during the present Session.

THE LATE LONDON SCHOOL BOARDS.

MR. DIXON-HARTLAND (Middlesex, Uxbridge): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, in view of the count out on Tuesday night, what course the Ministry propose to take as regards granting an inquiry into the conduct of the late London School Board?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): In answer to the hon. Member's question, I have to say that, as far as I understood the situation with which the hon. Member dealt on Tuesday last, the case stands thus:—Charges of extravagance, and more than extravagance, were brought by him in a very able speech against the London School Board, the penultimate Board, or even an earlier one. These facts were brought before the London constituencies when the recent School Board was elected, and I understand that the present Board are pledged to a policy of economy. But if it were the fact that, in order to carry out that policy, they require to carry on an investigation for which they have not themselves the necessary means, and if their efforts to make this investigation have proved fruitless through their not possessing adequate powers, and if they made representations in that sense to Her Majesty's Government, we should seriously consider the new state of things thus disclosed.

PUBLIC ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS.

MR. CONWAY (Leitrim, N.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he is aware of the anxiety of managers of poor Catholic Schools for the introduction of the Bill promised in the Queen's Speech for relieving Public Elementary Schools in England from the pressure of the local rates; and whether he has any objection to informing the House when the Bill will be introduced?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: This is one of the subjects that the Government are anxious to deal with, but I do not think in the present state of Business it would be either possible or useful immediately to introduce a measure.

THE IRISH NATIONAL TEACHERS' PENSION FUND.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, in regard to the telegram read by him the other night—on Monday night—which purported to come from a representative of the National Teachers' Organisation, whether his attention has been drawn to a communication that appeared in the Freeman's Journal, stating that the telegram was not authorised; and, if so, whether the right hon. Gentleman still adheres to the statement that the telegram came from the Teachers' Organisation?

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): In order to make this matter clear, I wish to say that I have received a telegram from a member of the Executive Committee to the following effect:—

“Telegram referred to by Mr. Jackson, M.P., was not sent from the Executive Committee, of which I am a member, nor do I know who is responsible for it.”

I wish to ask whether he can ascertain as to the correctness of it?

MR. JACKSON: No, Sir; I cannot ascertain. The hon. and gallant Member for Galway asks whether I have seen the statement he refers to. Having had time to make inquiry I have to say that I have seen the letter to which he refers; but the hon. and gallant Member asks me if I adhere to the statement I made upon Monday in regard to this matter. Now I do not think that that is a quite right way of putting it—

COLONEL NOLAN: I beg the right hon. Gentleman's pardon, and withdraw the expression. I intended nothing discourteous; it was only my clumsiness.

MR. JACKSON: The telegram I received was handed to me while sitting on the Treasury Bench. That telegram purports to have been handed in at Dublin at 6.20 p.m., and to have been received here at 6.40 p.m. It reads as follows:—

“Executive Committee of Irish National Teachers' Organisation heartily endorses proposed allocation of £91,000 to the Pension Fund.”

Signed

O'KELLY, Secretary.”

That is all I know about the telegram. This morning I received a letter which I had better read—

“The Irish National Teachers' Organisation, Dublin, March 2, 1892.

Sir,—I am directed by the Parliamentary Committee of the Executive of the Organisation to forward copies of Resolutions passed on Saturday last at their meeting. In transmitting the enclosed, I am instructed to express the satisfaction of the members with the various proposals of the Government.

They hope that the Second Reading of the Bill will be taken at any early date. They desire to send a deputation to London during the Second Reading and Committee stages of the Bill, to use their influence with the Irish Members, and to obtain their services. Our Parliamentary Committee was appointed by the Executive, and given full powers to deal with matters Parliamentary during the Session. I have already forwarded the views of the Committee with reference to the allocation of the £91,000."

This letter is signed by Mr. O'Kelly, the Secretary to the Organisation. That is all the information I have upon the matter beyond a copy of the resolution.

MR. SEXTON: The right hon. Gentleman speaks of a telegram received from a Parliamentary Committee. Would the right hon. Gentleman, before the Debate relating to the allocation of this money comes on again, inquire as to the constitution of that Committee; how many gentlemen are on it, or on the subsidiary body from whom the telegram came?

MR. JACKSON: I shall be happy to inquire if the hon. Member wishes, but I have given the House all the information in my possession in regard to this matter. I read the telegram, as I thought it my duty to do, and I presume the teachers intend to express their views on the subject.

THE SALE OF FROZEN MEAT.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he will consider the expediency of applying the principle of the Merchandise Marks Act to the sale of frozen meat?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I understand the principle of the Merchandise Marks Act to be that an article must not be so marked as to lead to the belief that it comes from one country when, in reality, it comes from another. I do not at present see how this principle could be applied to frozen meat, which, so far as I am aware, is not marked at all. The matter seems rather to come under the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, and I have no information which shows that the provisions of that Act are insufficient to prevent fraud with regard to it.

Mr. Jackson

THE FINANCIAL RELATIONS OF ENGLAND, IRELAND, AND SCOTLAND.

MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury when the Committee to inquire into the financial relations of England, Ireland, and Scotland will be appointed?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will put down a Motion for a Committee on Monday.

THE UNDER SECRETARY FOR INDIA.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury why the Under Secretary for India is not in his place? Several questions of importance with regard to India have been put, but the hon. Member was not in his place to answer them. Why is the hon. Member away? He is the responsible servant of the House in connection with the administration of Indian affairs, and yet he is absent when several most important questions are put.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

SIGNALLING INSTRUCTION.

MR. OCTAVIUS V. MORGAN (Battersea): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he intends to hold a class for instruction in signalling for the auxiliary forces at Wellington Barracks this month; whether he is aware that the majority of the officers and non-commissioned officers in those forces that presented themselves for examination last December, after a long and arduous course of instruction, passed the practical examination, but have not yet received their certificates, which has caused great dissatisfaction; and whether there would be any objection to the signalling officer for the time being in the Home District holding the examination in the future both in practical and paper work?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Yes, Sir; a signalling class will be held this month at Wellington Barracks, commencing on the 7th inst. The delay in the issue of certificates to the officers and non-commissioned officers who passed in December last has been caused by the destruction of the whole of the certificate forms in stock by fire. A supply been ordered from the Stationery Office, and the certificates will shortly issued. It is not considered desire that the signalling officer in the me District should conduct the mination, as it would lead to a k of uniformity with other districts.

E EVICTED TENANTS (IRELAND) BILL.

MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.): beg to ask the First Lord of the easury a question of which I have given notice—whether he can now te definitely if he will bring in a Bill dling, in a separate Government asure, with the 1st and 2nd clauses the Bill under consideration last ht?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot rwer the question of the hon. Mem without notice.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

4.55.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE EASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, nchester, E.) in rising to move—

That the House do meet on Tuesday and day at Two o'clock. That the principal iness at such Morning Sittings shall be financial Business and proceedings on the introduction and First Readings of Bills; and t the provisions of Standing Order 56 be ended to such Sittings."

Id: I do not think it will be cessary to recommend the first Reso- tion which I have to move, except in very few words, for the necessity ider which we are for increasing the nount of time available for passing otes in Supply must, I think, be ident to anyone who knows the statutory obligation under which we re to deal with the Supplementary nd other Estimates before the end of he financial year, and who will consult he almanac as to the number of government days available before that ate. Monday, 21st March, is, I elieve, the last day upon which the ppropriation Act can be introduced, d before 21st March there are ly four Government nights, as things and at present, on which Supply can be taken—next Monday and Thursday, and Monday and Thursday in the week following. In those four days we have to deal, in the first place, with Supplementary Estimates. Supple-mentary Estimates are in this con-dition—there are 26 Votes in all, and of these 26 Votes, eight, I think, and eight only, have been passed. It is, therefore, evident that by far the larger number remain to be dealt with ; nor are those that remain, so far as I can make out, of a non-controversial character. We have the Local Taxation Relief (Scotland) Bill. I should have thought that after the very full discussion of this question the other night, we might perhaps be spared a very long discussion. But rumours have reached my ear that certain Scotch Members desire to express their opinion upon that question. Some time must be occupied before the House can conclude with the Supplementary Estimates ; but in addition to the Supplementary Estimates there are the Army and Navy Votes to be got through. The first Army Vote and the first Navy Vote have to be got through with, and we also require to take a Vote on Account. I think, therefore, it is perfectly clear, from a very simple arithmetical calculation, that Her Majesty's Government, if they gave all the time that would be at their disposal if the Standing Orders were left unaltered—it would be quite impos-sible for us, before the 21st of March, to have dealt with all the financial business, by which is meant Votes in Committee of Supply, the Report of Supply, the Appropriation Bill, and other matters of that kind. The House will notice that, in addition to the financial business, reference is made to the introduction and First Readings of Bills. The House knows that already the Government have begun, so to speak, more than one important measure. The passion for discussing measures before they are seen appears to be growing in certain portions of the House ; and though I am far, on this occasion, from desiring to raise any question of debate, the fact at all events will be admitted that it is highly inconvenient, both in the point of view of Members of the House who are anxious to acquaint themselves with the real provisions contained in Government measures, and also inconvenient to the outside public, who are anxious to know what the proposals are, that these Bills should be suspended, that they should not be before Members and before the country, and that we should therefore be deprived of such advantage as may result, at later stages of the Bills, of hearing the criticisms passed upon them. There is a Bill dealing with the Scotch Local Fee Grant. My right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland has a Bill for providing Assisted Education and other purposes in Ireland ; and there is a Bill which I endeavoured to introduce on a previous occasion with regard to Private Bill Legislation in Scotland and Ireland. I think it is in the highest degree desirable that these Bills should be before the country. They cannot be before the country unless the House consents to extend the time at our disposal, and therefore I think it will be admitted on all sides that it is not merely for the convenience of the Government, but for the convenience of all parties, that the full particulars of these measures should be printed and circulated as soon as possible. I do not know that it is necessary to add anything to what I have already said in support of this Resolution. It appears to me that when we compare our position on the 3rd of March this year with what it was on the 3rd of March last year the necessity will become very obvious. On the 3rd of March last year the Irish Land Purchase Bill and another important Bill dealing with the Land Commission in Ireland had been read a second time, and the Tithes Bill read a third time.

An hon. MEMBER: Before Christmas.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not raise any complaint against the House. I do not say that the Government think themselves ill-used by the House because our business is not so far advanced; but I only point to the matter of fact that it is not so far advanced, and that, therefore, some measure of this kind is necessary. I hope the House will give us the modest powers we ask without any very prolonged debate.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the House do meet on Thursday and Friday at Two o'clock. That the principal business at such Morning Sittings shall be Financial Business and proceedings on the Introduction and First Readings of Bills; and that the provisions of Standing Order 56 be extended to such sittings."—(Mr. A. J. Balfour.)

(5.7.) MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Midlothian): Mr. Speaker: Sir, I would observe that the right hon. Gentleman has built up a very wide proposal upon an extremely narrow basis. For this is, as I think the House will admit, a very wide proposal. It is a proposal made on the 3rd of March, Parliament having only met on the 9th of February; it is a proposal now to give away the whole of the Tuesdays and Fridays for the entire Session of Parliament.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: So far as Morning Sittings are concerned.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Exactly so; so far as Morning Sittings are concerned. I think that is a very wide and large proposal to be made on the 3rd of March. It was made on the 16th of March last year, and made on the 16th of March with the observation made by the late Leader of the House that the 16th of March did not mean last year the same as it would have meant in ordinary years, because the Parliament had met, so as to advance the Business of the Session, five weeks earlier—by meeting before Christmas—five weeks earlier than it usually meets, and because he hoped, to use his own language, "to have the time for proroguing the House many weeks before the usual time—in fact, in July." But I need hardly remind the House that that benevolent anticipation was not realised. Now, the right hon. Gentleman having made this broad proposition—for it is a very broad proposition, and it means in fact, with an exception of a very insignificant degree, the giving up of the Tuesdays and Fridays altogether, from the beginning of the year to the close, which I think justifies me in calling it a broad proposition—he has confined the proof of the necessity almost entirely to matters connected with the Appropriation Bill of the present year, which, as he said himself in the course of his argument, runs until the 23rd of March and then entirely lapses. I will not cavil upon small points. The right hon. Gentleman also referred very properly to the introduction of Bills and their First Reading ; and it may be right—and is right—that the Government should have every facility for placing its measures before the country. And, moreover, I will make a further concession, which the right hon. Gentleman might have asked for in the argument of his speech, but did not ask. I think it is desirable that some progress should be made on the Miscellaneous Estimates for the year, before Easter ; and, therefore, it is not that I am disposed to quarrel with the right hon. Gentleman so far as regards a moderate and limited proposition. If he were content to limit his Motion until the time of Easter in the circumstances which he stated I should say that a fair case, upon equitable grounds, existed for agreeing to it. But what I wish to point out is this—I am not giving an absolute opinion upon it ; but I am, I think, justified in the circumstance that the question of the surrender of the Tuesdays and Fridays, so far as Morning Sittings are concerned, from the beginning of the Session practically to the end, is a very large and serious question ; and I would not say that the Government may not be justified in raising that question—possibly it may be so. There is great inconvenience in the very prolonged Sittings of this House, and it is extremely desirable to adopt some measure for getting more forward in Supply in the early and middle part of the year than the right hon. Gentleman has been enabled to do ; and, therefore, I do not want to give a deliberate consideration to a question of that kind, if it has been already considered ; but it is a very serious question, and it is quite evident that the speech which we have just heard from the right hon. Gentleman, which refers only to the space of a very few days or weeks, does not lay down sufficient to warrant a proceeding which, if adopted by the House, would form an absolute precedent for years for the entire abandonment of a large portion of Tuesdays and Fridays now enjoyed by private Members. Well, Sir, I wish to make two bye-observations—one is that the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, relating to open spaces in Scotland, stands, I believe, for to-morrow night, and it is probable that he would be the first victim offered up in order to meet the rather voracious appetites and demands of the Government ; but my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen (Mr. Bryce) has had the honour, or infelicity, of being made a victim on former occasions, and has become rather distinguished or conspicuous in that character: I will not then say that this observation is a sufficient reason of itself, but a reason of itself, why no concession should be made to the Government in this matter ; but I think it may fairly be asked that if this Motion, or any portion of this Motion, should be passed, the Government will do what they can to expedite matters, so that this Debate may be closed to-morrow evening. I rather think that a fair demand which the House will concede. Then I wish to comment a little upon the phraseology which has been used. First of all, I do not feel entirely comfortable to have the phrase "principal business" in this connection. I know it is not absolutely new. It has been invented, I know, by the present Government. Very many on that side of the House regard it, no doubt, with respect. The critical faculty need hardly be so entirely silent on this side of the House, and, taken in the connection in which it here stands, it will be found not very easy to interpret. However, the right hon. Gentleman is so confident in the applicability of this phrase as a sound phrase of formal Parliamentary interpretation—I know very well as regards the conversational interpretation it is not difficult to interpret it—that for my part I shall be satisfied to leave him responsible for any public detriment that may thereby accrue. But with regard to another phrase I confess I am disposed to press a little further, and that is the phrase "financial business," because that is unquestionably a wide and large phrase. Take, for example, the excessively important measure that was introduced some years ago by the Chancellor of the Exchequer with regard to the reduction of the National Debt. That was financial business undoubtedly; and, at the same time, I think, if we are to maintain the distinction between Morning Sittings and Evening Sittings—if we hold that there are certain subjects of primary importance that ought not to be taken at Morning Sittings—such a Bill as that of the Chancellor of the Exchequer ought not to be introduced in a Morning Sitting. Or take another, the Budget for the year. Certainly I think that is financial business, and on no occasion has the Budget been introduced at such an hour of the day; and so long as the distinction is maintained I think we ought not to regard the Budget as one of the subjects that should be taken in a Morning Sitting. With regard to the Army and Navy Estimates, I believe, by fixed usage, they are retained for the Evening Sittings. I mean to say the first portion—the introduction to the main subjects. Therefore I doubt very much whether the phrase "financial business" is a safe phrase to adopt in the present Motion. At the same time it is not for me to undertake to dictate or advise the Government as to the particular phraseology they propose to adopt. But I hope the House will be able to adopt some expression other than this, which I have a little endeavoured to canvass. But I must confess that, coming to the substance of the subject-matter, I do say that this question is an extremely important question, and a very broad proposition if it is to be interpreted in the sense I have attached to it—namely, to give up from the beginning to the end of the Session, Morning Sittings on Tuesdays and Fridays, the time that private Members now enjoy. As it is a matter of very great importance, I think we ought to understand that if a proposition of this kind is made—for purposes which may or may not be adequate—we are making a very large and permanent alteration in the division of the time of the House between the Government and independent Members. That is not a matter that ought to pass lightly, without notice, or without a notice much more extended than is usually given to propositions of this kind, because this would really come to mean a distinct change of system in the House. What I have to say is this: that although the absolute needs of the Government only extend to the 21st of March, yet, viewing the desirability of the introduction of Bills, and the convenience of making an advance with the miscellaneous Estimates of the year, which we are all disposed, I think, to give a more forward place than they have lately enjoyed, so far as the time at our disposal is concerned, I should be quite ready to agree to a Motion of this kind. Beyond that I could not really, for one, consent to go. I do not wish to do anything inconvenient in form, but in case the Government wish to introduce any change of language into the Resolution, I should be disposed before sitting down to propose to insert the words "until Easter" in the early part of the Motion—that is to say, "That the House do meet on Tuesday and Friday at 2 o'clock until Easter, &c." I hope this will meet with acceptance by the Government. My contention is simply this: that a permanent change in the allocation of time between the Government and the independent portion of the House is a question of great importance which ought to be largely considered with full notice to all concerned, and ought not to be disposed of as if it were a matter merely formal and subsidiary.

Amendment made, by inserting after the first word "That," the words "until Easter."—(Mr. Gladstone)

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Perhaps it would be convenient for the House if I at once stated that I am quite ready to adopt the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman, provided it is understood that, should the course of Business require it, I am to be at liberty to make any other provision for the dispatch of Business which the necessities of the day may dictate. With regard to the other point raised by the right hon. Gentleman, as to the interpretation of the somewhat novel phrase "financial business," perhaps it may be convenient for the House if I were to ask you, Sir, what interpretation should be put upon the phrase "financial business," before it is adopted?

MR. SPEAKER: I think it is rather a matter for the House itself. But looking at the words which are used, I should say they included Supply, the Report of Supply, and the Ways and Means Bill; and unless a limitation "until Easter" is introduced into the proposition, it will, of course, apply to the Budget. That would be the natural interpretation I should be disposed to put upon it; but it is a matter for the House, and I am not the arbiter of the question.

(5.21.) SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby): My recollection is that the phrase used on former occasions was, "Bills that had their origin in Committee of Supply," or some such phrase.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: And the Scotch Bill.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I do not mean this Session. Formerly there have been Resolutions to that effect which defined Financial Bills as Bills which had their origin in Committee of Supply, and would include Committee of Supply, Ways and Means, and Bills of that description.

(5.22.) MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I confess I always look with a certain amount of doubt and suspicion upon any arrangement, whether public or private, in regard to the Business of this House come to between the two Front Benches, because we always find that there is a tendency on the part of all whom I may term official Members, to squeeze out us poor unfortunate, independent Members on this side of the House. But I confess that as I listened to what fell from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian, I should think there was a considerable amount of reason in what he said in giving this facility till Easter. But I must point out that the right hon. Gentleman appeared to be surprised at the action of the Government. I think the right hon. Gentleman will be more surprised when I tell him and explain to him what has been the action of the Government before and during the Session; for it seems to me that the Government, almost by design, are using all their powers to put off legislation on their own Bills. What happened on the Address? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian has frequently had occasion to move the Address on the Queen's Speech. I do not think the right hon. Gentleman ever urged discussion on these occasions.

In fact, I remember that the right hon. Gentleman, and indeed every other Gentleman who held the position of Leader of the House, always somewhat deprecated discussion on that occasion. Well, the right hon. Gentleman will be surprised to hear that the First Lord of the Treasury protested against our not discussing the whole question of Egypt; and then, as if that was not sufficient, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, the Gentleman who is one of the dual control in this House, also deprecated it. I felt very much inclined to accept the challenge.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I never referred to the question of Egypt at all. But I must say that I felt the greatest satisfaction, and even the greatest surprise, that it was not discussed.

MR. LABOUCHERE: When an Irishman trails his coat in a fair he does not ask anyone to tread on it, but he feels surprised if no one does so. But the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) went even further. He expressed surprise that Members sitting upon that Bench with him and divided in opinions from him did not bring forward a species of counter Address to Her Majesty; stating all they contemplated doing if they got a majority at the next General Election with regard to Ireland. We on this side of the House deprecated these attempts to stave off Public Business, and thanks to our reticence and to the great sorrow of Her Majesty's Government we did not pause a very long time on the Debate on the Address. Then the right hon. Gentleman introduced a Bill he called the Local Government (Ireland) Bill. He introduced it in a sort of way that he did not approve of the Bill himself; that it was a sort of Liberal Unionist Bill; that he was obliged to bring it in, and made a lengthened speech; but certainly it was not a speech that I think would be likely to conduce to the passing of that Bill, or lead anyone to suppose that the right hon. Gentleman intended to persevere with his Bill. Then the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian will be still more surprised to hear that the Leader of the House allowed a Bill to be introduced in regard to Scotland, that after four or five hours had been spent in discussion upon this Bill the Leader of the House got up and explained that a mistake had been made, that there was no right to bring in the Bill until assent had been given in Committee, and, therefore, the whole proceeding would have to be commenced from the beginning. I wish to point out this, therefore, that if there is any difficulty in regard to Public Business, it may be that the House will endeavour to help the right hon. Gentleman out of his difficulties, but they have all occurred owing to the right hon. Gentleman, and his difficulties would have been much greater if we had accepted his challenge and the challenge of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham on the Address. Now, I will tell the right hon. Gentleman why he gets into difficulties, and what feeling a great many Gentlemen have in regard to this matter. We want to know when the Session is going to end. We know perfectly well that this Parliament has attained its majority; we know that it cannot last very long—"No, no"—and we rather suspect that all these endeavours to provoke us into discussion is an attempt to drag matters on until either the hay harvest or the corn harvest, because the right hon. Gentleman and his Friends opposite do not seem to have that confidence in the agricultural labourer that we have. They want to seize the opportunity when this man to whom they have given a vote—to whom a vote has been given, I should rather say—will not be able to exercise his privilege. If the right hon. Gentleman will get up and say, "We recognise fully that it is at least doubtful whether we continue to enjoy the confidence of the country; we think that it is our duty under these circumstances, and owing to the fact of this Parliament having lasted very long"—and in my opinion it has lasted a great deal too long—"we think it is our duty to seize the earliest opportunity when the greatest number of the electors will be on the register in order to consult the country whether they have confidence in us or not." If the right hon. Gentleman would get up and say, "I have had my little joke about this Local Government Bill. I had not the slightest notion of bringing it in. I should rather not have been forced into bringing it in by the right hon. Gentleman opposite" (Mr. J. Chamberlain). If the right hon. Gentleman were to assure the House, as soon as these Bills he referred to are introduced, and as soon as the Supplementary Estimates and the Vote on Account are carried, he would go to the country, I can assure him that he will receive every facility on the part of Members sitting on this side of the House to expedite Public Business. We do not want to say offensive things to the right hon. Gentleman, but we think he and his Friends have thoroughly outstayed their welcome. As for the Business of this House, why, if the right hon. Gentleman were really to propose that the House should not meet at all, or should only meet once a week, I believe it would be for the benefit of the country. Why should we have all this legislation which is proposed by the right hon. Gentleman, without the right hon. Gentleman knowing whether he has the people of the country at his back? I hold any sort of legislation that takes place by a majority, which was brought together six years ago, to be contrary to the first principles of representative Government, and all the more that when the electors do get an opportunity they will seize it to try and convince the right hon. Gentleman that he and his Government have lost their confidence. Notwithstanding my distrust of the two Front Benches, if the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian insists upon his Amendment with regard to Easter, we will not fight or quarrel about it. I should have thought the 30th March would have been preferable, but we certainly will contest to the last the monstrous proposal of the right hon. Gentleman to take Tuesdays and Fridays till the end of the Session. Such a proposal has never been made before, and will I trust be always resisted.

*(5.33.) MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston): I wish to ask whether, in the event of the Motion being altered in the manner suggested by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian, the First Lord of the Treasury will agree to give precedence to those Iotions on the Paper for Tuesdays and ridays after the Easter Recess? In regard to next Tuesday, some of us find ourselves in a position of extreme difficulty, although we are anxious to expedite the Business of the House. In Tuesday next there are four or five Iotions down, two of them of importance. One has relation to Scotch sheries, which several Members, representing Scotch constituencies, are anxious to discuss, and the other has reference to the larger question of arbitration with the United States of America. have heard it stated that that is a uestion upon which you cannot very well get up the steam, but the steam as already been got up out of doors to considerable extent, and by Tuesday ext, if the Motion is discussed, there will be petitions representing nearly ,300,000 of our countrymen, heartily ndorsing the proposal for a Treaty f Arbitration. These petitions are signed, irrespective of Party politics, nd in the face of this extraordinary xpression of opinion, mainly from the adustrial classes, I hope the Governnent will afford an opportunity of discussing so exceedingly important a question. If the right hon. Gentleman will give a guarantee that the Motions now standing on the Paper should have precedence after Easter, no difficulty whatever will be felt in passing this Resolution.

MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I wish, Sir, to endorse what has been stated by my hon. Friend. It is very hard that the time of private Members should be taken in this ruthless manner, and I think we should not be doing our duty if we did not express our strong opinion as to the bungle into which the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury has got the House over the Estimates. Our position does not arise from the Members of the House, but from the Members of the Governnent not making proper arrangements to get through the necessary Business before the close of the financial year. I hope the Government will make an exception in favour of the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Daggerston, which stands for next Tuesday. The industrial classes are looking forward to a discussion on that Motion with great and deepening interest.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I rise to call attention to one important point, namely, the Motion standing in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Kerry for Friday the 28th of March, affirming the necessity of the compulsory sale of land to occupying tenants in Ireland. This question, always important, has become urgent since the failure of the Land Purchase Act last year. If this Motion be carried without exception, my hon. Friend will be confined within three hours for the discussion of a question of the greatest magnitude, instead of being allowed seven hours. The interest in Ireland on this question is such that we cannot consent to abandon our rights, and I would suggest to the right hon. Gentleman that he would do well to agree to let us have this particular day out of the considerable number of Tuesdays and Fridays intervening between this and Easter. By the 29th March the Appropriation Bill will have left this House. The only matters remaining will be the introduction of Bills, and I do not think he seriously suggests that the introduction of Bills will be then proceeding. I would, therefore, urge that as it will not be necessary, either for the purpose of financial Business or for the introduction of Bills, for him to take the 29th March, he should allow us to have that day. In order to regularise the proceeding I beg to move, after the word "Friday," to insert these words "except Tuesday, 29th March."

MR. SPEAKER: There is already a Motion before the House to restrict the operation of this Resolution until Easter, and that Resolution I will put from the Chair.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. SEXTON: Then, Sir, I will propose that after the word "Friday," in the second line, the words "except Tuesday the 29th March" be inserted.

Amendment proposed, after the word "Friday," to insert the words "except on Tuesday, the 29th March."—(Mr. Sexton.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think the hon. Gentleman who moved this Amendment will feel it is one the Government can hardly accept. The two hon. Gentlemen who preceded him each made eloquent appeals in favour of Motions standing in their names, and if the Government make an exception in favour of one Member they cannot avoid extending the same Parliamentary privilege to others. The hon. Gentleman has told us that the Motion standing for the 29th March in the name of the hon. Member for Kerry is a very important Motion. I admit that; but the hon. Gentleman is aware that this question has been brought before us frequently last Session as well as this, and is not new to the House. Therefore, although I fully admit the importance of the proposition the hon. Gentleman asks us to accept, I do not think it would be possible to make in favour of that Motion any special claim that would not equally apply to Motions standing in the name of other Gentlemen. I hope the hon. Gentleman will be content with the protest he has made, and will not divide the House on his Amendment.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): I think the better plan would be to strike out the word "Tuesdays," and to give the whole of Fridays to the Government, and I also think that the reference to Standing Order 26 should be struck out. The result would be to give us six hours on Tuesday evenings, which would be better than the risk of three hours on Tuesdays and Fridays. It would certainly give private Members some little time for the discussion of questions in which they are interested. The Government Motion practically means that for the remainder of the Session they will take Tuesdays and Fridays to themselves, and I do not think the three hours they propose to give us each night are worth having. I would rather give them the whole time on Friday.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): This Motion is brought forward at an unusually early period of the Session; it shows the extreme inconvenience of the way in which Business is being done in this House. We have been told over and over again that Irish and Scotch Business blocks the way, but here we are, without violently contentious Business being introduced, in a position this Session which is worse than ever has been the case before. The reason we ask that the 29th March should be exempted is that a Motion standing in the name of the hon. Member for Kerry, and relating to the compulsory sale of land in Ireland, should be discussed. Now the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House used this extreme argument. He said that this subject of first-class importance had been brought before the House before. We all know that subjects of great importance are brought forward year after year in this very way, and it is necessary to repeat and enforce these arguments before any result accrues; therefore there is no force in that argument of the right hon. Gentleman. The additional ground for the discussion of the Motion of my hon. Friend is the failure of the Land Purchase Act. It has not worked so rapidly or so smoothly as the Ashbourne Act. If the right hon. Gentleman cannot see his way to exempt the 29th March, I would suggest these alternatives: first, he may promise my hon. Friend the Member for Kerry some day for discussion after Easter; or, if he cannot do that, he might accept the proposition of the Member for Caithness and take Fridays, leaving the Tuesdays open; or, on the other hand, he might at least agree that the discussion of this Motion should be taken on Tuesday 29th March, and allow it to go on until it was fairly exhausted, not enforcing the 13 o'clock Rule. I would earnestly recommend the right hon. Gentleman to take one or other of these courses. Before sitting down, I would call attention to the fact that the hon. Member for South Tyrone is not in his place to assist us on a question in which he professes to be so much interested.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): My hon. Friends are asking for special exceptions for this question relating to Ireland. I think we may fairly claim that the equality of which they speak should extend to Members of this House generally. I do not think any fair survey of what has already taken place this Session would lead to any other conclusion than that the course of affairs has tended very much in favour of the discussion of Irish questions, which have shut up, to a large extent, the discussion of English questions. We have discussed many Irish subjects—the Belfast lunatics among them. For questions connected with Ireland they have had in discussion their full share, and therefore I contend that we should have more time rather than the Irish Members who have already occupied much time. As to the Amendment, the specific reason why I understand my hon. Friend to desire this exception is to discuss that grand failure of last Session, the Land Purchase Bill, which confiscated a large sum of British money for the purpose of buying out the Irish landlords. We were afraid that the sop would work well among the tenants, and that our money would be spent very freely, but we are thankful to observe that that is not the case. We do not want our money spent in this way.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is discussing the merits of a particular Bill, and not the appropriation of a particular day.

MR. CONYBEARE: I apologise to you, Sir, but I was mentioning that as a reason for disagreeing with my hon. Friends. I hope it may be possible to get rid of the necessity for a Division. If the Government will come forward and say, "We have done our work; we have outlived our time, and we are perfectly ready to go to the country as soon as possible," I am sure that not one of us would make any further objection to the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman.

(6.3.) MR. JUSTIN McCARTHY (Londonderry): I would invite the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the suggestions made by my hon. Friends. Every one of these suggestions was fair, and the right hon. Gentleman might surely see his way to adopt at least one of them. We Irish Members are not responsible for any delay or muddling of the Business of this Session. The Business has been delayed and muddled by the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House bringing forward measures for Ireland which nobody in Ireland asked him for, and which, so far as I know, nobody in Ireland wants. Who in Ireland asks for such a measure of Local Self-Government as he has brought in, and who in Ireland is going to accept such a measure? We want to have nothing to do with it. Therefore, we are not responsible for the time of the House being taken up with measures which nobody wants, and nobody expects will be for the good of Ireland.

*(6.5.) MR. LEA (Londonderry, S.): I am sure the hon. Member for East Mayo has no wish to be unfair to my hon. Friend the Member for South Tyrone in saying that he has gone away and left them in the lurch when he knew this question was coming on. My hon. Friend left London last night without having the slightest idea that the matter would be brought forward to-day, and the least he could have done before hastily condemning my hon. Friend would have been to give him the necessary notice. I agree with hon. Members that nothing would be more unsatisfactory than to have an incomplete discussion upon the Motion of the hon. Member for Kerry. I have a good deal of sympathy with that Resolution, and should be extremely glad if the Government could give way.

(6.8.) MR. BLANE (Armagh, S.): The House has been sitting for three weeks and has been counted out three times. I have seen the Government take their Whips—

MR. SPEAKER: Order! order! That has no reference to the Amendment before the House.

MR. BLANE: Where is the necessity for taking our time up to the 29th of March?

MR. SPEAKER: Order! order!

MR. BLANE: The Government have made out no case for taking all the time up to the 29th March.

MR. SPEAKER: The remarks of the hon. Member are not relevant.

(6.10.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no right again to address the House, but it would be only courteous if I said a word about the suggestions that have been made by hon. Members below the Gangway. The proposal of the hon. Member for West Belfast to except Tuesday, the 29th of March, from the Motion, and the other proposal that the Twelve o'clock Rule should be suspended in favour of a particular Member, are both open to a fatal objection. If the exception is made in the case of one private Member, it is quite impossible to refuse it in the case of others. I have admitted the importance of the Motion which stands in the name of the hon. Member for Kerry, but that must not be taken as an expression of opinion on my part that the Motions of other hon. Members are not worthy of as full and as long a discussion as the Motion of the hon. Member for Kerry. It would not be possible for the Government to make an exception to the 29th of March unless they were prepared to make the same exception for every other Tuesday before Easter.

(6.12.) MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): The subject-matter of the Motion which my hon. Friend has given notice of for the 29th is one which will always be with the House while the Land Question in Ireland remains unsettled. I do not know how many weeks it has taken this House to pass the Land Purchase Act. Millions of money were placed at the disposal of the Purchase Commissioners to carry it out. Is all that to be allowed to run waste? Is all that time to be lost? The Purchase Act now is like a water-logged ship—it is useless; it has not been put in operation; and the Government themselves must see the desirability of arriving at some decision as to how it may be made workable. The discussion of a Motion like that of my hon. Friend the Member for Kerry would go, perhaps, some way towards enabling the Government to come to a decision as to how the difficulty may be met. If the Government agreed to the proposal of the hon. Member for West Belfast, they might find in the end that they would be expediting their own Business. The refusal of so moderate a request was not at all likely to cause this side of the House to be very friendly when appeals were made to them by the Government. I have often been struck with the callousness with which representations to the Government from these Benches have been met by Ministers as compared with the whining tone of appeal which Ministers are accustomed to adopt when in moments of difficulty they find themselves pressed for time, and embarrassed by the Business before the House.

Question put.

The House divided :—Ayes 129 : Noes 244.—(Div. List, No. 17.)

Main Question, as amended, again proposed.

(6.40.) MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I think I may now press the First Lord of the Treasury, as the Government is going to take two days practically for Government Business, as to whether he can see his way to make some arrangement by which a very important question—the proposed Gresham University—may have time for discussion. This question is one that concerns a large number of people in London, and to begin to discuss it at 11 o'clock, or even later, would be a very serious drawback. Of course, under the Standing Orders, Debate can go on till any hour in the morning; but as a rule the House will not attend to a discussion after 1 o'clock—in fact the next Resolution shows that they do not care to discuss anything after 12 o'clock.

MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston): I feel fully justified, from the facts I have stated, in moving that Tuesday, the 8th of March, be exempted from the operation of the Rule.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman has already spoken on the Main Question.

MR. CREMER: I understood that I should be able to move this Amendment.

MR. SPEAKER: No; the hon. Member is precluded from so doing by having already spoken on the Main Question.

MR. PICTON (Leicester): I should like to support the appeal of the hon. Member for Islington. The right hon. Gentleman often endeavours to conciliate the House. I think he should sometimes endeavour to conciliate the country as well. He knows from the importance and influential character of the deputation which waited on the Prime Minister to-day on this subject that the interest in this question is not confined to any one section of the House or to one school of politics. It is a non-political, non-party, and, I hope, non-sectarian question as well. There is a large portion of society interested in the progress of higher education who are alarmed lest a retrograde step should be taken in this matter. The crucial issue is now before us, and to say it is to be discussed by a weary House after 11 o'clock at night till 1 or 2 o'clock in the morning is really to make a mockery of it, and I hope the right hon. Gentleman will reconsider his position and accede to the appeal made to him from his own Party.

MR. R O B Y (Lancashire, S.E., Eccles) : I rise to suggest one way in which this difficulty can be met. If the right hon. Gentleman will give us an assurance that the Charter shall not be submitted to Her Majesty until a satisfactory opportunity has been given to the House of discussing it, that will probably meet the views of hon. Members.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : I am quite in accord with hon. Members who have spoken in thinking that the Government ought not to compel the House of Commons to discuss a question in which a large number of Members feel a very keen interest, under conditions which would render a fair discussion impossible. Of course, there might be a difference of opinion among hon. Members as to what constitutes fair discussion. But, at all events, I will say—though I cannot promise, cannot give a pledge to my hon. Friends that I will ask the House to adjourn Supply before 11 o'clock—I will not ask the House to sit till abnormal hours in the morning for the purpose of discussing the matter, nor would I endeavour to bring the Debate prematurely to a close if it were clearly the desire of the House to prolong it. Probably the discussion would be exhausted between 11 and 1, but if it were necessary that the Debate should be adjourned, I would consent to the Adjournment.

MR. J. DILLON (Mayo, E.) : Will not the Debate terminate at 12 o'clock under the Standing Orders of the House?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : Perhaps the hon. Gentleman is not aware that these Charters laid on the Table of the House do not come under the Twelve O'clock Rule, and, therefore, I think the general pledge I have given to the House will gratify both my hon. Friends and hon. Gentlemen who have spoken on the other side of the House.

MR. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.) : Will the right hon. Gentleman give two or three days' notice before the Indian Councils Bill is brought on?

MR. J. LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet) : Perhaps my right hon. Friend might be open to some compromise on this subject, which appears to be a subject of considerable interest, and obviously a hurried discussion in the small hours of the morning would hardly meet the requirements of the case. Can my right hon. Friend hold out any hope of this Motion being taken at 10 o'clock; it might then be disposed of by 12.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : Between 10 and 12 is practically the same as between 11 and 1.

Question put.

The House divided :—Ayes 282 ; Noes 60.—(Div. List, No. 18.)

Resolved, That until Easter the House do meet on Tuesday and Friday at Two o'clock. That the principal business at such Morning Sittings shall be Financial Business and proceedings on the Introduction and First Readings of Bills; and that the provisions of Standing Order 56 be extended to such Sittings.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

(SITTINGS OF THE HOUSE.)

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : Mr. Speaker, I now beg to move the second Motion which stands in my name, and only preface it with this remark—that I gather from what has been said that in putting the Motion down on the Paper I am only carrying out the wish of hon. Gentlemen in all parts of the House. It is not done so much—indeed, not at all—in the interests of the Government Business as to meet the convenience of the Members and of the officers of the House. The only difference between the Motion I have on the Paper and the Motion of last year is that the present Motion will make the Resolution a Standing Order, while the Resolution of last year was only a Sessional Order. I am inclined to think that the result of the experiment made last year is to create the conviction that the general convenience is best consulted by not continuing Debate until 1 o'clock, and hon. Members will perhaps agree that the modification made in the Rules last year should become part of the Standing Orders of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the sitting of the House at Nine o'clock be held subject to the provisions of Standing Order No. 1, which relate to the interruption of Business and the Adjournment of the House; that this Resolution be a Standing Order of the House; that Standing Order No. 8 be repealed"—(Mr. A. J. Balfour.)

DR. CLARK (Caithness): If you make it a Standing Order that the debate must terminate at 12 o'clock, a question can only have three hours' discussion. Private Members will only get three hours a night or six hours a week under the present form of the Resolution.

MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I am very pleased to find that the Twelve o'Clock Rule is to be adhered to on Tuesdays and Fridays. It is a great convenience to many hon. Members that contentious Business should not come on after 12 o'clock, as that enables them to catch their trains or other conveyances.

SIR G. TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): I gather that the House is of the same mind as it was last year, and therefore I shall not say any word in support of the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman, and still less in opposition to it, as I had the honour, last year, of acting with the Leader of the House in getting the change adopted for last Session. But I must say that there were two conditions attached by the House and accepted by the Leader of the House. The first was that it should be a Sessional Order; on that point I do not care to insist; but the other is a more important matter. The Government can, under the present Resolution, use Tuesdays and Fridays after the Morning Sittings for advancing Money Bills or Report of Supply. If the Government are willing to give an assurance that they will not use this hour, which private Members have surrendered, for the Business of Supply, I think the House will be prepared to accept the Resolution, probably without a Division.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I thought I did give that assurance in answer to a similar question, but I am quite willing to repeat it now.

Motion agreed to.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY — CIVIL SERVICES AND REVENUE DEPARTMENTS, 1821-2 (SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES.)

(In the Committee.)

Considered in Committee.

CLASS V.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a Supplementary sum, not exceeding £22,600, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1822, for the Expenses of Her Majesty's Embassies and Missions Abroad."

(7.8.) DR. CLARK (Caithness): I wish to call attention to the sum for the Boundary Commission between the Portuguese and the Chartered Company. I want to know why this money was not paid by the company instead of by the Imperial Government? I understand that those companies by their Charter would have to pay their own costs. These people have many powers; amongst others, the right to tax, and they are putting them on very severely. If that is so, why should this charge be upon the Imperial Exchequer? I should also like to know if the Commission has yet sat?

(7.10.) THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. J. W. LOWTHER, Cumberland, Penrith): The Commission has sat: they met in the autumn of last year, and arrangements were made between the representatives to carry out the necessary preliminaries. Major Levison is at present in this country, but he is about to return almost immediately to the East Coast of Africa, and the matter will be at once proceeded with. I believe the work of delimitation was carried out in consequence of the Anglo-Portuguese Convention, and at the respective cost of the two Governments.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

DR. CLARK: But why should it not be paid by the Chartered Company? We have not control over it.

MR. J. W. LOWTHER: They are only acting as our representatives.

DR. CLARK: Another matter to which I would wish to call the attention of the House is the item of £5,600 for outfits in consequence of the deaths of Lord Lytton and Sir William White. I would like to know how much these diplomatic changes cost? I think we should also get details of the Vote. But why should we pay for the removal of the horses and carriages of these gentlemen and pay for the new furniture which they think well to select? When these gentlemen remove from one place to another and some new official takes the place what I ask becomes of the furniture, &c.? We pay these men large salaries, we give them houses, and we spend a great deal of money upon them; why then should we be called upon to pay such charges as these? What becomes of the furniture? Is it sold, or do the butlers take charge of it?

*MR. J. W. LOWTHER: I am afraid the hon. Member has got on the wrong line of rails in reference to this matter. Those outfits are granted to Ambassadors, Ministers, Secretaries of Embassy and of Legation upon their going to a new post, and I believe that they only barely cover the expenses. When a Minister has to break up his establishment, these outfit grants cover his travelling and removal expenses: the expense he is put to in having to break up his establishment, the cost of having to settle down in a new position, and various costs incurred in many other ways. The hon. Member has asked for details as to the Vote which is due to the deaths which unfortunately took place in the last year in the ranks of the Diplomatic Service. Lord Dufferin on going to Paris will get £2,000 for outfit. These outfits have been fixed for a great number of years between the Treasury and the Foreign Office. They were inquired into by a Committee that sat some years ago on the Diplomatic Service Votes, and the Committee did not report otherwise than favourably.

Sir Clare Ford will get £1,250; Sir D. Wolff, £2,000; Lord Vivian, £2,500; Sir E. Monson, £650, and Mr. Egerton, £1,100. Last year the whole sum expended in outfits was £1,416, and the year before, although the sum down in the Estimates was £5,000, only £3,700 out of that was spent.

(7.15.) MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): The hon. Gentleman says that Lord Dufferin received £2,000 to cover his expenses on going from Rome to Paris, and that the money was expended in travelling and for his personal impedimenta. But why this discrepancy in the allowance if they are made for personal expenses? If we take distance into account they seem to follow no intelligible principle, for whilst Lord Dufferin gets £2,000 for going from Rome to Paris, Lord Vivian gets £2,500 for going from Brussels to Rome, while Mr. Egerton gets £1,100 for going from Paris to Greece. Again, Mr. Monson only gets £650, and it is obvious that if he has been properly paid these other gentlemen have been improperly paid, and that they have received too much. We poor people have travelled somewhat on the Continent however, and we know something about the expense of it, and I should be inclined, if it costs these gentlemen so much for travelling expenses, to suggest that the Government should consider the advisability of going to Messrs. Cook. From what the hon. Member has stated it would appear that removal of furniture has nothing to do with the grants, and that this is a species of general allowance made to Ambassadors and Ministers for going from one place to another. Under these circumstances I beg to move the reduction of the Vote by £2,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Item N, Outfits, be reduced by the sum of £2,000."—(Mr. Labouchere.)

(7.18.) MR. LEVESON-GOWER (Stoke-upon-Trent): I do not see upon what principle this money is given to Ambassadors and Ministers, and not extended to the junior members of the Diplomatic Service, who have to move about more frequently than the Ambassadors or Ministers, and who are paid a less salary.

(7.20.) MR. WOOTTON ISAACSON (Tower Hamlets, Stepney): I wish to ask the hon. Member whether Sir H. D. Wolff will receive an allowance for outfit on going from Bucharest to Madrid?

*(7.21.) MR. J. W. LOWTHER: With reference to the question asked by my hon. Friend, I have to say that I believe the usual course will be followed, and that on the transfer of Sir H. D. Wolff he would receive an outfit. I do not see anything extraordinary in it that hon. Members should laugh. I did not mean to say that the outfit was meant simply to cover the personal expenses of the Minister; it is also for the travelling expenses of his family, and the expense incurred in moving his own private furniture, and horses and carriages. The Minister's goods and chattels, the position he holds, and a great many other things are matters which the junior members of the Diplomatic Service do not have to deal with, entitle him to a larger sum. Therefore, it is perfectly obvious that the expenses to which an Ambassador or Minister is put in moving from one mission to another are relatively very much greater than those of the junior members. This scheme of outfits was settled upon after communication with the Treasury; it was investigated by a Committee of the House and approved, and the general principle upon which it is founded is about one-third of the salary attached to the post to which Her Majesty's Representatives are appointed.

(7.23.) MR. P. STANHOPE (Wednesbury): I wish to ask whether any inquiry was made on the part of the Foreign Office as to the items of expenditure before these gentlemen got to their posts? I understand how it may be desirable to pay the expenses of Ambassadors moving from one place to another; but I think advantage should not be taken of that for granting them a lump sum that is more than what is actually expended. I hope that when further sums are applied for in regard to these outfits the Under Secretary will be able to lay before the House more details, for I think he should show to the House that the money was actually expended.

MR. LEVESON-GOWER: The hon. Gentleman has not answered that part of my question which refers to junior members of the Service. I should think some amount should be paid them, and I should like if the Under Secretary would give us some assurance upon the point.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I can explain how I myself was treated. I was Second Secretary of Legation once, and had to go from London to Constantinople. I put in a statement as to how much it cost me. Now, Mr. Courtney, I am an honest man, and I put in exactly what it cost me in trains; but Mr. Cunningham, who was then at the head of the Financial Department of the Foreign Office, told me that I was to supply vouchers. I told him that if he insisted on vouchers the railway companies might not give them; but it was of no avail, and I had to appeal to Lord Russell, and pledge myself that I had actually expended the money in railway travelling from one point to another. It is evident this amount has nothing to do with the money spent, as the Under Secretary says it is based upon one-third of the salary. I admit that these men have a right to be paid their expenses, but we know that this is absolutely in excess; we know, and it has been admitted, that it does not depend upon the actual amount spent, and therefore I must persist in my Motion.

DR. CLARK: We have been told that this money was for outfit, and from the reply of the hon. Gentleman opposite it would appear that they did not get any outfit. In short, it is not for outfit at all.

(7.24.) DR. TANNER (Cork Co. Mid): It seems to me extraordinary the way in which these items are placed upon the Paper, and that more attention is not paid to details. More information should be given, and I, for one, think the House should ask for it before it votes away this extraordinary large sum without thoroughly understanding it.

(7.25.) MR. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.): I wish to observe that we had no explanation from the Under Secretary as to the way in which the outfit is calculated; he has simply told us that it is about one third of the salary paid. According to the hon. Member for Northampton, it would appear that there is some doubt about that point. Now, I am also an honest man, and I wish to tell the House that when I was Judge Advocate General, I was called upon to state exactly what I spent, and I endeavoured to act as fairly as I could. There is no reason why the same course should not be taken in this case, and why Ambassadors and Ministers should not do the same.

(7.27.) MR. ROBY (Lancashire, S.E. Eccles) : I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman, what is the date of the Committee to which he referred as having carried out this arrangement?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER : The Committee reported in 1870.

MR. ROBY : Are we to clearly understand that this money will not be used for the purchase of furniture? I confess I feel it would be much more satisfactory if the money were calculated upon some other scale than the amount of salary. This is a rough method of calculation, and not by any means so satisfactory as if the exact amount expended were recorded.

*(5.28.) MR. J. W. LOWTHER : I think I can explain the discrepancy which the hon. Member for Northampton has discovered. On his first appointment as Ambassador a gentleman receives a full outfit, which is roughly calculated at one-third of the salary attached to the post. If he is only transferred from one Embassy to another then he does not receive a full outfit; I think he then only receives one-half of the outfit. In the same way, if a gentleman proceeds from a Legation to an Embassy, he then receives a full outfit. If he proceeds to a Legation for the first time, he then receives a full outfit; but if from a Legation to a Legation, he only receives half. Such is the explanation of the discrepancy. In the case of Lord Vivian, for instance, he received a full outfit, but Sir Clare Ford did not receive a full outfit. Outfits include furniture, that covers not merely the cost of travelling, but also the cost of moving the family, servants, horses, carriages, and such furniture as the Ambassador wishes to move from one Mission to another. It is perfectly true that at the Chief Embassies there is a certain quantity of furniture which belongs to these Embassies, but it is of a very meagre character, and very much of the character which Government furniture is apt to be. And therefore the cost of the removal of old and the purchase of new furniture to make the new residence inhabitable is covered by the outfits which are given.

(7.32.) MR. LABOUCHERE : I think the hon. Gentleman has still failed to explain this matter. He says that when a gentleman is promoted from being a Minister to be an Ambassador, he receives one-half of the allowance that he would otherwise receive. The hon. Gentleman has said that Lord Dufferin received £2,000 on removal from Rome, where he had been an Ambassador, to Paris, where he is now an Ambassador; but that Sir Clare Ford had only received £1,200 on being transferred from Madrid, where he had been an Ambassador, to Constantinople, where he is also an Ambassador. But the explanation of the hon. Gentleman, I am bound to say, does not account for these discrepancies.

Question put.

The Committee divided :—Ayes 103; Noes 152.—(Div. List, No. 19.)

Original Question again proposed.

(7.33.) DR. CLARK : I think we should have some explanation with respect to this item of £3,000 relating to the Government of India.

(7.34.) MR. J. W. LOWTHER : The Government of India have hitherto been paying £10,000 a year towards the Mission to Persia; but lately they have represented to Her Majesty's Government that the Indian Government were paying the cost of the Agencies at Bushire and Meshed, which amounts to £16,000 a year, and they considered that the resources of India should not be taxed to a greater extent than £7,000 instead of £10,000 a year. And seeing that India pays on Agencies, etc., as much as £23,000 a year, and the Imperial Government only paid, roughly speaking, £12,000 a year, it was thought that it was only fair that that sum of £3,000 should be placed upon the Imperial Estimates.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(2.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a Supplementary sum, not exceeding £1,610, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1892, for the Expenses of the High Commissioner for South Africa."

(7.35.) DR. CLARK: I should like to have some explanation about this item of £1,000 for telegrams. I do not know of any burning question in South Africa which would cause so much expenditure upon telegrams. Last year there was one, but this year there was no burning question in South Africa, and yet we have the Estimate increased by 50 per cent. when there was no trouble in the country. I should like to get some reply in reference to this matter.

*(7.36.) SIR JOHN GORST: I am not quite so familiar with this Vote as my right hon. Friend the Under Secretary, but I am informed that the excess is due to the action of certain burghers in the South African Republic, who made a trek into territory in the direction of British Bechuanaland, or rather Matabeleland. This movement threatened to be inimical to British interests, and necessitated this large expenditure upon telegrams; and I say that money has been well spent. Owing to the vigorous intervention of Sir Henry Loch, and to the friendly co-operation of the South African Republic, that movement of the burghers entirely failed.

(7.39.) MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): I wish to know where is the Under Secretary? I think this is a courtesy that he should not be here to give us the information we want. We want to know about these telegrams. We are not satisfied with the explanation given by the right hon. Gentleman, who, with great candour, says he knows nothing about them. [Sir JOHN GORST: No, no.] Yes, he got a paper from the Colonial Office, took it from his portfolio, and then read it with very great difficulty. That is not the way to do business when we are dealing with public money. I certainly will move a reduction of this Vote in order that it may be deferred until the Under Secretary for the Colonies is present. If I cannot do so, I shall move a Resolution. Am I in order in moving it?

THE CHAIRMAN: Yes.

MR. MAC NEILL: Very well. Then I beg to move that the Vote be reduced by £2,000, to show my sense first of this reprehensible manner of spending public money, and, secondly, for the purpose of making the servants of the Crown do their duty instead of doing the work of the First Lord of the Treasury by electioneering in the country. In the late Mr. W. H. Smith's time such a thing would not have occurred. I would ask the First Lord of the Treasury to be good enough to give us some explanation, if he can, why the Under Secretary for the Colonies has not been in his place to-day or for the last week.

*(7.42.) SIR JOHN GORST: I hope the hon. Member will withdraw his Motion. I am the Minister of the Crown responsible for this Estimate. I gave a reply which has satisfied the hon. Member who asked the question. I did not say I did not know anything about it. I have said all I know about it, and I think I gave what the hon. Member who asked the question considers a full and clear explanation. I hope, therefore, the hon. Member will not persevere with his Motion, as it would be indirectly a Vote of Censure on myself, who, however inadequately, in the absence of the Under Secretary of State, have replied to the question. But if the Under Secretary of State had been in his place he would not have said more than I have said on the subject.

(7.50.) DR. TANNER: The right hon. Gentleman, in a most extraordinary speech, tells us that the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies could not do the work half as well as the right hon. Gentleman himself. [Sir John Gorst: No, no.] Accordingly I wish to point out to the House—what we have been trying to impress upon you from these Benches—that a great number of the right hon. Gentlemen opposite fill ornamental places, and that their services can be very easily dispensed with. I never saw a more amusing state of affairs in this Committee of Supply before. I hope, in view of what has taken place on the present occasion, that, in the first place, responsible Ministers will see their way when they have to come to this House to ask for public money so that they will be able to definitely tell us what are the things on which this money has been expended, without all this hugger-mugger on the Treasury Bench; and, again, I hope this Committee will see, what we have endeavoured frequently to point out, that a great many of these posts filled by Members of Her Majesty's Government and the supporters of Her Majesty's Government could be very easily dispensed with.

(7.57.) MR. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.): There is a certain amount of force in what has been said about the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies being absent; but his place could not be better filled than by the right hon. Gentleman opposite. I hope, therefore, the hon. Gentleman will not go to a Division.

(7.58.) MR. MAC NEILL: I am not going to persevere with this Motion, and I do not wish to cast any blame upon the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury in any way. At the same time, I think it would have been more courteous if the First Lord were to answer a question asked in reference to an absent Under Minister, and state why the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies is not in his place. When this Vote comes on I wish to know are the Under Secretaries—especially the Under Secretary for the Colonies—appointed for the transaction of Public Business and to act in the public interest, or whether the Under Secretary for the Colonies is receiving a salary of £2,000 a year to stump for the Government out of doors? I wish to know which is his business—is his business to be here on the Treasury Bench to answer me, or is he to be down in the country electioneering?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If I did not answer the question before, it was because I thought an answer had been very amply given by my right hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury. No doubt I am responsible in this House for seeing that the Business of the House is fully, as well as properly, discharged. No doubt my right hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies would have been in his place had there been anything on the Paper to indicate that any question of importance would arise in reference to this Vote.

MR. MAC NEILL: Oh, this is very important.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If the hon. Gentleman will allow me to proceed. A small Debate has arisen, not a Debate on the question of policy, and I think it will be admitted that no more able substitute than my right hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury could have been found. It would undoubtedly be a very unfortunate state of things if an important Debate on matters of policy arose in the absence of the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, or if the military question were raised in the absence of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War. But neither of these things has occurred, and I hope the hon. Gentleman will not press his point.

DR. CLARK: I am very well satisfied with the explanation of the right hon. Gentleman, though I should like to have an explanation of the appearance of the items of expenditure in February and March last year on this Vote. I should also like an explanation of the item of £160 to a gentleman who has a pension as a post-captain in the Navy as well as his salary as secretary.

*SIR JOHN GORST: In consequence of this gentleman receiving retired Naval pay, 10 per cent. is deducted from his salary. Sir Graham Bower is a gentleman of very great ability, who has held office for nearly eight years, and his salary is only £500, rising by increments of £20 to £700. We propose to grant him this personal allowance in consideration of his long service and high ability.

MR. MAC NEILL: In the absence of the Under Secretary for the Colonies, I wish to bear testimony to what the right hon. Gentleman said as to the Secretary to the High Commissioner. His duties are great, his work is responsible, his intelligence is conspicuous, and he deserves any recognition that can be given him.

DR. TANNER: It is advisable in the public interest that when gentlemen draw large sums of money it should be put down in order that we may know the extent of these extraordinary grants. If the whole of these items paid to public servants were placed before the House, the House would be in a better position to judge, and be better able to modify and check extravagance. Again and again we have called attention to the slip-shod manner in which these Estimates are presented.

MR. WALLACE (Edinburgh, E.): I am not at all satisfied with the excuses that have been given for the absence from the House of the Under Secretary for the Colonies. I think he ought to have been here to attend to any questions on these Estimates. There has been no explanation given. We are told he has left a good substitute. I do not deny that. The Secretary to the Treasury is a substitute, and something more. If it is to be intended as a tribute to the abilities of the Secretary to the Treasury, I think he might—very profitably to this House—be the sole occupant of the Treasury Bench. But that is no answer. The Under Secretary ought to have been here; and if his absence is to be explained away in the manner suggested, why should we not abolish two or three of the number of Under Secretaries who sit on these Benches? It is no use telling us that we have a very versatile and able gentleman representing him. We knew that before; we have known it all along. I see that the Secretary to the Treasury has been re-inforced by the Junior Lord of the Admiralty. He becomes extremely strong with such supplement. I hope my hon. Friends will continue their opposition to this Vote, and I shall support them simply to mark my offended sense of the absence of the Under Secretary for the Colonies. Where is he? What is he doing? I am told he is in the Chertsey Division. Why is he not here to attend to the Estimates? His absence will cause much larger questions. If he can be in the Chertsey Division without detriment to the interests of his office, the office might very profitably be abolished, and we should leave the Secretary to the Treasury to attend to the whole work.

Question put.

The Committee divided :—Ayes 131 ; Noes 61.—(Div. List, No. 20.)

Resolutions to be reported.

THE IMPERIAL BRITISH EAST AFRICA COMPANY.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

*MR. J. W. LOWTHER: As this Vote appears for the first time in the Estimates, I think the Committee will probably expect some explanations of the reasons which have led the Government to propose it. I can give them in a sentence, if I say that this Vote is submitted to the House in continuation and amplification of the policy which for many years past has actuated Her Majesty's Governments and the country in dealing with the suppression of the Slave Trade in East and in Central Africa. This is not a new policy; it is a policy that has been carried out by successive Governments during a long period of years, not spasmodically, but constantly. It has met with the general support not only of this House, but with the general support of the country. It is, I think I may fairly say, part of the traditional policy of this country. So far as public efforts are concerned, Her Majesty's ships have held the sea on the East Coast of Africa for many years, and have been engaged in suppressing the sea-borne Slave Trade. The Public Purse has supplied funds, to a large extent, to keep these ships on the sea—to keep them coaled and efficient, and that at a time when we had no stations from Aden to Natal, no Protectorates on the East Coast of Africa, and no responsibilities. And whilst the public has not been slow to find means for suppressing the Slave Trade, private exertions have ably seconded public effort. The missionaries sent out by private persons, and especially by the Scotch people, have penetrated into Equatorial Africa charged with the duty of christianising those vast populations, and of exhorting them to put an end to this inhuman traffic. And I think we may fairly claim that our public and private efforts have been attended with a large measure of success. Some twenty years ago the export of slaves from that sea coast was reckoned at about 20,000 per annum. That export or sea-borne trade in slaves has now almost ceased. At any rate, it has diminished so as to be now a very small quantity. But whilst the export trade has ceased, it is notorious that the home trade still continues. We have scotched the snake, but we have not yet killed it. And I think I may ask permission of the Committee to explain what I mean by the export trade and the home trade in slaves. What happens, as I understand, is this: that in order that goods should be brought to the coast from the central regions of Africa, the slaves are collected and raided, and are used as porters to bring down the goods. When they arrive at the coast the slaves are a marketable article. They can either be exported to the islands lying off the coast of Africa, to Arabia, or elsewhere; or if there is no demand for their export, they can be sold just as cattle or beasts of burden can be sold, or utilised for the return journey to Central Africa. This internal trade in slaves attracted the attention especially of the Government of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, the Member for Midlothian, as early as May, 1885, and I find that on the 25th May, 1885, Lord Granville wrote a very interesting and important Despatch to Sir Edward Malet, in which he said—

"I have to request your Excellency to state that the supposition that Her Majesty's Government have no intention of opposing the German schemes of colonisation in the neighbourhood of Zanzibar is absolutely correct. Her Majesty's Government, on the contrary, view with favour these schemes, the realisation of which will entail the civilisation of large tracts over which hitherto no European influence has been exercised; the co-operation of Germany with Great Britain in the work of the suppression of the slave gangs; and the encouragement of the efforts of the Sultan both in the extinction of the Slave Trade and in the commercial development of his dominions. I should wish your Excellency, while speaking in this sense to the Chancellor, to inform him that a scheme has been started in this country under which, if it is realised, the efforts of German enterprise may be supported indirectly by British enterprise. You will explain that some prominent capitalists have originated a plan for a British settlement in the country between the coast and the lakes which are the sources of the White Nile, and for its connection with the coast by a railway. In order to obtain fair security for their outlay they propose to endeavour to procure concessions from the Sultan of a comprehensive character. Her Majesty's Government have the scheme under their consideration, but they would not support it unless they were fully satisfied that every precaution was taken to insure that it would in no way conflict with the interests of the territory that has been taken under a German protectorate, nor affect that part of the Sultan's dominions lying between that territory and the sea."

Now, Sir, that shows that as early as May, 1885, Lord Granville and the Government over which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian presided had taken this important matter into their careful consideration. They were aware that it was proposed by a number of gentlemen to develop that portion of Eastern Africa, especially by the method of making a railway which would run from the coast to the Victoria Nyanza, and the only condition apparently, judging from this Despatch which Her Majesty's Government at that time attached to the proposal, was that the sphere of delimitation between the German Government and ourselves should be distinctly laid down. Now, Sir, I would ask permission of the Committee to make a brief review of the events that have occurred since that date. The agreement which Lord Granville had contemplated in 1885 became a fact in 1886. The German Government and our own Government arrived at an agreement as to the line of demarcation between their respective spheres of influence in East Africa, and the line was drawn from the mouth of the River Umbo, passing in a north-westerly direction along the northern slopes of the Mount Kilima Njaro, and finally striking Lake Victoria Nyanza at latitude 2° south. In 1888 Her Majesty's present Government granted a Charter to the Imperial British East Africa Company, following the example which had been set them two years before by the Government of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, who granted a Charter to the Niger Company for the development of the Niger district of Africa, and following, as to many of its clauses, the clauses of that Charter almost word for word. In the year 1890 the British East Africa Company pushed into the interior and sent Captain Lugard on a mission to Uganda. In 1890, after he had arrived at Uganda, a further agreement was arrived at between Her Majesty's Government and the German Government, which accepted the line already laid down, confirmed it, and delineated the spheres of influence further west and in other directions. In 1890, Her Majesty's Government also declared a protectorate over Zanzibar, and in 1891 the Sultan of Zanzibar decreed that the Slave Trade in his dominions should be gradually extinguished. I quote those events to show that in 1891 and in 1892 we stand in a very different position from what we did in 1885. We have acquired vast new interests in East Africa, and with these new interests we have also taken upon ourselves new responsibilities. In the meanwhile, in Europe this matter of the internal Slave Trade had attracted considerable attention. Cardinal Lavigerie, in a series of very powerful addresses delivered in Brussels, had arrested the attention of philanthropists to this matter. He proposed that it might be dealt with by the institution of a Volunteer Army and by the absolute prevention of the importation of arms. Those matters were submitted to Her Majesty's Government; and whilst they did not consider that either of those two plans was capable of adoption, or at all events of execution, it was chiefly at the instigation of Her Majesty's Government and the German Government that the Belgian King convoked the Brussels Conference, which led to the signature of the Brussels Act in 1890. Now, I must ask the attention of the Committee for a few moments to the first Article of the Brussels Act. The first Article reads thus:—

"The Powers declare that the most effective means for counteracting the Slave Trade in the interior of Africa are the following:—

1. Progressive organisation of the administrative, judicial, religious, and military services in the African territories, placed under the sovereignty or protectorate of civilized nations.
2. The gradual establishment in the interior, by the responsible power in each territory, of strongly occupied stations in such a way as to make their protective or repressive action effectively felt in the territories devastated by man-hunters.

Mr. J. W. Louther

3. The construction of roads, and in particular of railways connecting the advanced stations with the coast, and permitting easy access to the inland waters and to the upper reaches of streams and rivers which are broken by rapids and cataracts, so as to substitute economical and speedy means of transit for the present means of portage by men.
4. The establishment of steamboats on the inland navigable waters and on the lakes, supported by fortified posts established on the banks.
5. The establishment of telegraphic lines assuring the communication of the posts and stations with the coast and with the administrative centres.
6. Organisation of expeditions and flying columns to keep up the communication of the stations with each other and with the coast, and to assure the security of the roadways.
7. Restriction of the importation of firearms, at least of modern pattern, and ammunition throughout the entire extent of the territories infected by the Slave Trade."

That is the first and the leading Article of the Brussels Act. It does not appear, so far as I have been able to discover, that there has been much criticism, either in this House or outside this House, of the policy which Her Majesty's Government pursued in putting their signature to that Act. Such as it is, the criticism appears to be of a favourable character. I find that my hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Bryce) last year referred to it in these terms. He said—

"I have listened with great interest to the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman (Sir James Ferguson, then Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs), and I hope this Convention (the Brussels Act) will be carried through, and the adhesion of the Foreign Powers obtained. I think we must all feel that there is no matter to which the combined action of the Powers ought to be more earnestly addressed than the suppression of the Slave Trade, and I am certain there is no part of the Government's policy which will receive more hearty and more unanimous support."

That being the attitude of hon. Gentlemen opposite and of the country, we have, in laying this Vote on the Table, only carried out the principle which, in signing the Brussels Act, we accepted. The Brussels Act emphasises and particularises our policy, and not only our policy, but the policy of Europe in its method of dealing with the Slave Trade. The Brussels Act gives the imprimatur of the assent of Europe to certain methods of dealing with this trade. The countries which have signed this Act have not only put their hand to it, but they have undertaken, by so signing, new responsibilities and new duties. That being so, Her Majesty's Government had to consider in what method the Act is to be carried out, and hon. Gentlemen will observe that two alternatives are suggested. One is the establishment of fortified posts at different parts of Equatorial Africa, and the establishment of flying columns, starting from these fortified posts, to deal with the slave traders as they come down from the centre to the coast. The other is that specially laid down in the third paragraph of the first Article—namely, the construction of roads, and in particular of railways. To the former alternative there are many objections. In the first place, if we fix certain military posts, it is quite possible—nay, it is easy—for slave raiders and slave gangs to avoid these posts. The radius which can be covered from these posts is only of a limited character, and as soon as it is known what the radius is, the slave raiders will get the length of the radius, and they will avoid them. Again, the establishment of military posts is a matter which would involve enormous cost to this country, and further the establishment of posts of a military character would be very likely to tend to the irritation of the populations amongst whom those posts were established. Further, the benefits to be derived from the establishment of such posts would be only of a transitory character, because the probability would be that the moment the military posts were withdrawn the slave raiding would recommence and continue as hitherto. In favour of the latter course—namely, of opening up the country by means of a railway from the coast to Lake Victoria Nyanza—there are certain considerations to be looked at. In the first place it is a peaceful method of dealing with the difficulty. If the railway is a success the benefits of it will be of a lasting and not of a temporary character. The locomotive, in fact, by means of competition, will kill both the caravan and the kidnapper. I think I have already, at an earlier stage, sufficiently explained how it is that the Slave Trade exists. It meets a natural demand, the demand for porterage. The cost of porterage to the interior of Africa, to Uganda, and the coasts of the Lake Victoria Nyanza is enormous. I believe it is reckoned about £300 a ton. It is impossible to obtain animals to carry the burdens, because they are killed by the tsetse fly. By means of a railway we should find ourselves able to substitute the locomotive in the place of the caravan and the kidnapper. Whilst, on the one hand, we should open up the interior of the country to our own commerce, on the other hand, by the very competition of the railway, we produce a means which must kill—must effectually kill—any further continuance of the slave traffic, slave raiding, and slave porterage. The slave routes lie chiefly from the east side of the Lake Victoria Nyanza down to the coast in the neighbourhood of Mombasa and northward, and also from the north-west of the Lake Victoria Nyanza down the western side of the lake to the southern portion. Now, if a railway is built going from Mombasa to the Lake Victoria Nyanza you tap at once the former of these two localities, and at the same time enabling ourselves, at a comparatively moderate cost, to place steamers upon the Lake Victoria Nyanza—a lake, by the way, which ought rather to be called a sea, because it is in acreage, I believe, as large as Scotland—and these steamers, by trading round the lake and thus killing the slave porterage by their competition, would bring the commerce down not only from the district between the lake and the coast, but also from the district immediately round the Lake Victoria Nyanza and to the west and north of it. I do not know that I need refer at any great length to the characteristics of Uganda. Many travellers have explored the country, and we have the record of their travels. Uganda has been called "the pearl of Africa." It is the only Christian community in Central Africa. The King is a Christian King. It is surrounded by a large Mahomedan population. We have many missionary establishments situated in Uganda. The people of Uganda are described as a fine race of men ready to work, and in Uganda traces of former civilisation have been discovered, which may possibly again bring forth good fruit if opportunity is offered to open up the country. The question then resolves itself into this: Are we prepared to go on with the traditional policy of this country, or are we prepared to reverse it? Are we content to sign a document like the Brussels Act, which reads very well and for which we obtained considerable credit, and are we not prepared to follow it up? The Governments of other countries have already taken steps in the direction in which Her Majesty's Government now ask the House to proceed. The Government of Belgium contributes no less than £80,000 a-year towards the administration of the Congo State.

MR. LABOUCHERE: The King of the Belgians.

MR. J. W. LOWTHER: Well, the King contributes no less than £80,000. The German Imperial Government have spent large sums in developing that portion of their sphere of influence, and hitherto Great Britain has done nothing. That being the case, last summer Her Majesty's Government and the Imperial British East Africa Company entered into communications with reference to the making of a railway from Mombasa to the Victoria Nyanza. Proposals were made that Her Majesty's Government should grant a subsidy; that they should give a guarantee for the railway. The communications proceeded for some little time, but eventually the Chancellor of the Exchequer thought it was better to proceed with great caution, and that it would be better to have a survey—an ample and full survey—made of the district that it was intended the railway should go through. A Vote, therefore, was placed on the Paper at the end of last Session; but, as the Committee will no doubt remember, a pledge was given by the right hon. Gentleman the then Leader of the House that no contentious measures should be taken after a certain date, but as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby held that this was a contentious measure, Her Majesty's Government withdrew it. At the same time the then Leader of the House said that the Government would bring it before the House at the earliest opportunity this Session. In the meanwhile, Her Majesty's Government, in order that the valuable winter months should not be lost during which the work in the lower regions near the coast could be carried on, arranged with the British East Africa Company that a survey should be at once commenced. Her Majesty's Government appointed, as the Papers will show, two surveyors, who are now engaged in that task. The British East Africa Company undertook to pay the expenses. Her Majesty's Government at the same time undertook that they would bring this Vote before the House at the earliest opportunity, and use their best endeavours to get the House to accept it. The survey has proceeded. It has already covered, from the last reports we have had, 150 miles. It has reached a place called Tsavo. Out of the 150 miles between the coast and Tsavo, along the Teita route, it appears that only 15 are of a difficult character. The rest are comparatively easy. No doubt there are difficulties in the way. There is one part of the territory which goes by the name of the Mau Escarpment, which is near the lake, in which there will be considerable difficulty. There is, prima facie, no reason to suppose that the railway cannot be carried the whole distance. At all events, I think it will be recognised that Her Majesty's Government have proceeded tentatively and cautiously in this matter; and when the survey is complete, and when the report of the survey reaches this country, Her Majesty's Government and the public will then be in a better position to ascertain whether the railway can be completed and carried through, and, if so, at what cost this work can be carried out. The question lies in a nutshell. We stand at the parting of the ways. If we do nothing now we go backwards, because it is perfectly obvious that in consequence of the great cost of maintaining Captain Lugard and those who are with him in Uganda, it is impossible for the British East Africa Company or any Company, or for Her Majesty's Government, to keep Captain Lugard there. He would therefore be withdrawn. If he were withdrawn it requires no great amount of prophecy to see that the Mahomedans and those who are on the outskirts of this Christian community of Uganda will at once attack it. The missionaries who are now settled in Uganda will probably be the first to be sacrificed. At all events it will give a spur to the Slave Trade which the establishment at Uganda is already, in some measure, stopping. It will give a fresh spur to the trade which it will be very difficult—nay impossible—to put an end to by simply dealing with it on the coast. If we desire to go forward in what I have called the traditional policy of this country the way is clear before us. The means have been pointed out by the unanimous voice of Europe, as expressed in the Brussels Act. The cost, compared with the vast cost we have been put to in maintaining ships off the East Coast of Africa, is comparatively cheap. And, by adopting the alternative which Her Majesty's Government propose, we shall show that our vaunted philanthropy is not a sham, and that our professions of humanitarianism are not the merest hypocrisy.

*(9.27.) MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): Mr. Courtney, I rise to say a few words on this which I consider a most important Vote, and one which, if agreed to, will carry very important consequences indeed. I have generally been a supporter of the policy of Her Majesty's Government in regard to East Africa; but I have always understood that there were two principles laid down by the Government with regard to which I have always been in agreement with them. They are that this country cannot take part in any armed interference in those countries which are brought within her sphere of influence; and, secondly, that they would not attempt to develop and open up these countries by expenditure from the British Exchequer. Suggestions have been made in both these directions during the negotiations during the last five years with respect to Nyassaland and other parts of Africa. The Government, so far as I know, absolutely negatived proposals placed before them in either direction, and I entirely agree with them. To-night we have had a most important statement by the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs in explanation of this Vote. I think, if I may say so, that the first part of his speech was devoted to showing that the policy which Her Majesty's Government had adopted in this Vote is merely a continuation of their previous policy, and the policy of past Governments. But towards the conclusion of his speech he stated what appeared to me to be a much more accurate description of the policy now being pursued, when he described the introduction and passing of this Vote as a "parting of the ways." He assumed completely the responsibility of Her Majesty's Government in this matter, and did not attempt to lay it on the East Africa Company; and, probably, never was so important a departure submitted to the judgment of the House, without any such adequate information as would enable hon. Members of the House to judge of it being afforded. I think we are entitled to ask for more details for the proper consideration of the question. At first we were asked not to look upon the Company as a purely commercial body; but it really stands in the same position as other Chartered Companies in Africa, and exactly in the same position as the Chartered Company in Borneo; substantially all the chartered companies are identical. The question then arises, was this Company specially charged with the repression of the Slave Trade? Like the other companies it has to discourage to the best of its power, and as far as practicable abolish by degrees, any system of slavery or domestic servitude that exists. The clause dealing with this says that the Company "shall to the best of its power discourage, and so far as practicable abolish slavery;" but that is practically the same clause as appears in other Charters. I am not one of those who object to giving these Charters; I never attempted to describe the work of Chartered Companies as "filibustering by proxy," to quote a phrase once used by a Member of the Government. An attack on the Borneo Company with regard to this very clause was led by the Secretary to the Treasury and supported by the speech and vote of the First Lord of the Treasury; yet here is the East Africa

Company with a similar clause, certainly not stronger, but possibly somewhat weaker in regard to its application, and, therefore, I think we may take it that this Company is in no way specially charged with duties in regard to the repression of the Slave Trade. If it be alleged that that object would be specially served by the construction of a railway through this district, the reply must be that there is really and absolutely no information to support that view. One hon. Member said that there were several slave routes through this district; but so far as our information goes there is really nothing to bear out that statement. I believe the condition of things is all the other way, and that the slave routes, instead of going through the district of the railway goes to the south of it. There is absolutely no slave traffic from Nyanza to Mombasa. Mr. Jackson, who was a surveyor to the British East Africa Company, read a paper at the Royal Geographical Society—and he was followed by a missionary from Uganda—and he stated that the slave routes and trade routes ran all through the German territory round the southern side of Kilima-Njaro. He also said that it was a good route for a railway; but that a railway was impossible because it was through German territory. But this is quite a case in which we are absolutely devoid of information. With regard to the first article of the Brussels Conference I think the hon. Gentleman stretches it to its utmost limits. If everything in that first article could be carried out Africa would be civilised, and the Slave Trade would be done entirely away with. But what I say is that it has not yet been shown that the first work obligatory upon this country is the construction of this railway; nor has it been shown that the alternative, as the hon. Member put it, which we are to adopt was the construction of military posts or the construction of a railway. In fact, if we build the railway we must be prepared to protect it. As I understand, the country is one which presents great physical difficulties, and that it is depopulated by some of the most savage people of Africa. I got a letter only yesterday upon the subject from an engineer who was in favour of these railways; but he said at the same time the Government must be prepared to fortify their railway, which might be done

"by making the stations fortresses, and that the signal boxes should be constructed on the model of the Martello towers with guns raking the railway up and down."

Another argument that is used is the commercial argument. We are, of course, all anxious for new markets for British goods. Uganda is the most prosperous part of the district—but the trade routes with rich and prosperous Uganda are not in the direction of this railway, but are either northward through the Nile or southward through the territory which is now under the German sphere of influence. The Government has laid no information upon this subject before us. We should have Captain Lugard's Report on Uganda before us so that we might actually test the value not only of the commercial aspect of the question, and as to the Slave Trade aspect, but also the important political aspect. The Government are endeavouring to take possession of the territory of Uganda and to commit the British Exchequer to a large expenditure of money for the construction of a railway from the coast up to Uganda, in order to hold permanently the political position of that country. But the question of holding Uganda must be decided long before the four or five years in which the railway could be constructed. The Committee ought therefore to have information to enable it to judge—first, in reference to the Slave Trade, whether the new policy and the construction of this railway would really diminish it to any appreciable extent; next, whether the Government intend, if this Vote passes, or when the railway is constructed, to withdraw the cruisers that watch the slavers on the East Coast of Africa. Further, we should have a clear statement as to what the Government, and the Government that succeeds it, are really committed to by this Vote. Substantially the Chancellor of the Exchequer gave us more or less an answer, through a question put last week, that we were only committed to a preliminary survey; but I think we should get a very clear statement, as that one is rather divergent from the statement by Lord Salisbury in the Blue Book, which states that the money asked for and now to be granted, was not for the survey merely, but for the construction of the railway.

*<sup>(9.50.)</sup> MR. GEORGE WYNDHAM (Dover): The hon. Gentleman who has just concluded his speech is quite correct in saying that we are now at the parting of the ways. That opinion is held upon both sides of the House; and, that being so, it is surely a matter of curiosity that hon. Members sitting upon this side should be still in the dark as to whether we are to be accompanied in the way we propose to follow, or whether we are to be allowed to pursue it alone. It is quite true that last July a most bellicose attitude was assumed towards this proposal by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby. He described it as matter in the highest degree contentious in its nature; but if the hon. Member who has just sat down may be taken as expressing the views upon that side of the House, it would appear that, abandoning the attitude of absolute hostility, they have adopted one that may be called the attitude of qualified assent or qualified dissent, and that they hope to shunt this question from the position which it now holds in the mind of the people, so that, in the event of obtaining office, they may be able to snap their fingers at the obligations which we believe this country is under in regard to the Slave Trade. The last speaker said that he hoped, whatever the result, neither this Government nor its successor would be absolutely committed to the policy of combating the Slave Trade.

MR. BUCHANAN: I said nothing of the sort; I said that neither this Parliament nor its successor would be committed to the policy of constructing this railway.

MR. WYNDHAM: Then are we now to understand that hon. Members opposite do acknowledge that a new and fresh responsibility and a heavy obligation has been laid upon the Government in consequence of the train of events, beginning with the Despatch of Lord Granville in May,

1885, and culminating in what was practically the ratification of the Act of the Brussels Treaty which was announced at the beginning of the Session? If these obligations are admitted, then this country is in a very different position to any we have hitherto occupied. If it were true that that Conference at Brussels, in which, for the first time, Mahomedan Powers joined hands with European Powers, undertook obligations towards the Slave Trade, then surely we should stand for ever in the pillory as the most Pickaniffian of political hypocrites, if we were to disregard all that has taken place, and proceed exactly as we have hitherto proceeded. If the Brussels Act has any meaning, new obligations have been imposed, and it is our duty to take some action in the British sphere of influence now occupied by the British Imperial East Africa Company. The hon. Member who last spoke drew a comparison between that Company and others, and said that they practically stood upon all-fours, and that if it was the duty of the Government to assist or countenance the East Africa Company in combating the Slave Trade, it might equally be their duty to assist and countenance by grant the South African Company, and, I suppose, also the Niger Company. The hon. Member said the obligation could be no greater. But surely the obligation to fight was greater in face of the enemy than where no enemy was apparent. I think it can hardly be controverted that the Slave Trade exists in East Africa in a greater degree than in any other district over which Great Britain is paramount. In South Africa a large white population renders exceptional measures less obligatory. In West Africa the sea-borne traffic is extinct. In East Africa Great Britain is paramount, and apparently it is the only place in which she can fulfil the new obligations placed upon her by the Berlin Conference. It is in this part of the country that the Government must act, and the reason for our acting is further enforced by the fact that if we do not act nobody else can. There Great Britain is supreme, and there, apparently, we can alone carry out our obligations. Last Session questions were addressed to the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs in order that a clear distinction might be arrived at between a sphere of influence and a Protectorate. But, setting on one side the fact that over a strip of 10 miles we hold a Protectorate, it is improbable that the electors of this country, or the taxpayers of other countries who have followed our lead, will seize a distinction which hon. Members opposite found difficult to seize, and it is inevitable that the Germans, who paid large sums of money to do their duty, will not hold this country quit of its obligations if we endeavour to ride off on so shallow a plea. It is in East Africa or nowhere this Government must act; and the reason for acting is further enforced by reason of the fact that if we do not act nobody else can. We have assumed responsibilities for the whole of that territory, and neither Germany, nor Italy, nor any other Power can make good our laches in this matter. The Germans have expended large sums of money to aid their Company north of the Juba River; the Italians are assisting the Royal Italian Company; and, therefore, we are between two countries that are assisting their companies, and our territory, if we neglect our obligations, will become a sort of cesspool, if I may say so, for all the refuse that is cleared off the surrounding territories. We have also to consider that in this part of Africa the Slave Trade is at its worst; in one of the letters addressed to the Foreign Office and the Treasury, it is stated that the seaboard, to which the Italian, British, and German spheres of influence extend, is practically now the only outlet for slavery, and that in the interior is the source from which that evil springs. If we have a duty to do we must do it there. It is really a curious fact that we are not aware whether the regular Opposition in this House accept that obligation or repudiate it. If they accept it—I will proceed on that hypothesis—it is for them now to decide what instrument or method should be adopted by this Government, along with other Governments, in order to give effect to the policy initiated by Lord Granville, carried on by Lord Salisbury, and now, it seems, assented to by the Opposition in this House. It is not necessary for me to point out that the alternative is really between the construction of a railway and the employment of a military post and flying columns. The hon. Member who has last spoken, drew a gloomy picture of this part of Africa, and stated that the difficulty of constructing a railway there would be very great; but a study of the map does not endorse that view. I have studied the map, and made myself acquainted with the views of those who have been in that country; and they tell me that the first 150 miles is a fair sample of the first 360 miles; and that out of the first 150 miles only 15 miles present any engineering difficulties. A railway will be more cheap and peaceful than any military occupation of the country; and, naturally, this House should pause before it contemplates placing soldiers in East Africa, because they must be black soldiers, and it may be considered a somewhat doubtful blessing for that land to place such a body of men upon it. A railway, therefore, as I have pointed out, would not only combat the Slave Trade more effectually than any occupation of the country at the present time, but it would also give some promise of a final cure of this evil. Having taken the trouble to visit the offices of this Company, I have been informed that according to their calculation they would be able to convey a ton of goods for a maximum rate of £3 by railway, and that the same quantity now costs £300 as carried by porters. No caravan could compete on these terms; and human porters could no longer be used in order to encourage the Slave Trade. The Slave Trade could no more exist under these circumstances than could piracy when letters of marque ceased to be given to legitimate privateers on the cessation of war. It appears to me that no question of employing or not employing this Company need be considered by the House. If it is our duty to carry out the provisions of the Brussels Conference, and if the construction of a railway after this survey should prove to be the best method of carrying out those provisions, then I say we should not hesitate to combat the Slave Trade by making a railway through this territory. The Party represented by hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite are extremely fond of posing as more strenuous friends of humanity than the Party to which I belong on this side of the House. I hold in my hand a document entitled "Twenty-five Reasons for Supporting the Liberal Party," and in the very front of this document I see it stated that this country is to support the Liberal Party "because they abolished negro labour in the British dominions." Surely they could appeal to the country on more practical and less antiquated grounds if they were to say they were prepared to support the policy which affords the only chance of combating the Slave Trade where it is worst, where it can be most easily suppressed by the measure before the House, and where we are most directly responsible for its suppression. I say the measure before the House, because, although we are only called upon to sanction a survey, I hope, in common, I believe, with many who support the Government, that in the event of a survey proving a railway to be practicable and effective a railway will be begun and completed. Everybody must remember that it was the Government of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian who sent out some 10,000 or 12,000 Englishmen in order to construct a railway from Suakin to Berber, and after they constructed 40 miles of the line abandoned it to the tribes inhabiting that district. Now, I believe it is less extravagant to complete a railway, if money were spent on the survey, than to construct 40 miles of it and then leave the work as a monument of irresolution. If this duty of taking new measures to combat the Slave Trade is laid upon us, and if this railway is the best instrument for discharging it, we have only to consider what agent we shall employ. Many hon. Gentlemen object to employing a company under any circumstances. They object to setting-up such a precedent. But, in the first place, there is no probability that a precedent will be set. Survey the map of the world, and nowhere else will you find a spot in which slavery is rife, in which we are responsible, in which a railway is the obvious weapon for combating slavery, and in which a company is prepared to construct that railway. But, in the second place, should such a combination again occur, then I trust that by our action to-day we shall set a precedent, and that that precedent will be followed. From the remarks of the hon. Gentleman who has last spoken, it would seem that he can only view this question of obligation with reference to the commercial prospect of the undertaking. Surely when we bind ourselves to combat slavery we cannot do so only when we get a chance of realising a good dividend upon our investment. If that be the view of hon. Gentlemen opposite, they should have taken exception to the method laid down in the Brussels Act when it was first mooted; surely the argument based upon the effect this undertaking may have upon the prospects of commerce ought not to weigh with us in this matter, whether we hold that it will pay, or fail to pay, interest on our money. I say pay or fail to pay, for whereas some seem to fear that money will be lost, others are alarmed at the idea that the Company will profit. But, if it does, who will be a penny the worse? Assuming, for the sake of argument, that British commerce is an evil to native populations—but only for the sake of argument, for from Captain Lugard's Report it is clear that trade as conducted by this Company can only prove beneficial—still, assuming Christian commerce to be an evil, is it the only one which disturbs the Golden Age existing in the imagination of some persons around the shores of the Equatorial Lakes? No, Sir; these remnants of the Saturnian reign are disturbed not only by the Christian trader, but by the Mahomedan slave-driver; and, admitting both to be evils, the second must be held to be by far the graver of the two. The presence of Christian commerce there would only be an evil as vaccination is an evil; preventing a more virulent disease. But, turning from the point of view of the natives to that of the electors of this country, the proposal of the Government is no evil at all. Those who returned us to power are in favour of the African policy which has been so successfully administered by Lord Salisbury; and my recent experience, in the constituencies that hon. Members opposite are apt to quote as types and models for all constituencies, has led me to believe that even the electors that returned them to power are not averse to a forward policy in Africa. This was shown down at Rossendale. I hold in my hand a bill which was widely distributed there, asking the electors to

"Vote for Maden, because the Unionist Government, by its default, has allowed France to outstrip us in the race on the West Coast of Africa."

In Rossendale the electors were asked to vote against the Government candidate, because France had been allowed to outstrip us on the West Coast of Africa; it is, therefore, from the Opposition point of view, their interests to see that we are not outstripped in the East of Africa. The policy of non-extension originated in a Resolution of this House, passed in 1865, I believe when Lord John Russell was Secretary for Foreign Affairs; and it was laid down then that this policy of non-extension admitted of no exception as regards new settlements, but cannot amount to absolute prohibition of measures which in peculiar cases it may be necessary that the settlement should possess. Is that the present policy of the Liberal Party? If we knew that it is their policy then we should know where we are. I should be very glad to hear in the course of this evening whether they do advise us that we should avoid all risk and responsibility. If that is their advice, it is one which it will be very difficult to follow or attend to in this country, for risk must be incurred by this Empire until the last trace of our enterprise has disappeared, and from responsibility in connection with slavery we cannot hope for release until the last spark of compassion has been extinguished in the breast of the last Englishman.

(10.20.) MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): The statement of the Under Secretary for State in introducing his Estimate was, I thought, as far as it went, a fair statement, and did not, like the speech of the hon.

Mr. Wyndham

Gentleman who has just sat down, endeavour to give a Party colour to the question. It stated perfectly fairly what the view of the Government is. I must also thank the hon. Member for his candour in the account which he gave of Uganda, at least in one respect, because he told us that the cost of maintaining British influence there would be enormous. But the hon. Gentleman, to my disappointment, did not address himself particularly to the task of giving particulars. He did not give us the particulars of the Slave Trade in that country, the cost of the railroad or the ideas which the Government were going to follow after the railroad is constructed—all matters which seem to me of great interest. And the hon. Member for Dover, who has just sat down, did not seem anxious to supply these particulars; but he rather preferred to discuss the question of the Suakin and Berber Railway, and of the West Coast of Africa. There is one point which was not overstated by my right hon. Friend the Under Secretary when he spoke about the parting of the ways: and what I should like to invite the Government to give us is—not the view they take as to where the road will lead to, but to give us some more particular information than their Papers give us with regard to the obligations they meant to contract, and the best means of discharging these obligations. Certainly the production of these Papers and the speech of the Under Secretary furnish the best justification that could be desired for the course taken by my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby, when he insisted that this Estimate should not pass last July as a non-contentious matter, sunt silentio; but that in a matter of this very great gravity we ought to have much fuller information than the Government has now given us. The correspondence laid before us in this short Paper tells us what the view, upon the general question of policy, of the Foreign Office and the Treasury is, what progress has been made with the survey for some short distance; but it does not deal with the issues involved. I shall endeavour to state what the issues are. I begin by assuming, and I think I may from the correspondence assume, that this is really not a question of a grant for a survey, but it is a question of subsidy or guarantee to the East Africa Railway Company. I say that with confidence, and for two reasons. In the first place, the Chancellor of the Exchequer delivered a speech in Scotland which was addressed to this question of subsidy or guarantee, and in which he endeavoured to charge the Opposition with the unpatriotic conduct of endeavouring to oppose a forward policy in Africa. And in the second place, if hon. Members will look at these Parliamentary Papers, Nos. 1, 2, and 3, they will see that the argument has been entirely addressed to the question of subsidy or guarantee. The argument in Paper No. 2 is substantially an argument to prove that the Slave Trade is not to be suppressed by the Brussels Act unless by a railroad; that that railroad could not be made without a subsidy or guarantee, and that, therefore, we are bound to vote money for the purpose. It is quite true that we are only asked at the present moment for a grant of £20,000; but if we allowed this Vote for £20,000 to pass unchallenged, it would be but the naturally obvious course to say that this Vote was supported and demanded upon the arguments stated in this paper, and by assenting to it, we must be deemed to be assenting to the policy which the Government have declared. I should like to put to the Chancellor of the Exchequer a few questions which these Papers do not answer. One of them—the most obvious—is the question what the probable expenditure upon the railway will be. It appears from the Papers we have that Sir John Fowler has made an approximate estimate of what the expenditure upon the railway will be; but we have only heard rumours of this estimate. We should like to know what foundation there is for these rumours. We should be glad to be told what this Government has been informed is likely to be the cost—even the minimum cost—of the contemplated railway. We should like also, I think, to be furnished with a map, which would enable Members of the House more conveniently to understand the situation of this country through which the proposed railroad is to pass, and to perceive what these regions are; and I think that would be much more perceivable if such a map had been appended to them. And more than that, we should like to have a copy of the Report of Captain Lugard. It is a Report of the utmost interest and value. A brief extract of the Report was contained in the Times newspaper on the 23rd of February. This Report of Captain Lugard was made at the beginning of 1891, and has been in the hands of the East Africa Company for a year or more, and might, I think with advantage, be presented to the House. The right hon. Gentleman perhaps may ask me why I think so; and my answer would be, because the Government are proposing that this country should virtually become a partner with the East Africa Company in this undertaking, and that under these circumstances they ought to give us what information they have in their possession.

*MR. GOSCHEN: This Report of Captain Lugard is a Report which was addressed to the East Africa Company, and over which, therefore, so far the Government have no control. ("Oh oh!") I do not know why my hon. Friend objects to that. Of course the House may say, "We will not vote the money unless we see the Report"; but, on the other hand, I say that, as a Government, the Report does not belong to us. This Report is of a distinctly confidential character, relating to the actions of certain persons and Governments, and is certainly not a Report which was written or intended for publication. Every Government has agents who make confidential Reports in reference to matters in the negotiation of which they are engaged. If a Government were to be called upon to give publicity to a confidential Report which their agent had made, explaining his negotiation and the attitude he has taken, it might very seriously compromise these negotiations if it were to go back to the parties with whom he was negotiating. I think the House will clearly understand, therefore, that this Report cannot be laid upon the Table of the House.

MR. BRYCE: I am much obliged to my right hon. Friend for the statement which he has just made. But I should like to remind him that, having had an opportunity of reading the Report, I could find nothing on the face of the Report which indicated that it was of a confidential character. It has, I believe, come into the hands of a good many Members. I should like to point out further to my right hon. Friend that the East Africa Company are coming to us as suppliants, that they are coming to us to help them out of their difficulties, because it is admitted that they are not able to protect themselves. When we are asked to embark in an enterprise of this kind we are entitled to a full disclosure of the material facts, and the disposition to avoid that is calculated to arouse suspicion. I must say that a great deal which is contained in this Report is material, and it has suggested to me a number of questions which I hope the Government will endeavour to answer, because on their answer will depend the attitude we shall assume and the judgment the country will form. Now, Sir, I find that no information has been given by the Government as regards the existence of slavery in this particular part of the country. The Under Secretary lightly assumed that the horrors we heard of occurred within the sphere of influence. I believe there has been little or no information of any slavery in the territories of the British East Africa Company. In the Asiatic Quarterly Review there is an article which bears marks of having proceeded from a competent and experienced hand, a man who was obviously well informed, and who asserted that so far from the proposed railway destroying the Slave Trade, it would have little or no effect. But I am going to call a better witness—namely, Captain Lugard himself. At page 29 of his Report he says, describing his proceedings in Uganda—

"The abolition of the Slave Trade was readily agreed to being practically non-existent now."

I do not know whether that is one of the facts it is intended to be treated as confidential. And, in fact, the state of things is substantially admitted in the letter of the Foreign Office to the Treasury. The Under Secretary has spoken of the expense of the cruisers. We spend more than any other country in the suppression of the Slave Trade, the cost of cruisers alone amounting to £100,000 a year. It is said that this money will be saved if the railway is made; but the Slave Trade in East Africa now exists along three main routes. The first from the region of the Upper Nile down to the Red Sea, the second down to the German port of Bagamoyo, and the third line is Nyassaland, where it comes up to the Mozambique. As the Slave Trade goes to the coast, the cruisers would have to be kept there, and the Slave Trade will not be appreciably diminished by this strip of railway. I will not say much on the question of trade, although Captain Lugard's Report contains some instructive remarks on that point. He describes a considerable portion of the country that the railway is to traverse between Mombasa and the Lakes as being practically uninhabited, and for the rest inhabited by very savage tribes who are not likely to furnish what is called remunerative local traffic. Anything more discouraging than his Report I cannot imagine; and if the Government propose to raise any money for this railway, they would do well not to publish this Report. Then, Sir, the Government have not told us anything about the condition of the Company, although the country is practically asked to go into partnership with it. We are entitled to know something about the solvency of our partners, their capacity to bear their share of the burden, their management and prospects, and their capital. No information has been supplied to us on these points, and when we ask for it we are told to call at the office in Pall Mall. One important fact mentioned by Captain Lugard is that the tsetse fly does not exist in the territories, and that animals can be employed there. Now, Sir, I feel the duty we have as a great nation that has borne an honourable part in putting down the Slave Trade. There is no dispute about that. Livingstone said, "The Slave Trade is the open sore of the world"; and it is admitted that we must take all reasonable and proper means to work against it. I do not recede from what I said on this subject a year and a half ago. But I must review the ground of obligation now put before us. We are told that we are bound, in respect of the proceedings of the Brussels General Act, to do all we can to suppress the Slave Traffic. The Powers declared that the most effective means of counteracting the Slave Trade were—first, the progressive organisation of the Services; next, the establishment of occupying stations; thirdly, the construction of roads, and particularly of railroads, and so on. But all these provisions are expressly stated to be applicable in what district? In the African territories placed under the Sovereignty or Protectorate of civilised nations. I call attention to these particular words, which are repeated in Article 4, to which the hon. Member alluded. Now, this is not a case of Sovereignty or of Protectorate, but of a sphere of influence, which is a totally different thing. Sovereignty we know and Protectorate we know, but what is a sphere of influence? Fortunately, on this point we have a definition from Lord Salisbury, who, speaking at the Mansion House in August, 1890, descended with commendable frankness on the proceedings for the delimitation of the sphere of influence in Africa. He said he had been engaged in what the satirist would call the task of drawing lines upon maps on which no human foot had ever trod, and dividing territories which did not belong to them, but which, indeed, belonged to other people; and he told his hearers to read between the lines in order to see that what the Government was doing was contributing their quota to the glorious work of the peace of the world. Now, that simply means that Germany, Italy, and ourselves agree that between certain lines we would not interfere with one another. It has been admitted by the Postmaster General that in this sphere of influence Her Majesty has no Sovereignty, and that we have no Protectorate, and that there is nothing beyond this that Germany and Italy have no particular right. This does not come within the Brussels Act, because it is neither a Sovereignty nor a Protectorate. The Brussels Conference wisely refrained from expressing any opinion upon a sphere of influence, because the diplomatists who then assembled knew very well that a sphere of influence where no legal authority existed, and where the natives were left to themselves, could not be made subject to these stipulations. Now, shall we, by making this railway, actually repress the Slave Trade? I ask the Government to say whether the construction of the railway will have any effect in that direction. There is another question. How is this railway to be made? Captain Lugard says his men were always deserting. The standing difficulty is to get soldiers and porters and others to carry you through the hostile tribes. There are no means of obtaining indigenous free labour to make this railway. The only means will be to bring coolies from India, or Chinese, or resort to the expedient of African explorers and use slave labour. That is another point on which we are entitled to information. Now, Sir, the Committee will notice that the Government have put their case as an alternative to the establishment of garrisons and flying columns. But it is clear that when you have made the railway your first difficulty will be to guard it. Captain Lugard says the common article of currency in Maisailand is iron wire, and he speaks of the difficulty of maintaining the line against the Maisais. A railway through the land of the Maisais will be more valuable to them than a gold mine, and nothing less than a line of forts and garrisons will be sufficient to protect the railway, and we shall have all that expense in addition to the expense of construction. Another point I should like to have dwelt upon, had time permitted, is this—that we have no jurisdiction in the territory except over British subjects. It seems to me that the Government present their case thus: A survey involves a guarantee, a guarantee necessarily involves defence, defence involves annexation; and so what we are substantially asked to do is to take the first step towards annexation. I do not believe there is any escape from that fatal descent, and, therefore, the Committee and the country should pause to consider the position in which they stand.

In Equatorial Africa we have a country that is neither fit for European centres, nor, like India, a country of ancient civilisation which can be governed with comparative ease. Moreover, it is a country which has no defined frontier. In these circumstances, I put it to the Committee that we ought, at this moment, to require a far fuller statement of facts than we have yet had; and we ought seriously to consider, when asked to take such a step, what that step means, and what are the ultimate consequences that it may involve.

*MR. GOSCHEN: I frankly admit that many of the questions put to me by the hon. and learned Gentleman are questions which ought fairly to be put to the Government, and require an answer. I will deal with some of the minor points in the first instance. A question was asked as to our relations with the Imperial British East Africa Company, and whether it is solvent. That is a matter as to which we must satisfy ourselves. We must know whether they are able to carry out the railway, but there is no obligation of any kind upon us until the survey is completed. We are waiting for that information before undertaking any liability of any kind, and the very object of the survey is to get an answer to many of those questions which the hon. Gentleman wishes us to answer before the survey is completed. The Government are anxious to proceed with caution in this matter; and it would be the duty of the Government, supposing the survey were thoroughly satisfactory, before they undertook to give a guarantee to any company, to see that the powers of that company were adequate to carrying out the operations. In the first negotiations that took place I pointed out to the representatives of the Company, and I laid it down as an absolute condition, that care would have to be taken to see that there was such financial support—such financial power behind any company to whom we should give a guarantee—as would secure that that company should have power to carry out the railway, whatever it might cost. We should not give a guarantee without satisfying ourselves on that point. I do not for a moment say that the East Afr Company would in itself have sufficient power. We have to whether this railway can be built, whether it can be built within the limits of the guarantee as the Ho would sanction and the country we approve. That, I hope, is a full ans to the hon. Gentleman's questions specting the guarantees. We shall for and insist upon those guarant with the necessary financial stren when the proper time arrives. N the hon. Gentleman raised one important point towards the end of speech, and that was whether we w free from all obligations to the Brus Conference, because this is a spher influence and not a Protectorate.

MR. BRYCE: I said we were un no obligation as respects the sphere influence. I did not say anyth about a Protectorate.

*MR. GOSCHEN: Very well. Th according to the hon. and learned Gentleman, this was our position when went into the Brussels Conference—that we were to induce all other count who had Protectorates to the So and Protectorates to the North t they were to take all means for putt down the Slave Trade, while we in middle were to ride off on the grou that we had not a Protectorate. A therefore, in the eloquent words of hon. Friend behind me, we were to h this sphere of influence without tak any action, whilst at the same ti encouraging others to go forward b to the North and to the South. In t case I confess that I think we shd have cut only a sorry figure if we w to encourage Belgium, Italy, Germany and Portugal to take those measur whilst we held our hands and would nothing.

MR. BRYCE: I do not think t right hon. Gentleman appreciates argument. I said that the Brussels Conference expressly extended to Protectorates and Sovereignties.

*MR. GOSCHEN: But Germany operating in her sphere of influence.

MR. BRYCE: What evidence h you of that?

*MR. GOSCHEN: If the hon. Gentleman follows the course of events, I will see that the Germans are w active indeed in their sphere of influen the sum of money she has spent something that would alarm the use of Commons. Where is a railway intended to operate less in the sphere of influence? at is my answer to the hon. and Gentleman so far as the here of influence is concerned. en towards the conclusion of speech, the hon. Gentleman id that we were entering on a tain chain of undertakings which ld lead to annexation. In this y—first, the survey, then the llway, then the fortified posts, and in end the annexation. Well, I would int out to the hon. Gentleman that regard to the whole state of the untry he seems to me not really to ve studied the Reports which have idently been at his command. He inks that there is nothing to be done; at there is no slavery as I understood e hon. Gentleman—

MR. BRYCE: No, I said it was not e of the slave routes, and I quoted Captain Lugard to prove it.

MR. GOSCHEN: But the hon. Gentleman did not quote all Captain Lugard id on this point, for Captain Lugard ated that he himself met a slave ravan on his road up, and that he mself liberated the slaves attached to

Now, is it quite fair of the hon. Gentleman to state that Captain Lugard ade this observation with regard to ave caravans, and at the same time nt to inform the House that Captain ugard had met a caravan and terated the slaves?

MR. BRYCE: The only reason I did nt refer to that was, because it was bviously a slave caravan that was engaed in what is called the local traffic, hich is a totally different thing from aravans of slaves coming down to the coast, and when Captain Lugard's Report is produced hon. Members will see that that difference is.

MR. GOSCHEN: Well, then, have we o duties with regard to the local traffic n slaves? We have never drawn a distinction between the local traffic and the traffic down to the Coast. No, sir; we wish to put down the traffic where it exists, and the atrocities which accompany one of these caravans will ot be less than in the other cases. Ve have it from the hon. Gentleman now himself that there is local traffic in slaves and local traffic on the lines through which the railway is to pass. That observation breaks down the argument of the hon. Gentleman that there is no slave traffic on this route at all events, and no caravan of slaves to be found. The hon. Gentleman says he thinks that Captain Lugard's Report has been kept back because it is considered likely to damage the case for the railway. I must say that such an idea never entered into my mind. I had no idea that hon. Members would read Captain Lugard's Report in the sense of its being contrary to the general policy which we recommend. I should think that it was just the opposite. The Reports which Captain Lugard gives are graphic Reports. But what we want is this. We want a Report made to ourselves, by an engineer whom we have appointed, so that we may be able not to count simply on the views of others who are employed by parties who may be considered to be interested. We wish to have an independent Report, and for that purpose we appointed an independent engineer. That, I think at any rate, whatever hon. Gentlemen think of the wisdom of the course, will be considered as a fair and proper step to take—to endeavour to get an independent Report on the whole of this line. The hon. Gentleman has pressed me for a good deal of information which I trust will be in the hands of the Committee or of the House when we ask them to assent to a guarantee for the railway. But that is the time when many of the questions as to the value of the railway, as to the prospects of the railway, as to the possibility of the railway, will be able to be answered. We did not come to the House and ask them to vote a guarantee for the railway until we were able to put the information into their hands which would justify us in making this demand; but we do think that the information is sufficient to authorise us to ask the House to commit themselves to the expenditure of £20,000, which would put us in a position to judge of the steps which ought to be taken. The hon. Gentleman spoke of having to fortify this railway, or rather to establish posts along the rail-way—for it was another hon. Member who used the actual words to "fortify this railway," and the hon. Gentleman also asked by what means the labour could be found for the railway. He asked if it was to be by hired slaves. Well, I am glad to have this opportunity of reminding the House that the Imperial British East Africa Company has already liberated 4,000 slaves. There is a sample of the work which can be done. They have already liberated 4,000 slaves, and they trust, under the proclamations that have been issued and the progress that is being made, that free labour will from month to month and from year to year become infinitely more abundant. The hon. Member will further see, with regard to the difficulties of constructing the railway through the territories which he describes, that the very fact of a railway being built enables you to concentrate a number of men in a given spot in a way in which you could never concentrate men if they have to go on foot, and consequently 100 men who are able to pass rapidly from post to post would be able to do the work which 1,000 men would not be able to do if they had to traverse the roads. The railway will open up the country; and already I believe there are very satisfactory symptoms of the country becoming more settled. As a result of what has already been done, I hear that savage tribes are less in evidence; and 750 porters have gone from the lake to the coast without an armed escort, a thing which was quite impossible before, and thus from both points—both from the lake itself and from Mombasa, it will be possible to concentrate the labour necessary to construct the railways. But if it is impossible, what will happen? Captain Macdonald will report that the labour cannot be found. He will report on the density of the population along the road. The hon. Member was not correct in his summary of Captain Lugard's Report. There are portions of the road which are densely populated, portions where grain can be grown and where there is every prospect of a large trade; and everyone will see that if it be possible to have a railway it will be a first step taken towards the civilising of Equatorial Africa in a manner that has never been possible hitherto. You have had several bodies of pioneers who have carried their lives in their hands and have established themselves there; but if you can once get a railway through I think you would find results produced towards civilisation that would astonish and gratify the House. Our obligations under the Brussels Conference I think are such that we are compelled to take some step; but independently of that I think the interest shown by the commercial world and in our manufacturing towns proves that they wish, through a survey, at least to understand whether markets cannot be opened up in that region. What we ask the House for is simply an experimental survey. That experiment, I am sure, must commend itself to the great majority of the country. Even if it should prove that it is impossible to construct a railway, at all events we shall have done something, and we shall not only have shown—if it is to be shown—that the physical difficulties are such that they cannot be overcome, but we shall also have obtained valuable information which we believe will be of great advantage in many respects to many classes in the country.

(11.12.) MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I cannot complain of the tone of the right hon. Gentleman, but he knows the respect I have for his abilities, and he will forgive me for saying that in his speech he failed to cover the whole field of the discussion, or to bring out points that are really in the minds of hon. Members, so far as my knowledge of opinion goes on this side of the House—that he did little or nothing towards promoting a settlement of this matter.

MR. GOSCHEN: I did not wish to be too long.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I am in the same predicament. I do not think it is possible to take a perfectly full discussion of this subject. I wish to limit myself to a great degree to noticing the points dealt with by the right hon. Gentleman, instead of doing what I could have wished to do—namely, to survey the whole of the arguments in this most important question. Well, now, Sir, I wish to begin with two admissions which are agreeable, for the whole subject, I confess, is not agreeable, since I shall find it my duty very seriously to complain of the conduct of the Government with regard to the subject. With all due respect to the hon. Member for Dover, I am aware of no reason whatever why this should be made a Party question. The hon. Member for Dover did what little was in his power to envenom the discussion by introducing into this question invidious contrasts with what he alleged had been done by other Governments. I shall not follow the hon. Gentleman in his contention. My opinion that this is no Party question is shared, I know, by many Gentlemen on this side of the House. All the pleas I shall urge will be urged by me as a Member of the House of Commons, having no relation to the principles or opinions of this Party or of that. There is another important admission. My hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen in the course of his able speech, made most important and very large statements with regard to the obligations incumbent on this country with reference to the Slave Trade. I wish to say that although those statements were large I will go the whole length with him. I know that wherever it can be shown by rational and ascertained evidence that there is a reasonable prospect of contributing by effort of our own to the abolition or even the great restriction of the African Slave Trade, the memory of what has taken place in former generations from the date of the Assiento Treaty downwards, ought to bring to our mind the conviction that we should take a large and liberal view of any proposition of that kind, provided it fulfil those first conditions which it is our absolute and inexorable duty to ascertain—that is to say, showing to us that the case has been examined, that with the evidence before us it is reasonable and sufficient, and that by entering upon a given course of action we may hope to do something in the view of that capital and most important object. So far, therefore, Sir, I believe there is no question in dispute between us. But the hon. Member for Dover has argued this case entirely as if the importance of the object in view exempted us from any duty in ascertaining that the means proposed were likely to attain that object. There was not a syllable in his speech, I think, which appeared to admit or to imply that any inquiry whatever in regard to the sufficiency of these means, and the reasonableness of this undertaking, was itself compatible with general notions of what was right. There was not a single sentiment in his speech which in any way recognised any of the difficulties. Sir, the difficulties exist for us, whatever be the value of the purpose we have in view. It is our duty to ascertain the tendency of what is proposed to us to attain that purpose, and it is our duty also to ascertain that in the endeavour to attain that purpose we shall not commit other errors, and perhaps even give countenance to crimes such as, if they were presented to us, we should recoil from with horror. I am here to complain of the conduct of Her Majesty's Government. We have before us no information whatever. It is an entire mistake to call these Parliamentary Papers information. Inter-departmental correspondence upon the question of a scheme in Africa and the opinions of Lord Salisbury and the opinions of the right hon. Gentleman are matters very proper to be stated in Debate for our cognizance, for us to deal with as well as we can—to accept, to criticise, or to refuse. But they are not information for the case. There is not a scrap of information in these Papers upon the subject. There is, indeed, one statement of what ought to be information, and unfortunately it is a statement totally, though unintentionally, untrue, and that is a statement on which Lord Salisbury relies, and on which the right hon. Gentleman relies—that we are called upon to proceed in fulfilment of these obligations. The Brussels Conference includes no reference to the subject whatever. The Brussels Conference by necessary inference excludes this subject, and shows that it has nothing whatever to do with the proposal of Her Majesty's Government. My hon. Friend has read the words, and those words the right hon. Gentleman has not thought proper to notice.

"The Brussels Conference declare that they are to act by progressive organisation of the administrative, judicial, religious, and military services in the African territories placed under the sovereignty or protectorate of civilised nations"— with the evident and studied exclusion of what are termed "the spheres of influence." Without the smallest qualification this Brussels Conference—which is made the basis of the argument of Lord Salisbury—has no concern whatever with the proposal that is now made. That is an important point on which the Government cannot be too broadly challenged. I think they have been challenged broadly enough by my hon. Friend near me; but as the right hon. Gentleman has, to borrow a phrase that is used in these Papers, "made a detour" in his speech, and gone round the point, I am obliged to return to it and to impress this important matter upon the House. We have no information on that point—none whatever. Is it proper that we should be called upon to take steps of this kind without that information? But we are not altogether excluded from information. There is the Report of Captain Lugard—a Report addressed not to the Government, but to the Company with whom the Government are going to enter into partnership. The Government are not only going to enter into partnership with the East Africa Company, but they are going to commit to the Company the execution of this railway and the construction of the railroad, should it go forward. How, then, is it possible for you to separate yourselves from the knowledge that has been acquired by the officers of the East Africa Company. The right hon. Gentleman can have no evil motive for withholding Captain Lugard's Report, because he frankly says—and I have no doubt he implicitly believes—that the Report of Captain Lugard is a Report altogether favourable to the proposal that he now makes. Well, that is another argument for the production of this Report. The Report is full of the most important information; but we think it contains information showing that in the present state of things we ought not to entertain the proposal of the Government. Why not produce the Report that the public and the House may be able to judge? It is really necessary that we should have these Reports produced. This is authentic information—important information, in the absence of all other information. Captain Lugard's Report makes upon me—and I have no doubt it made on the right hon. Gentleman—the impression that whether these proceedings towards the natives may be juridically justifiable or not, yet, that he is a frank man, a brave man, an able man, and an upright man, and he has had admirable opportunities of forming a judgment on the matter. His Report bristles with propositions, and throws a most important light on the subject before us; and that Report ought to be in the hands of the House. Instead of that, we are given these Papers—in which there is only the letter of Sir Guildford Molesworth—that contain anything approaching information at all. And this is rather ludicrous as showing the manner in which the Government have thought proper to bring forward the matter, that in this Report of Sir Guildford Molesworth, reference is made to "the accompanying map." There is no "accompanying map." And why is there no accompanying map? Is it because we are all so familiar with the country? I refer to the words of Lord Salisbury, who tells us that we know nothing about the details of the country. Why is some information not given us to prevent us wandering and stumbling in the dark when we are discussing this matter? I wish to state, in the most expressive terms that I can command, that I am determined for one to exempt myself, by the declaration of to-night, from every jot and tittle of responsibility connected with this undertaking; and yet, at the same time, I do not go so far as to deliver a final judgment. (Ministerial cries of "Oh, oh!" and laughter.) Hon. Members opposite who laugh seem to think that such a thing as suspense of judgment, in the absence of information, is highly irrational. I leave those gentlemen to the full enjoyment of that comfortable state of mind in which they alone can entertain such a proposition. But what I have said already is this: that we have no information whatever upon this subject supplied to us by the Government—none for which the Government makes itself responsible.

Mr. W. E. Gladstone

How, then, are we to form a final judgment on the question? We have not got absolute knowledge. We have presumptions and indications, and all these presumptions and indications are most adverse to the plan of Her Majesty's Government. And now I come distinctly and directly to what has been stated by the right hon. Gentleman. He first of all treated of the solvency of the East Africa Company. I will not pursue that question very far. All that we know at present is that this great company, which is undertaking such enormous obligations, is not able to command a sum of £20,000 for the purpose of making this preliminary survey. I think that is the ground upon which the present proposal is made. Then, again, I do not say that the company is not solvent. All I say is, we have not got information as to the solvency of the company. The only fact that we have to go upon, and from which presumption may arise, is that the company cannot produce £20,000, and that, therefore, the Government is called in. Then, what says the right hon. Gentleman—and I think this was the heart and centre of his speech. He says—

"Your time for opposition is not yet come. You are not now going to commit yourselves to making the railway."

I certainly, in these circumstances, would not hold myself committed to anything of the kind; but, so far, I am very glad to have the admission so distinctly made. "But," says the right hon. Gentleman, "your time for objecting is not yet come," because admitting, as apparently he did admit, that we do not possess a great deal of the necessary information, he says—

"We are going to institute this survey for the very purpose of getting that information."

And the right hon. Gentleman makes this argument: that it is irrational in us to interfere with this laudable and beneficent object of getting information through the medium of a survey. If this were a question of a survey in the County of Middlesex for the railway we are going to discuss to-morrow, or a survey in any even uncivilised, if peaceful, land, I could understand the argument of the right hon. Gentleman.

But what security can the right hon. Gentleman give me that the operation of making this survey is to be a bloodless operation? No doubt he intends it to be pacific; no doubt he has excellent objects in view; but I say that the making of this survey is, according to such information as is before us, attended with the same dangers as the making of the railway. The right hon. Gentleman says that the Masai tribe are not so strong as they were; but what do we know from one source or from another as to the influences and powers that will confront us when we set foot in East Africa? We know this, that the greatest jealousy prevails in that country and must, naturally, among the natives with regard to any attempts to dispossess them of their lands. Is not that exactly the thing we are going to do? Well, then, there is no doubt about the jealousy. Is there no tendency in our survey for a railway, and our establishing a road into the country which we are there permanently to maintain, which road itself requires the assumption of property in land when it comes to be made—is there no tendency there to stir that jealousy on the part of the natives? What does Captain Lugard say? He says that he is about to be attacked; and why is he about to be attacked? Because he has been endeavouring to make a stockade to defend himself from the attacks of others, and even that is an act so serious and formidable in the present state of that country, that he says he understands he is to be attacked on that account. But this is not a question of presumption only. We have plenty of evidence on that subject. What are the indications that you have offered of friendliness, or of neutrality, in the country where you are going to make your survey? Is it a survey in the view of Sir Guildford Molesworth, whose letter inspires one, as far as such a letter can, with every confidence in his judgment and integrity, which is in itself essentially peaceful, and will excite no jealousy or hostility on the part of the natives? No. It is a survey which cannot be made without the presence of many hundreds of armed men. Is it expected that there will be employment for those men?

MR. GOSCHEN: Perhaps my right hon. Friend will permit me to answer. As a matter of fact there are 40 armed men who have gone with the party. They are taken from India, and are at the same time assistant surveyors, who have been accustomed to surveying in India. They will afford protection, and at the same time assist in the survey.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I can quite understand that at the present moment and close to the coast the necessity is less, but I am surprised that in a country which is entirely peaceful, and close to the coast, 40 armed men should be needed. What does Sir Guildford Molesworth say on this subject? The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer says the Masai have become very weak. Does he derive that from Sir Guildford Molesworth? But I am going to show that even the scanty Parliamentary Papers he has placed before us contradict what he has said. Sir Guildford Molesworth says that the expedition conducted by Dr. Carl Peters, which eventually led to the fruitless slaughter of a large number of the Masai, has excited such strong hostility against Europeans that any expedition that may be organised must have an escort sufficiently strong to resist any attack made upon it. That is the peaceful survey which the right hon. Gentleman says he is undertaking as a preliminary operation in order that, being at present wholly destitute of all information, he may put himself in a position to give us some portion of such information after he has completed the survey. Are you better off when you get into Uganda? Can you count upon friendship there? Is the King of that country friendly to you? (Some cries of "Yes" from the Ministerial Benches.) What? (Renewed cries of "Yes.") Does anyone venture to say that he is friendly? (Renewed cries of "Yes.") Very well. I do not know whether the hon. Member for Dover is responsible, but I say that, at any rate, his responsibility will not enable him to stand against the evidence of Captain Lugard. What says Captain Lugard? He has framed a Treaty with King Mwanga. From that Sovereign he has extorted a Treaty. He tells you how he obtained it. He obtained it by threats and by compulsion. He says that he obtained it with the greatest difficulty, and that with every effort to escape it this wretched Sovereign signed the Treaty. He states, not admits merely, that the Sovereign will make every effort to escape from it, and in that Treaty Captain Lugard, as far as we can judge from the terms of the Treaty, which he gives, has not ventured to include the slightest reference to the acquisition of land. He is going to survey, he is going to make a railway, he is going to meet all the responsibilities that that will entail, and yet he does not venture to make in the terms of his Treaty the slightest reference to the acquisition of land. Then where is the friendliness of this King Mwanga? Captain Lugard says he effected his point by going into the country with extreme rapidity, and that it was by the extreme rapidity of his movements that he prevented the natives from getting out their troops to oppose him, because they had not time to do it. That is the country where a peaceful survey is to be made. Captain Lugard says that at a certain point upon his journey he understood that King Mwanga had put to death two of his subjects for not preventing his passage. He says—

"I have thought it prudent to postpone all inquiry as to whether that account of the killing of these two men is true or not."

On whose friendship then do you rely? The bulk of the country is inhabited by tribes absolutely savage, but not incapable, I believe, of being stirred up by alarm with respect to the lands upon which they depend for subsistence, and all of them are armed to a large extent. The case of the Masai you have recorded for you by your own officer, Sir Guildford Molesworth. The case of Uganda and its King is fully set out in the Reports of Captain Lugard, and from him you have nothing to expect, according to Captain Lugard, except determined opposition. On the north also, says Captain Lugard, there is a wave of onward Mahomedan progress. Another great tribe, called, I think, the Umyoro, lying next to it and hostile to Uganda, yet agrees with Uganda in its hostility to the English; and it is a most singular thing that according to the Report of Captain Lugard, almost without exception, all these people who are at variance with one another are agreed in being hostile to the admission of the English. There is an exception, and I am going to mention it. There are strong religious influences at work—French Roman Catholic influences—and it appears that in this sphere of influence the East Africa Company takes upon itself to inform the French missionaries where they may go and where they may not go, and assumes over them a Governmental control. But they happen to be a very powerful body. There are two influences—Protestant and Roman Catholic—the Roman Catholic very large and the Protestant very small. Sharp rivalry between them. Protestants very willing to welcome the influence of the right hon. Gentleman, and hoping, doubtless, that it will be backed by arms; the Roman Catholics, who are the large majority, being very averse to it. This is the case: that while we are obliged to go upon presumptions, as information has not been placed in our hands, all these presumptions converge to show that what you have to expect from the mass of the population in this region of Africa is bitter, and, generally speaking, united hostility. But worse still: there is a greater danger even than that. What is this sphere of influence? This sphere of influence was carefully excluded from the purview of the Brussels Conference. What is this sphere of influence? What right does this sphere of influence invest you with? Does it invest the right hon. Gentleman with a juridical title to go into the country with several hundreds of men, including either 40 or any larger number of armed men, and to take all measures that may be requisite for taking a survey? On what title does he put that?

MR. GOSCHEN: Along the whole of the routes there are Treaties which have been made with the Chiefs which give us these rights.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Show us these Treaties. If the forms of the Committee allowed it, there ought upon that simple admission to be a Motion for the postponement of this Debate. Show me these Treaties. It is not so stated in your Papers. Are there Treaties with Masai?

MR. GOSCHEN: I cannot give you the names—I have not got them.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I have so far got the names, that I know these Masai are upon the route, and I know that Captain Lugard in his Report has expressly stated that it is totally useless to attempt any Treaty whatever with the Masai, and that you must put them down. In my opinion—I do not say voluntarily—but it is an act of real disrespect to the House to call upon them to enter upon this discussion without supplying them with this information, and it is aggravated, and very greatly aggravated, by a proceeding which I believe to be quite without precedent—namely, in a case of this kind, entirely novel, and foreign to our practice, and without the smallest sanction of Parliament, to take steps, as the Government have taken to direct the commencement of this survey, and incur responsibility connected with it before they submit a Motion to Parliament for granting the money. This is a most important question. You admit by the character of the messenger you sent into the country to make the survey that there is a risk of violence and military operations. Under what law are these military operations to be conducted? To whom is the honour of this country to be committed? What right have you to cast upon the East Africa Company the responsibility of conducting such proceedings? Why you see from the Report of Sir Guildford Molesworth that hostilities are to be looked upon as certain, and the only reply is that you must take sufficient force. If there is to be war, are there to be laws of war? Is this war to be conducted by arrangement? If there is to be excess on the part of British agents you have no power to punish it. If gross outrages are committed—and when passion is heated and strong you cannot assure they will not fall into serious errors—who is to punish them? If crime is committed in the course of the operations, as anticipated by Sir Guildford Molesworth, by British agents, how are you to punish that crime, committed in the name of the Government, committed on behalf of the Government, and committed under the authority of a Vote of the House of Commons? How are you to punish that crime? I have a right to an answer to that question. If crime is committed by the natives under what law are they to be punished? They are to be punished by no law at all. They are to be punished in the name of philanthropy and benevolence by carrying anarchy into their country, by setting them, from this great centre of civilisation, the example of what must be illegality and probably will be cruelty, and this in a sphere of influence where you have expressly and absolutely disclaimed all authority over the natives. A speaker on the other side of the House said this sphere of influence must, by hook or crook, be converted into a real and effectual dependency of the British people, and made available for their enjoyment. Is the hon. Member aware it is an absolute breach of faith if any such thing be attempted? You are going to attempt it on the authority of this Vote. You are going to assume authority which, at the time the German Agreement was made, in the face of this House you expressly and solemnly disclaimed. Is that disputed? At the time that Agreement was produced I addressed the House upon it, and I attached to it a significance which my hon. Friend near me has given it to-night—namely, that it was an Agreement between certain European Powers, absolutely excluding each of them from any attempt to exercise authority within certain limits. I asked "Is it well and thoroughly understood that by this Agreement there is no disparagement whatever conveyed to any of the rights now enjoyed by the natives? These natives were masters of the country as much as we are masters of this country," and I was assured by the Government of the day—I daresay the record is to be found—and others received similar assurances, that the rights of the natives were to remain absolutely unimpaired. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Goschen) has not stated that the Treaties which he says have been made, but which he has not been able to produce, authorise us to send armed forces into the country. I have shown that, as regards Masai, it could not be so, and, in fact, that we must act in the name of something still higher than law—namely humanity—going to trample law under our feet, and to introduce into that country what may be a plague and a curse, and what we have no right to send into that country at all, because as a civilised Power we are bound by the general principles of justice and humanity, and we have no right to act otherwise in dealing with uncivilised countries. My hon. Friend near me has gone through many of the points of the case upon which I will not endeavour to dwell. With regard to the Slave Trade; with regard to the cost of the railway—a very secondary matter, important in itself, but secondary in comparison with the other subjects before us; with regard to the nature of the labour by which the railway would have to be made—and there again Captain Lugard tells us there is no obtaining labour in Uganda except from the Chiefs and the Kings, and that there is no such thing as getting contracts with the natives themselves; with regard to the cruisers, as to which a vague and void hope has been held out without the smallest atom of proof—with regard to all these things the case of the Government is a perfect blank. I do not say it is impossible. I cannot tell. I do not pretend to possess the necessary knowledge for forming a final judgment upon this subject; but I say it is, in my opinion, the very height of rashness and of recklessness, in the absence of such knowledge, to incur such practical risks, and to perpetrate such violations of right as are necessarily involved in the assumptions of the right hon. Gentleman without any proper information to guide us, and for my part, in the present state of things, and without attempting to say what judgment would be arrived at had this matter been inquired into, as it ought to have been inquired into, by a Committee of this House, or by some competent authority responsible to us, I will wash my hands of all responsibility for such proceedings, which I believe to be probably without any parallel in the history of this or perhaps any other Administration.

(11.54.) MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): Are we not going to have an answer from some hon. Gentleman opposite? In regard to one matter I can give an answer. I received an intimation the other day from the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs that if I applied at No. 2, Pall Mall East, I should receive an answer to certain questions. The next day I did receive a letter from the secretary of this company. Now, the right hon. Gentleman has asked respecting the financial position of the company at the present moment, and I have here a statement about it. The subscribed capital is £552,140, in shares of £20 each, of which £12 are paid. Two-tenths have been expended in making treaties and securing the territory for the British sphere of influence. One-tenth has been expended in administration charges; three-tenths uncalled; capital in hand four-tenths, represented by assets. The company was at its outset engaged in assuring the footing in the interior which enabled the British Government to secure a favourable settlement with Germany and Italy as to the sphere of influence, and they have since been occupied in explorations and in negotiations with chiefs, which have placed Uganda under the sphere of British influence and control. These operations had prevented its entering on any trade whatever. Mark, it has not traded at all, and the earnings of the company have in great part been confined to customs receipts, which, however, showed very considerable vitality and power of increase. The gross income in excess of customs during 1891 had reached £6,000 over the agreed yearly payment for the whole concession. Now, Sir, when a charter is given a very remarkable process takes place. Any gentleman can ask for a charter. They apply to a Committee of the Council, I think it is called. [An hon. MEMBER: Divide!] If hon. Gentlemen think they are going to get the Vote, I would point out that the First Lord of the Treasury told us this evening that he is taking private Members' days because he anticipated considerable discussion on the Supplementary Estimates, and so far as I am concerned I am not going to do anything that would prevent the prophecy of the right hon. Gentleman coming true. We want details. We are sick and tired of right hon. Gentlemen opposite giving us no sort of information, and depending on the inarticulate cries of their supporters to put an end to the Debates. We consider this a most important question. We have had one speech from the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs introducing this matter, and we have had another from the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The right hon. Gentleman the Leader on this side of the House has asked a series of questions. They are addressed to Her Majesty's Government, but I also think they are as fairly addressed to the directors of this very remarkable company. Those directors I think have acted with gross unfairness to Her Majesty's Government if they did not give them the Report of Captain Lugard, or if in giving that Report to the Chancellor of the Exchequer they put "private and confidential" upon it. I understood the Chancellor of the Exchequer said it was on his copy, and therefore he was unable to submit that Report to the House. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian has asked specifically whether we are going to have that Report. Sir, I tell right hon. Gentlemen opposite that they will not evade that Report getting to the public. It is in the hands of Gentlemen on this side of the House, and there are in this country Liberal newspapers, and therefore I strongly recommend some director of the company to get up in his place and allow the right hon. Gentleman to submit it to the House of Commons, and let us distinctly know what Captain Lugard did report. Captain Lugard was an officer, as I understand it, in Her Majesty's Service. He was not on half-pay. He is receiving pay from the Government, and he was sent out by this company. He is therefore responsible not only to this company, but to this House and to the Government; yet, although they had a Report from him a year ago—privately and confidentially communicated to the Chancellor of the Exchequer—they now come forward and want to slip this Vote through the House, and it is only thanks to my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby that this was prevented.

It being Midnight, the Chairman left the Chair to make his report to the House.

Resolutions to be reported to-morrow, at Two of the clock.

Committee also report Progress; to sit again to-morrow, at Two of the clock.

FEE GRANT (SCOTLAND).

EDUCATION AND LOCAL TAXATION RELIEF (SCOTLAND).

Resolution [29th February] (see page 1575) reported, and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by The Lord Advocate, Mr. Balfour, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Mr. Solicitor General for Scotland.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 208.]

MILITARY LANDS CONSOLIDATION BILL.—(No. 184.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): I hope the House will allow the Second Reading to be taken now. It is a purely consolidation Bill, and we propose that it should be sent to a Committee upstairs to examine it and see that the object is carried out by the details.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): I ask the right hon. Gentleman to postpone the Bill until he can give me an answer to the communication I have made to him.

Second Reading deferred till Monday next.

PLUMBERS' REGISTRATION BILL. (No. 95.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. KNOWLES (Salford, W.): I hope the House will take the Second Reading on the understanding that the Bill shall be sent to a Select Committee. The object of the Bill will be found clearly stated on the back.

Bill read a second time, and committed to a Select Committee.

LABOURERS' (IRELAND) ALLOTMENTS BILL.—(No. 94.) COMMITTEE.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid.): It is with the assent of the Government, and I think most of the Conservative Members now present—many of whom I have spoken to—that I ask that the Committee stage may now be taken. I understood no objection would be taken.

COLONEL WARING (Down, N.): I hope this small measure will be allowed to go forward.

Clause 1 agreed to, without Amendment.

Clauses 2 and 3 agreed to, with Amendments.

New Clause—

(Power of Sanitary Authority to increase Plot.)

The Sanitary Authority may, subject to the same provisions and with the same powers as apply to the provision of the plot in the first instance, increase the plot attached to any existing cottage provided under the said Act, but so, nevertheless, that the whole plot shall not exceed an acre.—(Mr. Knowles.)

Clause read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be added to the Bill."—(Dr. Tanner.)

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I hope the Government will not object to giving the Sanitary Authorities the same power in relation to cottages already in existence as is by this Bill conferred for erections in the future, where a Board of Guardians may see fit to exercise it. I think it is not advisable to set up such a distinction between labourers as, without this clause, must exist.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I am afraid it is quite impossible to agree to the proposal to apply this to the cottages already erected. There would be great difficulty in acquiring the land even if it were desirable to do so. So far as the Bill goes, I do not see there is any objection to the Sanitary Authority having the power to extend the quantity of land to an acre in future, but I am not prepared to extend that power.

MR. SEXTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman consider whether it would be possible to allow the half acre to be added, even though it may not adjoin the existing plot? Would it not be possible for the Guardians to allow a division of the acre, half an acre being elsewhere but in the vicinity?

MR. JACKSON: I cannot give any pledge of the kind. I can see it would be extremely difficult to work a plan under which half the land might be at a considerable distance from the cottage.

DR. TANNER: I saw many instances last year to which this clause might, with great assistance to labourers, be applied. I hope it may be possible for the right hon. Gentleman on Report to agree to such a clause in some form.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): It is no uncommon thing in England to have allotment grounds at a considerable distance from the cottages, and I cannot see where the difficulty would arise in the present case. I quite admit it would be difficult to get possession of ground immediately adjoining a cottage, but it might be obtained within a reasonable distance. If the right hon. Gentleman can see nothing beyond a technical objection, I think it would be more gracious to undertake to consider the point.

MR. SEXTON: I hope the right hon. Gentleman will re-consider it, and whether it is wise to create two classes of allotments in this way.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Bill reported, as amended; to be considered to-morrow.

MOTION.

TRUST INVESTMENT ACT (1889) AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Oldroyd, Bill to amend "The Trust Investment Act, 1889," ordered to be brought in by Mr. Oldroyd, Lord Brooke, Mr. Gully, Sir Matthew White Ridley, and Mr. Rowntree.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 207.]

RULINGS

Mr. J. G. S. MacNeill: "I will now proceed, with the permission of the House, to move the Amendment I have upon the Paper."

Mr. SPEAKER—“The Amendment which appears on the Paper contains a number of subjects it would not be proper to move upon an Address to the Queen's Speech. What I wish to point out to the hon. Member is that some portions of his Amendment are not relevant.”—12 Feb., 396

Mr. J. E. Redmond: “I beg to move that the Question be now put.”

Mr. SPEAKER—“Considering that this Debate has only lasted for one hour since the time when the hon. Member who introduced the Bill sat down, and other hon. Members have risen to speak on both sides of the House, I think further time should be allowed for the discussion of the Bill.”—17 Feb., 661

Mr. A. O'Connor: “Mr. Speaker, I would wish to ask you, Sir, in the case of varying and doubtful texts, or an official issue being made of certain words, is it competent for any Department to direct the printers to alter the text without the authority of an Act of Parliament?”

Mr. SPEAKER—“I think the proper test to apply would be whether there were any error either here or in the House of Lords. There has been no error. The Clerk in this House and the Clerk in the House of Lords made the proper entry, and the defect arose purely from an error of the draftsman, which perhaps he had been led into. The true record is the signed copy of the Act, which is perfectly correct.”—18 Feb., 688

Petition against Opium Trade read by Clerk at the Table. Mr. MacNeill: “I beg to ask you, Mr. Speaker, can this Petition be placed on the Minutes of the House, and appear as part of our proceedings?”

"It will be treated as Petitions are treated—in the ordinary way."—19 Feb., 810.

Mr. Chance : "That the Bill be referred to a Hybrid Committee of seven Members, and that the Committee have power to appoint the hon. Member for West Belfast as one of the Members."

Mr. SPEAKER—

"The proper course is to wait until the Bill is committed. When the Bill is committed, it can then be settled what proportion of Members shall constitute the Hybrid Committee."—26 Feb., 1362

Referring to Mr. H. Gardner.

Mr. SPEAKER—

"The hon. Member has no right of reply, as there is no Amendment before the House."—26 Feb., 1425

Mr. W. Johnston : "The sharp practice of the hon. Member, &c."

Mr. SPEAKER—

"I do not think that the hon. Member should use such a phrase. Such an expression cannot be permitted."—26 Feb., 1492

Mr. T. M. Healy : "I should like to ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether it is not always the practice of the Government on Fridays to set up Supply a second time?"

Mr. SPEAKER—

"That entirely depends upon the Government, and the time of night."—26 Feb., 1447

Mr. Boulnois : "If, Sir, I do not oppose the Second Reading of the Bill now, and wish to move the Reference of the Bill to a Hybrid Committee, should I be able to make that Motion now or at a later day?"

Mr. SPEAKER—

"The Bill, if unopposed, will be read a second time and referred to an ordinary Select Committee. It will be open to the hon. Member to move the discharge of the Order for reference to a Select Committee, and to move that the Bill be referred to a Hybrid Committee."

Mr. Boulnois : "Shall I be able to do that now if the Second Reading is unopposed?"

Mr. SPEAKER—

"The Question now is the Second Reading, and whether this is opposed or not a subsequent Motion may, as Opposed Business, be deferred to a later day."

[Later] Mr. Boulnois : "I give notice that to-morrow I shall make the Motion for the reference of the Bill to a Hybrid Committee."

Mr. SPEAKER—

"The hon. Member should in terms make his Motion now."—3 March, 1772

Mr. A. J. Balfour : "It may be convenient for the House if I were to ask you, Sir, what interpretation should be put upon the phrase "financial business," before it is adopted?"

Mr. SPEAKER—

"I think it is rather a matter for the House itself. But looking at the words which are used, I should say they included Supply, the Report of Supply, and the Ways and Means Bill; and unless a limitation 'until Easter' is introduced into the proposition, it will, of course, apply to the Budget. That would be the natural interpretation I should be disposed to put upon it; but it is a matter for the House, and I am not the arbiter of the question."—3 March, 1808

Mr. Sexton : "I beg to move, after the word 'Friday,' to insert these words 'except Tuesday, 29th March.'"

Mr. SPEAKER—

"There is already a Motion before the House to restrict the operation of this Resolution until Easter, and that Resolution I will put from the Chair."—3 March, 1814

Referring to Mr. Conybeare.

Mr. SPEAKER—

"The hon. Member is discussing the merits of a particular Bill, and not the appropriation of a particular day."—3 March, 1817

Mr. Cremer : "I understood that I should be able to move this Amendment."

Mr. SPEAKER—

"No; the hon. Member is precluded from so doing by having already spoken on the Main Question."—3 March, 1820

Deputy Speaker and CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES (RIGHT HON. L. H. COURTNEY), Cornwall, Bodmin

Referring to Mr. Labouchere.

The CHAIRMAN—

"The hon. Gentleman is not to enter into the subject of the original Vote, except so far as it is necessary to illustrate the present Vote."—25 Feb., 1818.

Referring to Dr. Clark.

The CHAIRMAN—

"The Motion before the Committee is to report Progress. If the discussion on the Vote is to go on, the Motion to report Progress should be withdrawn."—29 Feb., 1555.
